ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, Appt.,
v.
ARKANSAS BRICK & MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

(— Ark. —, 135 S. W. 843.)

Contract — to furnish laborers — breach — waiver.

1. Merely paying monthly accounts for laborers furnished under a contract to furnish a certain number of hands per day does not waive a claim for damages for a shortage, where the full number of hands was at all times demanded.

Counterclaim — supplanting recoupment — preservation by statute.

2. Although the statute has substituted a counterclaim in most cases for the former recoupment, yet the right to use the latter is preserved by a grant of the right to plead new matter constituting a defense to the action.

Same — suit by state — right to use.

3. In a suit by the state to recover the contract price for the services of convicts which it has leased to a contractor, he may recoup to the amount of the claim a demand for damages for failure to furnish the number of convicts called for by the contract.

Same — claim for overtime — recoupment for failure to comply with contract.

4. Where the state which has contracted to furnish a contractor a certain number of convicts per day sues for the amount due under the contract, and for the value of the Note. — Right of set-off, counterclaim, or recoupment in action by state.

In some instances the decisions upon the question under discussion depend upon the differences in meaning which attach in the various jurisdictions to the particular words involved. For purposes of clarification it may be well to note briefly the meaning of, and distinction between, the terms set-off, counterclaim, and recoupment. Both set-off, which originally was an equitable defense, and counterclaim, which was not known to the common law, are now the creatures of statute, and are generally used interchangeably, although by some statutes the term set-off implies a right even broader than counterclaim, it being provided that any counterclaim or demand may be used as such. Usually, however, they are both defined as any claim or demand arising out of debt, duty, or contract existing at the time of the commencement of the action, and matured at the time of their offer as a set-off or counterclaim. On the other hand, recoupment is in nature of a common-law defense, and differs from set-off and counterclaim mainly in that the claim must grow out of the very same transaction which furnishes the plaintiff's cause of action, and, being in the nature of a claim of right to reduce the amount demanded, can be had only to an extent sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. In other words, recoupment goes to the justice of plaintiff's claim, and no affirmative judgment can be had thereon; while set-off is not necessarily confined to the justice of such particular claim, and an affirmative judgment may be had for any amount to which defendant establishes his right over and above the amount to which plaintiff has proved he is entitled. But what was defined as recoupment is now included in the broader terms counterclaim and set-off, and for this reason is seldom discussed as such, although, as is explained in STATE v. ARKANSAS BRICK & MFG. CO., there might still be reason for invocation of the old common-law right of recoupment.

Where the attaching of any particular meaning to the terms under discussion renders a knowledge thereof necessary, the definition has been set out in connection with the note of the case.

The weight of authority denies any right of set-off or counterclaim against the state except as granted by statute, on the ground that the state is sovereign, and that it cannot be sued in its own court. Some courts contend, however, that the state, by submitting to the jurisdiction of its judicial tribunals, waives any right to plead its immunity, at least to the extent of its own claim; but few courts have gone to the extent of holding that the defendant may have an affirmative judgment for any amount in excess of the state's claim. Other decisions which recognize the right of set-off rest upon the ground that it would be unjust to refuse to allow as a set-off a claim to which the defendant was equitably entitled; while other decisions are to the effect that a counterclaim or set-off may be allowed in a suit by the state only where the claims are connected with and rise out of the same transaction, thus, in effect, holding that recoupment may be had.

A diversity of opinion obtains as to whether general statutes permitting a plea of set-off or counterclaim apply to actions in which the state appears as plaintiff, with the weight of authority again in favor of the state, and to the effect that it is not within the terms of the statute unless expressly included.

In taxation cases somewhat different rules apply, it being almost universally held that a claim against the state cannot be set off or counterclaimed in an action by the state to recover taxes. In one or two instances a set-off has been allowed against a contractor suing on a lien for assessments for local improvements, but such cases are readily distinguishable, and cannot be regarded as conflicting with the direct tax decisions.

This note, of course, does not involve the merits of the claim to set-off, counterclaim, or recoupment, except in so far as services of convicts left after the expiration of the contract period, the two claims are not separable, so as to prevent the contractor from recouping against both a claim for failure to furnish the number of hands called for by the contract.

Same — claim against — failure to present to auditor — effect.

5. Where a state auditor has no authority to undertake the liquidation of claims, failure to present to him a claim against the state for damages for failure to furnish convicts according to contract will not prevent its use by way of recoupment, in a suit to recover the contract price for those furnished.

that question is involved in a determination of the question whether in any case such a remedy is available against the state.

In general.

In State v. Northern C. R. Co. 18 Md. 193, it was held that there is no principle of discount, set-off, or recoupment which would authorize the allowance of a claim of a defendant for damages, liquidated or unliquidated, against the claim of a state. And in the following cases it is held that there can be no set-off against the claims of the state, unless expressly authorized by statute: People v. Miles, 56 Cal. 401; State v. —, 2 N. C. (1 Hayw.) 221; Borden v. Houston, 2 Tex. 594; Chevallier v. State, 10 Tex. 315.

In Com. v. Rodes, 5 T. B. Mon. 318, it was held that a defense of set-off cannot be made to suits of the state against an official for fees collected by him. The decision was upon the ground that the statutory provisions as to the method of obtaining discharge for revenue collected were exclusive. Chief Justice Bibb, however, delivered a dissenting opinion in which he strongly urged the court to recognize a right in the collector to set off his claim against the claim of the state.

In People v. Corner, 59 Hun, 299, 12 N. Y. Supp. 936, affirmed without opinion in 128 N. Y. 640, 29 N. E. 147, where the state sought to recover for material sold, and the defendant interposed a counterclaim for damages for breach of the state's contract to continue to furnish such materials, it was held that the defendant was not entitled to set off such loss, the ground being that to allow such a claim would be a violation of the prerogative of the state; and that the defendant's proper remedy was to invoke the jurisdiction of the court of claims, which the state had established for the purpose of ascertaining the damages in such and other cases. To the same effect, see People ex rel. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Roberts, 30 App. Div. 78, 51 N. Y. Supp. 747, affirmed on opinion below in 166 N. Y. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by the State from a decree of the Pulaski Chancery Court dismissing a suit brought to recover the contract price for the services of state convicts. Affirmed.

Statement by Norton, Special Judge:

This action was instituted by the state to recover from the defendant $17,726.55, claimed to be due from the defendant for convict labor. On the 31st day of July, 1899, the state entered into a contract with the defendant, by which it agreed for a term of ten years, beginning January 1, 1900, to furnish the defendant 300 able-bodied men per day, on demand. For this labor the defendant undertook to pay 50 cents per day for each convict. After the 693, 51 N. E. 1093; and People v. Miles, 56 Cal. 401.

Where a set-off is allowed only to avoid circuity of action, it cannot be entertained as a defense to an action by the state, as an individual cannot bring suit against the state. Battle v. Thompson, 65 N. C. 406.

And where a counterclaim or set-off is a suit, an individual can interpose neither in an action brought against him by the state. Ibid.; State v. Baldwin, 14 S. C. 135; State v. Corbin, 16 S. C. 533 (in this case it was suggested that to do justice it would be wise for the legislature to enact a remedy for such cases); Moore v. Tate, 87 Tenn. 725, 10 Am. St. Rep. 712, 11 S. W. 935; Bates v. Texas, 2 Tex. 616.

And in Maryland it is held that the right of set-off, which is in the nature of a cross-suit, does not exist in actions instituted by the state, which, being sovereign, cannot be sued, unless expressly allowed by statute. State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 34 Md. 344.

And the rule that a state cannot be sued without her consent was held, in State v. Gaines, 46 La. Ann. 431, 15 So. 174, to apply to a demand in reconviction set up in an action to recover certain state bonds which were alleged to have been unlawfully sold by the state treasurer.

In Minnesota the question of the allowance of a counterclaim or set-off in a suit by the state depends upon whether the claims are connected with and arise out of the same transaction. Thus, in State ex rel. Young v. Holgate, 107 Minn. 71, 119 N. W. 792, the court, in a suit by the state to compel the payment over of collected taxes, in holding that a county treasurer could not plead by way of set-off or counterclaim that other money had been lost through the failure of certain banks, and that such amount had been paid to the state in the expectation that the loss would be made good by the banks and bondsmen, as the matter sought to be asserted had no connection with the matter referred to in the plaintiff's suit, said; "The state cannot be sued without its own consent, and expiration of the ten years, a number of convicts were allowed to remain with the defendant for a short time, and the complaint states that of the amount sued for, $12,898.65 was for a balance due for convicts furnished during the life of the contract, and $4,827.90 for such as were furnished after the expiration of the ten years mentioned in the contract. The charge by the state for the first of these items was at the contract price of 50 cents per day, but for the second item, the charge was for the reasonable value of the services of the convicts. The answer admits that after the 1st day of January, 1909, the date of the expiration of the contract, the labor of certain convicts was furnished to the defendant by the plaintiff; and the answer alleges that this labor was furnished under and pursuant to the contract, or, as contended on the trial, to make up in part for the failure to furnish the full number. The answer also denies the indebtedness, and, by a counterclaim, sets up damages sustained by reason of the failure of the state to furnish 300 convicts per day. The damages claimed by the defendant in the counterclaim exceed the amount claimed by the state in the original complaint. During the ten years, and until the last month or two before the expiration of the contract, the defendant paid the state each month what it owed for the convicts furnished. It is also shown that during the ten years, the defendant, from time to time, demanded that the state the assertion of this claim as a set-off or counterclaim is in effect a suit against the state. When the state institutes a suit in its own behalf, it to a certain extent subjects itself to the same rules which apply to ordinary suitors in its courts. When it institutes an equitable action, whatever may properly affect the relief demanded may be urged against it, and in an action brought by it to recover money, the defendant may in defense assert any claims which are connected with and arise out of the same transaction; that is, in such an action the defendant is 'entitled to plead and prove any and all matters properly defensive, including credits and set-offs, so far as the latter are dependent on, connected with, or grow out of, the transaction which constituted the subject-matter of the suit.' . . . 'Of course, she is only bound quoad the matter submitted by her in her suit.' . . . But all claims and demands arising out of independent transactions are considered as suits against the state."

And in Mississippi a distinction is drawn between set-off and recoupment, resulting in a conclusion similar to that announced in the preceding case, it being held in Raymond v. State, 54 Miss. 562, 28 Am. Rep. 382, that a set-off (here defined as a counter demand arising out of a transaction extrinsic of the plaintiff's cause of action) cannot be held against the state's claim, but that defenses to suits brought by the state against individuals, growing out of recoupment (distinguished from set-off, in that it arises out of matters connected with the transaction or contract on which the plaintiff's cause of action is founded), are not governed by the same rule. See also to the same effect, Battle v. Thompson, 65 N. C. 406, and Moore v. Tate, 87 Tenn. 725, 10 Am. St. Rep. 712, 11 S. W. 935.

So, in England the rule seems to be that where a sovereign power submits to the jurisdiction of the courts, it does so as to matters properly raisable in an action as a defense, but that a counterclaim foreign to the subject-matter of the action cannot be interposed. South African Re- 33 L.R.A. Rep. 125; Rothschild v. Portugal, 3 Younge & C. Exch. 594; United States v. Prioleau, 36 L. J. Ch. N. S. 36, L. R. 2 Eq. 659, 12 Jur. N. S. 724, 14 L. T. N. S. 700, 14 Week. Rep. 1012.

And that one sued by the state may counterclaim when the claims arise out of the same transactions, see McCandlish v. Com. 76 Va. 1002. And that claims which raise a distinct cause of action cannot be raised in a suit by the state, since to allow such an inquiry would in effect be to sustain a suit against the state, see Com. v. Philadelphia County, 157 Pa. 531, 27 Atl. 546.

In Rowan v. Sharps' Rifle Mfg. Co. 29 Conn. 282, it was said that it would be inequitable to refuse to allow as a set-off a claim essentially founded on contract, against an equitable demand of the British government, even though the British government as a foreign sovereignty could not be sued in our courts.

And in Kentucky it is held, "upon the broad principle of justice which allows everyone who is sued to show, as matter of law, that he does not owe the demand for which he is sued," that when one is sued by the commonwealth he may defeat recovery by set-off or counterclaim, even though there is no legislative authority therefor, it being said that by itself suing, the sovereign gives its consent to have the equities determined. Com. v. Todd, 9 Bush, 708; Com. v. Owensboro & N. R. Co. 81 Ky. 572; Com. v. Barker, 126 Ky. 200, 103 S. W. 303.

So, in Powers v. Central Bank, 18 Ga. 658, it was held that a state official might set off a claim for services in an action to recover money collected and held by him in his official capacity, although there was should perform its undertaking and furnish convicts to the number of 300 per day.

Messrs. Hal L. Norwood, Attorney General, J. H. Harrod, F. T. Vaughan, and George Vaughan, for the State:

The allegations of the answer were not a set-off, because unliquidated damages cannot be claimed as a set-off.

Gerson v. Slemons, 30 Ark. 50.

The allegations of the answer constitute a counterclaim, and nothing more or less.

Ramsey v. Capshaw, 71 Ark. 408, 75 S. W. 479; Gibney v. Turner, 52 Ark. 117, 12 S. W. 201; Ames Iron Works v. Rea, 56 Ark. 450, 19 S. W. 1063; St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Beard, 60 Ark. 151, 29 S. W. 146; Martin v. Roesch, 57 Ark. 474,

The state's demand not only became an account stated, but the right of the brick company to contest or dispute their liability was waived when it paid its account in full.

1 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 372.

Messrs. Coleman & Lewis for appellee.

Norton, Special Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not contended on the part of the state that it performed its agreement to furnish the 300 convicts, but it is insisted for the state that by defendant's course of no statute conferring any such right. The court, however, recommended the passage of an act similar to the Federal act of March 3, 1797, although it was said that such act did not impliedly confer the right. See also United States v. Mann, as set out infra.

And in the following cases, in which no authority or reasons were given, the right to set off private claims against governmental claims in actions by the government was recognized: Mumford v. United States, 31 Ct. Cl. 210; United States v. Barker, 1 Paine, 156, Fed. Cas. No. 14,517; United States v. Smith, 1 Bond, 68, Fed. Cas. No. 16,321; Bank of United States v. United States, 2 How. 711, 11 L. ed. 439; The Siren (The Siren v. United States) 7 Wall. 152, 19 L. ed. 129; United States v. Warren, 12 Okla. 350, 71 Pac. 685. And in State v. Franklin Bank, 10 Ohio, 91, and in State v. Gaillard, 1 Bay, 500, it was held generally that the defendant when sued by the state may set off to the amount of its claim.

In People v. Brandreth, 36 N. Y. 191, Hunt, J., in discussing the question whether in equitable actions brought by the people, counterclaims or set-offs might be interposed by the defendant, which question the majority of the court did not think necessarily involved, said: "Although a state cannot be sued, I think it is subject to a set-off, like individuals, when it comes into court as a plaintiff, and this, both upon principle and authority. When it becomes a suitor, it waives, for the time, its dignity as a sovereign. It lays aside its strong arm, by which it can at once enforce its own claims, and submits itself to the arbitration of the courts, and to its practice and its proceedings. For this purpose, it is like an individual or an inferior corporation, and becoming voluntarily a party to a suit, no good reason can be given why it should not be bound by the same rules that are applicable to other parties in the same position. . . . To the same effect is the statute (2 Rev. Stat. 553) which enacts that when suits are brought in the name of the people, they 'shall be subject to all the provisions of law respecting similar suits and proceedings when instituted in the name of any citizen, except when provision is or shall be otherwise expressly made by statute; and in all such suits, the people shall be liable to be nonsuited and to have judgment of non pros. or discontinuance entered against them, in the same cases and in like manner and with the same effect as in suits brought by citizens, except that no execution shall issue thereon.' . . . I have no doubt that this statute does, and was intended to, subject the state to a set-off, where a set-off would exist against an individual plaintiff." But see People v. Corner, as set out supra.

In Sinking Fund Comrs. v. Northern Bank, 1 Met. (Ky.) 174, it was held that defendant in a suit by the state for the purchase money of property sold him could retain a sum sufficient to remove an encumbrance which the state in equity was bound to remove, although no action could be brought directly against the state, the court saying that rights of the parties should be settled and determined according to the equity and justice of the case.

By statute.

As before stated the question has also arisen as to whether general statutes permitting a set-off or counterclaim apply to suits by the state where the statute is not expressly mentioned.

Thus, in White v. The Governor, 18 Ala. 767, it was held that in the absence of statutory provision a defendant has no right to set off a cross demand against the complaining state, and that actions brought by the state were not within the purview of a general statute providing that in all cases where there are mutual debts between the plaintiff and the defendant, the one may be set off against the other, and that judgment may be awarded against the plaintiff when the defendant's set-off shall exceed the plaintiff's demand for the amount of ex-dealing—settling monthly for such number of convicts as it had—the defendant waived its right to full compliance by the state. It is also contended for the state that a cross demand of counterclaim or recoupment cannot be made against the state, as that would, in a sense, be permitting the state to be made a defendant; and it is further contended in behalf of the state that, even if counterclaim or recoupment can be allowed at all in this case, it must be confined to so much of the cause of action as is due for labor furnished under the contract, and that labor furnished after the expiration of the contract is not sufficiently connected with the plaintiff's cause of action to be made subject to the cross demand of counterclaim or recoupment.

The contention on the part of the state that defendant waived its right to the full number of men mentioned in the contract we do not find supported by the testimony. While the defendant, with the exceptions mentioned, paid monthly for such convicts as were furnished, it is, on the other hand, proved that it at all times demanded the full number of men from the state. In this respect, as in others, the findings of fact by the chancellor are well supported by the testimony. The findings of fact by the chancellor include the failure of the state to furnish the convicts as agreed, and a damage sustained by the defendant in a sum in excess of the amount claimed by cess, the court saying that it could not have been the intention of the legislature to embrace the state by the general language used.

And in Alabama Girls' Industrial School v. Reynolds, 143 Ala. 579, 42 So. 114, it was held that a constitutional provision that "all corporations shall have the right to sue, and shall be subject to be sued, in all courts in like manner as natural persons," did not permit the state to be subjected to suit by allowing a cross bill in a suit by a corporation which it had created merely to discharge one of its governmental functions, it being said that the sovereign is not bound by general words restrictive of prerogative rights unless expressly named.

So in Raymond v. State, 54 Miss. 562, 28 Am. Rep. 382, it was held that the general words of a statute permitting a set-off or counterclaim do not embrace the state or affect its rights, unless it is specially named or clearly intended to be included.

And in People v. Dennison, 84 N. Y. 272, it is said that authority to render a judgment against the state cannot be inferred from general laws in which the state is not expressly mentioned.

But in Arapahoe County v. Denver, 30 Colo. 13, 69 Pac. 586, it was held that a county could counterclaim for registration books and booths in an action for penalties and interests which the county treasurer, acting as agent for both, had wrongfully paid to the county, under a statute (Civil Code, §§ 56, 57) providing that in an action on contract any other cause of action also arising upon contract, and existing at the commencement of the action, may be pleaded as a counterclaim or defense. The decision, however, was expressly limited to actions in which revenue questions were not involved, it being intimated that no counterclaim could be interposed in such cases.

And in The Newbattle, L. R. 10 Prob. Div. 33, 54 L. J. Prob. N. S. 16, 52 L. T. N. S. 15, 33 Week. Rep. 318, 5 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 356, it was held that the English Admiralty court act, 1861, § 34 (24 Vict. Chap. 10, § 34), which provides that "the high court of admiralty may, on the application 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) of the defendant in cause of damage, and on his instituting a cross cause for the damage sustained by him in respect of the same collision, direct that the principal and the cross cause be heard at the same time and on the same evidence," etc., is applicable to an action by a foreign sovereign, the court saying that "when a government comes in as a suitor, it submits to the jurisdiction of the court and to all orders which may properly be made."

In the Federal cases next cited, it is apparently assumed or conceded that no set-off or cross demand can be maintained against the United States, without a congressional enactment to sustain and authorize it, and expressly so declared in Tillou v. United States, 1 Ct. Cl. 220, reversed on other grounds in 6 Wall. 485, 18 L. ed. 920; but see United States v. Mann, as set out infra. As to the right to counterclaim, credit, or set-off in suits by the United States government, it has been held that such a right is implied by the act of March 3, 1797 (1 Stat. at L. 514, chap. 20), which provides that in suits between the United States and individuals, no claim for credit shall be admitted upon trial except such as appears to have been presented to the accounting officers of the treasury for their examination, and to have been by them disallowed in whole or in part, etc. United States v. Prentice, 6 McLean, 65, Fed. Cas. No. 16,083; Reeside v. United States, Dev. Ct. Cl. §§ 458, 459; Adams v. United States, 3 Ct. Cl. 312; United States v. Buchanan, Crabble, 563, Fed. Cas. No. 14,678; United States v. Collier, 3 Blatchf. 325, Fed. Cas. No. 14,833; United States v. Giles, 9 Cranch, 212, 3 L. ed. 708; United States v. Wilkins, 6 Wheat. 135, 5 L. ed. 225 (wherein it was held that the defendant is entitled at the trial to the full benefit of any credit in his favor, whether arising out of the particular transaction for which he was sued, or out of distinct and independent transactions which would constitute a legal or equitable set-off in whole or in part of the debt sued for by the United States); United States v. Macdaniel, 7 Pet. 1, 8 L. ed. 587 (holding that the de-

the state. With the facts in this way determined, the remaining question is one of applying law.

That a counterclaim could not be maintained against the state for any balance the defendant might be entitled to over and above the amount of the state's claim is conceded. But counsel for the state go further and contend that even to allow recoupment to the amount of the state's claim is equally prohibited. The right of the state to be held exempt from the recovery of judgments against it is no clearer than the right of a defendant, in a suit by the state, to avail himself of all and every character of defensive pleas, except limitation. State v. Morgan, 52 Ark. 150, 12 S. W. 243. He cannot by a cross action have an affirmative judgment against the state for any excess he may be entitled to over and above the state's claim; but this is the extent of his disadvantage from having dealt with the sovereign.

The law of recoupment requires some consideration, and a distinguishing of it from the idea usually conveyed by the word "counterclaim." Counterclaim and recoupment are alike in the sense that each must grow out of, or be connected with, the transaction upon which the plaintiff sues. Recoupment was allowed at common law (Desha v. Robinson, 17 Ark. 245), but a counterclaim was not. Recoupment was considered a defense, and, prior to the adoption of the Code, if the defendant's cross demand against the plaintiff exceeded defendant's right to a set-off cannot be limited to strictly legal claims); United States v. Ripley, 7 Pet. 18, 8 L. ed. 593 (holding that both legal and equitable claims should be allowed by way of set-off against the government's claim); United States v. Fillebrown, 7 Pet. 34, 8 L. ed. 599; United States v. Robeson, 9 Pet. 319, 9 L. ed. 142 (holding that an equitable claim for services may be set up as a credit in a suit by the United States against the claimant); United States v. Hawkins, 10 Pet. 125, 9 L. ed. 369; Gratiot v. United States, 15 Pet. 336, 10 L. ed. 759; United States v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet. 377, 10 L. ed. 774; Ware v. United States, 4 Wall. 617, 18 L. ed. 389; United States v. Eckford (United States v. Tillou) 6 Wall. 484, 18 L. ed. 920, reversing upon other grounds 1 Ct. Cl. 220; United States v. Gilmore, 7 Wall. 491, 19 L. ed. 282; Watkins v. United States, 9 Wall. 759, 19 L. ed. 820; Hall v. United States, 91 U. S. 559, 23 L. ed. 446; United States v. Kimball, 101 U. S. 726, 25 L. ed. 835.

And under §§ 951, 957, of the U. S. Rev. Stat., U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 695, 698, which originated in, and is to the same effect as, the act of March 3, 1797, the decisions are to the same effect. See Alexander v. United States, 6 C. C. A. 602, 15 U. S. App. 158, 57 Fed. 828; United States v. Patrick, 20 C. C. A. 11, 36 U. S. App. 645, 73 Fed. 800, writ of error dismissed in 42 L. ed. 1216, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 949; United States v. Hart, 2 Ariz. 415, 19 Pac. 4; United States v. Lamson, 3 MacArth. 204.

it should be noted, however, that in United States v. Mann, 2 Brock. 9, Fed. Cas. No. 16,716, Chief Justice Marshall said that this statute apparently gave no right whatever, but recognized a pre-existing right, and held that an officer, independently of any statute, had a right to set off a claim for services in an action by the government to recover government moneys held by him. In commenting on the application of rules of set-off between individuals to actions in which the government was a party, it was said: "The argument is the stronger if the creditor, from any cause, cannot be coerced to pay this demand."

And the Arkansas statute (Dig. chap. 23, § 13, p. 203), which evidently was copied from the Federal statute, has been held to permit a set-off against the state as to claims falling within the provisions of the statute. Biscoe v. State, 19 Ark. 559.

And the same is true of the Florida statute (Thomp. Dig. 417, §§ 3, 4). Frier v. State, 11 Fla. 300.

Right to affirmative relief.

As to the obtaining of an affirmative judgment on a counterclaim or set-off, it has been held that there is nothing in the act of March 3, 1797 (1 Stat. at L. 514, chap. 20), allowing credits or set-offs against the United States, which prohibits the officer in an action against him by the United States from having allowed to him by way of set-off a larger sum than the United States are seeking to recover. Reeside v. United States, Dev. Ct. Cl. § 460. But on the other hand, many decisions hold, and with better reason (no set-off against United States except by statute, and therefore to authorize an affirmative judgment, a positive enactment so permitting would be necessary), that the defendant cannot be allowed a larger sum than the government's claim. Adams v. United States, 3 Ct. Cl. 312; United States v. Gillies, 144 Fed. 991; Pennsylvania v. Matlack, 4 Dall. 303, 1 L. ed. 843 (wherein it was said that the defendant could not indirectly recover from the state a substantive, independent claim by way of set-off the plaintiff's demand, the defendant could use his demand in recoupment only by sustaining a loss of the excess. Hence, prior to the Code, the defendant could recover on his cross demand to the full extent only by an independent action. The Code, to prevent a multiplicity of suits, provided for the counterclaim, and that the defendant might recover on it in the same suit any balance that the plaintiff owed him over and above the plaintiff's demand. The counterclaim thus became an affirmative cross action, which ordinarily will cover all purposes of recoupment, but not always. A right left to the defendant to be worked out through the doctrine of recoupment, which could not be had through a counterclaim, is to use defensively a cause of action which, as a counterclaim, would be barred by lapse of time. A counterclaim must be an existing cause of action, but recoupment is a right to reduce the plaintiff's claim, and this right exists as long as the plaintiff's cause of action exists. A breach by the plaintiff, though barred as an independent cause of action, continues to exist for defensive purposes, available to the defendant, so long as the plaintiff may sue upon any breach by defendant. Williams v. Neely, 69 L.R.A. 232, 67 C. C. A. 171, 134 Fed. 1; Beecher v. Baldwin, 55 Conn. 419, 3 Am. St. Rep. 57, 12 Atl. 401; C. Aultman & Co. v. Torrey, 55 Minn. 492, 57 N. W. 211; Wood, Limitations, 3d ed. § 282; Conner v. Smith, 88 Ala. 300, any more than he could directly recover a debt due from the state by bringing an action against it); Reeside v. Walker, 11 How. 272, 13 L. ed. 693 (wherein it was said that to sanction an affirmative judgment under a plea of set-off would virtually be allowing the United States to be sued, which the courts do not allow); De Grott v. United States, 5 Wall. 419, 18 L. ed. 700; United States v. Eckford (United States v. Tillou) 6 Wall. 484, 18 L. ed. 920 (wherein the rule was announced in most positive terms); Schaumburg v. United States, 103 U. S. 667, 26 L. ed. 599 (in this case, however, it was said that under some circumstances it might be proper to permit the jury to certify to any balance they found to be due from the government, but that a refusal to do so could not be reviewed by the United States Supreme Court); People v. Dennison, 84 N. Y. 272; United States v. Warren, 12 Okla. 350, 71 Pac. 685.

And where the decisions allowing a set-off are upon the broad ground that the rights of the parties should be adjusted according to the equities, it is generally held that the defendant's claim may be adjudicated only to the extent that it is asserted as a defense. Com. v. Todd, 9 Bush, 708; Com. v. Owensboro & N. R. Co. 81 Ky. 572; State v. Franklin Bank, 10 Ohio, 91; State v. Gaillard, 1 Bay, 500; Moore v. Tate, 87 Tenn. 725, 10 Am. St. Rep. 712, 11 S. W. 935.

And in New York it has been held that 2 Rev. Stat. 552, § 13 (3 Rev. Stat. 6th ed. 860, § 13), which provided that civil suits brought by the state "shall be subject to all the provisions of law respecting similar suits and proceedings when instituted by or in the name of any citizen," except when otherwise expressly provided, and providing that the people have judgment of non pros. or discontinuance instituted against them the same as in suits brought by individuals, except that no execution should issue therein, does not authorize an affirmative judgment, the ground being that such a judgment could be had only when expressly authorized. People v. Dennison, 84 N. Y. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

272, affirming 8 Abb. N. C. 128, 59 How. Pr. 157.

And in Alabama it is held that the constitutional prohibition against making the state a defendant in any court of law applies to a cross bill seeking affirmative relief against the state. Holmes v. State, 100 Ala. 291, 14 So. 51; Alabama Girls' Industrial School v. Reynolds, 143 Ala. 579, 42 So. 114.

Miscellaneous.

In New York it has been held that the rule that a set-off cannot be had in an action by the state does not apply to political divisions of the state. Thus, in Taylor v. New York, 82 N. Y. 10, it is held, on the ground that it is not inherent in the nature or the authority of a county that it cannot be sued, and that any exemption must be by statute, that where a county seeks to recover a debt by judicial process, a demand may be allowed against it as a set-off, although such demand, because of a statutory provision, could not have formed the basis of an independent action.

It has also been said that in actions between governmental entities, the law of set-off is the same as if the controversy were between individuals. Louisiana v. United States, 22 Ct. Cl. 284, affirmed on other grounds in 123 U. S. 32, 31 L. ed. 69, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 17 (an action by the state against the general government).

Taxation cases.

The general law is well settled that no set-off is admissible against demands for taxes levied for general or local governmental purposes. Scobey v. Decatur County, 72 Ind. 551; Morgan v. Pueblo & A. Valley R. Co. 6 Colo. 478; Finnegan v. Fernandina, 15 Fla. 379, 21 Am. Rep. 292.

In Gatling v. Carteret County, 92 N. C. 536, 53 Am. Rep. 432, in holding that an indebtedness of a municipal corporation cannot be set off against an amount owed for taxes, either in law or equity, the court said: "To accord to the courts of chancery

7 So. 150; Soudan Planting Co. v. Stevenson, 94 Ark. 599, 128 S. W. 574.

We refer to this right to use barred cross demands, not because the question is involved in this case, but to show the defensive character of the plea of recoupment, and that it is a common-law right which the Code makers could not have intended to abolish or in any wise impair. The whole spirit and plan of the Code was to liberalize the procedure, and to extend, instead of curtailing, remedial rights. If express warrant for recoupment in the letter of the Code should be contended for, it can well be found in the right to plead "new matter constituting a defense." Kirby's Dig. § 6098, subd. 3.

The question which has most concerned the power to interfere with taxation by interposing to set off the indebtedness of the government against the taxes might greatly embarrass the operation of its machinery, if not clog its very wheels. The courts of chancery are therefore not clothed with any such power." And in Anderson v. Mayfield, 93 Ky. 230, 19 S. W. 598, and in Cobb v. Elizabeth City, 75 N. C. 1, both of which involved similar facts, the same conclusion was reached.

And in Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. L. 398, in holding that a tax was not liable to set-off, the court said that to permit such set-off "would be utterly subversive of the power of government, and destructive of the very end of taxation."

And in Newport & C. Bridge Co. v. Douglass, 12 Bush, 673, in holding that an alleged indebtedness for transportation of troops for the government could not be set off against the taxes levied by the state for the support of its government, the court said: "In the imposition of taxes, the state acts in its sovereign character; and where it finds it necessary or convenient to resort to the courts to enforce the performance of the public duty, or the satisfaction of the public burden resting on the taxpayer, it cannot be met and defeated by an ordinary plea of set-off. This public duty is absolute and imperative. The tax is not a mere debt due from the citizen to the government, and the courts have no power to treat it as a debt, without the express sanction of the legislature."

And in McCracken v. Elder, 34 Pa. 239, it was held that a claim for damages arising out of a breach of contract could not be set off against school taxes in an action to recover such taxes.

So, a claim for the use of a railroad during war cannot be set off in an equitable suit by the United States to recover taxes assessed against the railroad company. United States v. Pacific R. Co. 4 Dill. 66, Fed. Cas. No. 15,983.

Nor can a claim for services rendered be set off against a borough in an action by it to recover from a tax collector the balance 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the court is whether or not there is sufficient connection between the two claims made by the state,—one under the contract, the other for labor furnished after the date of its expiration,—to make both subject to the defendant's plea of recoupment. The testimony shows that the convicts were simply allowed to remain. It is not claimed that any new contract was made about them; and the defendant considered they were allowed to remain to make up some of the state's deficit in men furnished. The chancellor found that all the men furnished by the state were furnished under the contract. A majority of the court are of the opinion that the state's claim for labor furnished after the expiration of the contract cannot be separated from what had of a school tax. Wilson v. Lewistown, 1 Watts & S. 428.

In Aplin v. Van Tassel, 73 Mich. 28, 40 N. W. 847, it was held that the county treasurer could not counterclaim a county claim against the state in a suit by it to compel him to pay over taxes collected by him, especially as the statutory duty of the treasurer was absolute and specific as to paying over public moneys, although the board of supervisors of the county had attempted to authorize him to pay over no money until the county was credited with the amount claimed. The court said that the county treasurer was acting directly for the state, and that a set-off was as direct an exercise of an affirmative jurisdiction as a suit, and could not be pleaded when not authorized by statute. Aplin v. Grand Traverse County, 73 Mich. 182, 16 Am. St. Rep. 576, 41 N. W. 223; Auditor General v. Bay County, 106 Mich. 662, 64 N. W. 570; and The Treasurers v. Cleary, 3 Rich. L. 372, are to the same effect.

In State v. Leckie, 14 La. Ann. 651, it was held that a surety when sued on a tax collector's bond could not set up a personal claim against the state in compensation of its demand, the ground being that the state could not be sued, even indirectly, as by way of a reconvention demand set up in the answer. And the same conclusion was reached as to a claim of the tax collector for traveling expenses. State v. Floyd, 28 La. Ann. 553. And the same is true of other expenses of the office. State v. Bradley, 37 La. Ann. 623.

So, it is held that a taxpayer will not be allowed to offset the collector's personal indebtedness to him against state, county, or district taxes. Humphreys v. Patton, 21 W. Va. 223; Elliott v. Miller, 8 Mich. 132. And this is true even though the collector has settled with the state treasurer for such taxes. Miller v. Wisener, 45 W. Va. 59, 30 S. E. 237.

But in New Orleans v. Orleans Waterworks Co. 36 La. Ann. 432, where the city brought an action to recover taxes assessed for a period during which the defendant had gone before, in a way to limit the defendant's plea of recoupment, which was sufficiently "connected with the subject of the action." Wyman v. Herard, 9 Okla. 35, 59 Pac. 1009; Tinsley v. Tinsley, 15 B. Mon. 454.

The case last cited comes with especial force, as it arose in Kentucky after her adoption of a Code which was subsequently adopted by Arkansas. When one state adopts the laws of another state, it is quite generally held that constructions of the adopted law go along with it. Without such aid, however, in this case, we would hold the law to be as here expressed.

The New York cases to which our attention has been called (People v. Denison, 59 How. Pr. 157, and People v. Dennison, 84 N. Y. 272) are to be distinguished from the case here. They deal with an affirmative judgment against the state on a counterclaim, and hold that it could not be allowed to stand. In the course of the opinions it can likely be gathered as the judgment of the court that, even for purely defensive purposes, a claim against the state could not be used, unless first presented to the state board of audit. This was said, however, of a claim for work and materials furnished the state, under contract. It is not likely that the state board of audit would have been held authorized to entertain a claim for unliquidated damages. In any event, we are of the opinion that § 3404 of Kirby's Digest would not authorize the auditor of the state of Arkansas to undertake the liquidation and settlement of a claim for damages. To illustrate, if in this case the brick company had exhibited its claim to the auditor, and he had allowed it, his act would have been treated as idle.

We cannot hold that the right to recoup in this case was in any way affected by the failure of the brick company to first exhibit its claim to the auditor of the state. The cause must be affirmed.

McCulloch, Ch. J., and Frauenthal, J., concur in part of the judgment and dissent as to part.

McCulloch, Ch. J., dissenting:

This court held, in the case of McConnell v. Arkansas Brick & Mfg. Co. 70 Ark. 568, 69 S. W. 559, that defendant's contract with the state was an enforceable one, and that decision is the law of this case with respect to defendant's rights under the contract; this though the McConnell Case has since been overruled. Pitcock v. State, 91 Ark. 527, 134 Am. St. Rep. 88, 121 S. W. 742.

I am of the opinion that the right of recoupment as a defense has not been abolished by the Code, and that it can be asserted in this case brought by the state to recover the amount due under the contract. I reach that conclusion, however, on somewhat different reasons than that furnished water to the city in consideration of a void exemption from taxation, it was held that the defendant could reconvene for water furnished, to the extent that the exemption was the consideration of defendant's application to supply free water.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 136, 30 S. W. 624, it was held that a railroad company which by mistake had paid an excess of taxes could plead such excess as a set-off in an action against it to recover taxes, it being said that the court, having jurisdiction, should exercise it to the extent of doing complete justice to each party.

On the other hand, it has been held that overpayment of taxes made by a debtor cannot be set off against the taxes of the following year, as taxes, for reasons of public policy, are not such demands as admit of pleas in compensation. New Orleans v. Davidson, 30 La. Ann. 541, 31 Am. Rep. 228, s. c. subsequent appeal, 30 La. Ann. 554.

So, in McVeigh v. Lanier, 50 Ark. 384, 8 S. W. 141, it was held that an overpayment of taxes cannot be made a set-off in favor of the landowner against subsequent taxes.

And in Wayne v. Savannah, 56 Ga. 448, it was held that property holders who have paid, whether voluntarily or by coercion, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

illegal taxes in former years, have no right to set off such payments against executions issued for the taxes of later years.

And in Hawkins v. Sumter County, 57 Ga. 166, it was said that a municipal or county corporation must be allowed to collect its revenues for local government upon principles of public policy, and that the courts will not favor any interruption of such collection by affidavit of illegality claiming set-off. See also, to the effect that illegal taxes paid by mistake cannot be set off against unpaid taxes, People ex rel. Graff v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 247 Ill. 373, 93 N. E. 424, and People ex rel. Graff v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 247 Ill. 340, 93 N. E. 422.

Another class of cases which support the general rule is based upon the principle that taxes are not in the nature of contracts between party and party, but grow out of a duty to and are the positive acts of the government, to the making and enforcing of which their personal consent individually is not required. Apperson v. Memphis, 2 Flipp. 363, Fed. Cas. No. 497; Anderson v. Mayfield, 93 Ky. 230, 19 S. W. 598; Trenholm v. Charleston, 3 S. C. 347, 16 Am. Rep. 732; Keep v. Frazier, 4 Wis. 224.

And in Charlotte v. Keon, 128 N. Y. Supp. 80, it was held that in an action by a village for delinquent taxes, a counterclaim expressed in the opinion of the majority. The remedy of recoupment finds no express recognition in the Code, and one of the sections provides that "all statutes and laws heretofore in force in this state in any case provided for by the Code, and inconsistent with its provisions, are repealed and abrogated." Kirby's Dig. § 7818. I have had grave doubts whether that section abolished the remedy of recoupment, but after some hesitation I have concluded that, as the Code was not designed to destroy rights or to alter principles of the law (Baylies, Code Pl. & Pr. p. 3), but only to formulate remedies, the provision in question should not be construed to repeal the law giving a remedy under circumstances where no other is provided under the Code. Recoupment is included in counterclaim, except that it is used only as a defense, but to that extent it is not provided for in the Code, and is not inconsistent therewith; so it is not abolished.

I concur with the majority, therefore, in holding that the decree should be affirmed so far as it concerns the state's claim for the price of convict labor furnished under the contract. I dissent from the view that defendant has a right to recoup against the claim for the price of labor furnished after the contract expired. Recoupment, like a counterclaim, must be a cause of action "arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action." The contract with the state, the alleged violation of which forms the basis of defendant's claim for damages, expired and was at an end. The state's suit to recover for the price of labor used after that time was not based on that contract; therefore the claim for damages did not arise out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint. The fact that the two transactions closely approximated in point of time does not make them the same transaction. They are as distinct as though they had been far removed in point of time. I think this view is fully sustained by decisions of this court. Barry-Wehmiller Machinery Co. v. Thompson, 83 Ark. 283, 104 S. W. 137, and cases therein cited. The following decisions of the New York courts also fully sustain that view. People v. Denison, 59 How. Pr. 157; People v. Dennison, 84 N. Y. 272.

The fact that the action is for the price of convict labor, the same as under the contract, does not make it "connected with the subject of the action" so as to allow recoupment. On the whole, I am of the opinion that the state should recover the fair value of the labor of the convicts after the expiration of the contract. Defendant received the benefit of the labor, and should be compelled to pay the state for it. Under principles which, I think, are well settled, defendant should not be permitted to recoup, so as to extinguish this item of the state's claim, damage alleged to have been for a debt due from the village is not available, it being said that the action is brought by the village in its governmental capacity rather than as an individual upon a contract.

Public improvement cases.

The general rule is that a demand for damages caused in improving a street cannot be set up as a counterclaim in a suit by the municipality on the improvement assessment, unless expressly so authorized by statute, as that would divert the tax from its special purpose. Himmelman v. Spanagel, 39 Cal. 389; Hornung v. McCarthy, 126 Cal. 17, 58 Pac. 303; Dawson v. Hipkind, 173 Ind. 216, 89 N. E. 863; Lux & T. Stone Co. v. Donaldson, 162 Ind. 481, 68 N. E. 1014; Laverty v. State, 109 Ind. 217, 9 N. E. 774; Indianapolis & C. Gravel Road Co. v. State, 105 Ind. 37, 4 N. E. 316; Burlington v. Palmer, 67 Iowa, 681, 25 N. W. 877; Hedge v. Des Moines, 141 Iowa, 4, 119 N. W. 276; Whiting v. Boston, 106 Mass. 89; Mack v. Cincinnati, 7 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 49.

And in Pittsburgh v. Harrison, 91 Pa. 206, it was held that a property owner has no set-off against the city claim for an assessment for improvements, and that in a suit for such assessment the equities between the owner and contractor cannot be adjusted.

But in Bodley v. Finley, 111 Ky. 618, 64 S. W. 439, it was held that a set-off or counterclaim for damages caused in making a street improvement may be pleaded against the claim of a contractor for the cost of the improvement, although the governmental power of taxation was exercised in favor of the contractor by the assessment of the cost and the giving of a statutory lien for enforcement of the claim, the decision being upon the ground that the claim is not one by the government or by the municipality.

And in Frankfort v. Brislan, 126 Ky. 477, 104 S. W. 311, where the action was brought by the city, it was expressly held that damages to the property could be set up as a counterclaim in an action to enforce a lien for the improvements.

And in Kansas use of Coates v. Ridenour, 84 Mo. 253, where the statutes gave the contractor a certified tax bill against the improved property, with power to enforce same in the name of the city by ordinary process of law, it was held that the owner could set off a debt due himself from the owner of the tax bill, it being said that such case differed from that of a tax for general purposes, in that the interests of the public ended as soon as the tax bills were delivered.

sustained by reason of the failure to furnish the requisite number of convicts specified in the contract.

It is clear that the defendant had no right to hold and continue to work the convicts under the contract after the specified date of expiration. The fact that the state had failed to furnish the stipulated number of convicts did not serve to extend the period of the contract, for the contract was primarily one to provide for the convicts during a given period of time, and not merely to contract away the labor of the convicts like chattels or slaves. The specified period was therefore of the essence of the contract, and could not have been extended, except by making a new contract in the manner provided by statute.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

WARREN F. BLEECKER, Plff. in Err.,
v.

COLORADO & SOUTHERN RAILWAY

(— Colo. —, 114 Pac. 481.)

Carrier — insults by conductor — mental suffering — liability.

1. A carrier is answerable in damages for

Note. — Liability of carrier for mental suffering of passenger from mere verbal abuse, unaccompanied by other breach of duty.

The earlier cases upon this question are collected in a note appended to St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Taylor, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 159.

It is shown in that note that a large majority of the cases have adopted the rule which is followed in BLEECKER v. COLORADO & S. R. Co., that mental suffering resulting from verbal abuse of a passenger by the carrier's employee is sufficient to sustain an action without being accompanied by any other breach of duty.

This rule is further supported by Georgia S. & F. R. Co. v. Ransom, 8 Ga. App. 277, 68 S. E. 943, in which a verdict for such injury was set aside as being excessive under the circumstances, the right to recover some damage not being denied.

And by Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Fitzgerald, — Miss. —, 50 So. 631, in which both compensatory and punitive damages were allowed for the use, by a conductor, of insulting language in a dispute over the validity of mileage offered by the passenger.

The doctrine that verbal abuse unaccompanied by other breach of duty will not support an action for damages is sustained by two additional cases, — Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Moss, 89 Ark. 187, 116 S. W. 192, and Pierce v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 94 Ark. 489, 127 S. W. 707, — which 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

mental suffering inflicted upon a passenger by insulting language addressed to him by the conductor without provocation, which is of a character calculated to humiliate, mortify, and disgrace him.

Same — authorization or ratification — necessity.

2. A carrier cannot escape liability for insults addressed by its conductor to a passenger, on the ground that it did not authorize or ratify them.

ERROR to the District Court for Boulder County to review a judgment dismissing the complaint on demurrer in a suit to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the use of insulting language by defendant's servant to plaintiff while a passenger on its train. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. R. Morrison, for plaintiff in error:

A carrier is liable absolutely as an insurer for the protection of the passenger against assaults and insults at the hands of its own servants.

In the latter case the court said: "We prefer to adhere to the rule, as a sound one, that mental suffering alone, unaccompanied with physical injury or any other element of recoverable damages, cannot be made the subject of an independent action for damages;" and in Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Moss, the expression, "any other element of damages," was explained and qualified by pointing out that by it was meant only some element of damage so closely connected with the mental injury that both must be considered because of the difficulty of separating them, such as duress without actual physical restraint or force; and that it was not intended to permit mental suffering to be attached to any disconnected recoverable element of damages. For instance, in the Moss Case the abusive and insulting language was used by the conductor in refusing to put off the passenger's baggage at his destination, and it was held that the injury resulting from the failure to put off the baggage could not be connected with and made the basis for recovery of damages for the mental suffering caused by the abusive language.

Messrs. P. H. Holme and R. H. Widdicombe also for defendant in error.

Gabbert, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff in error brought suit against defendant in error to recover damages claimed to have been sustained as the result of the alleged use, by one of the employees of defendant, of insulting language and remarks directed to and of and concerning plaintiff. The complaint as originally filed and amended alleged that defendant was a common carrier, carrying passengers for hire between the city of Boulder and the city of Colorado Springs, in this state; that plaintiff purchased from defendant a ticket good for transportation between these points; that he became a passenger on one of the defendant's trains upon which he was entitled to ride by the terms of that ticket. It is then alleged that while plaintiff was a passenger on such train, and conducting himself in all respects with propriety, he "was grossly, repeatedly, wilfully, and maliciously insulted, in loud, profane, and indecent language, containing threats, insults, and abuse, by an agent and servant of the defendant company, to wit, by the conductor in charge of said train, while in the act of collecting said ticket from this plaintiff, in the presence of a large number of his fellow passengers; and held up in ridicule, humiliation, and disgrace; that said insults, threats, and indecent language used by the said conductor towards this plaintiff consisted of gruff demands upon the plaintiff that he should bring to the conductor, in the front part of the car, the tickets held by the plaintiff for himself and party, and that, if plaintiff did not bring to the conductor the tickets held by the plaintiff, he would put the plaintiff and his party off the train; that when the plaintiff herein refused to bring to the conductor the tickets, and after he had told the conductor that he, the plaintiff, had the tickets, and would give them to the conductor when the conductor came for them, said conductor further insulted the plaintiff by saying to him that he, the plaintiff, had been used to having people get down on their knees to him, by asking him why he did not act like a gentleman when he was asked to do anything, instead of acting like a damn little cur, by saying to the plaintiff that he was not a gentleman, that he was nothing but a cur, and by other gruff, rude, and humiliating remarks to and of this plaintiff; that on the whole of said trip, and when the said insults were given, the plaintiff was, and ever since hitherto, and still is, a teacher in the State Preparatory School at the county of Boulder aforesaid, and was on said trip accompanied by a large number of the students of said institution, some of them being under his own tuition at said institution, he having charge of said students on said trip, and all of them being present and necessarily hearing and observing the language used and the insults and abuse given, all of which tended to the greater pain, mortification, and humiliation of the plaintiff, from the fact that the abuse and insults were in the presence of those whom he daily met and associated with, and tended to lessen the respect with which he should be by said students regarded; that by reason of the premises, and of such language, insults, and abuse, plaintiff necessarily and in fact suffered great mental pain and mortification, to his damage in the sum of $5,000." To this complaint the defendant interposed a general demurrer, which was sustained. Plaintiff elected to stand by his complaint, and his action was dismissed. From this judgment, plaintiff has brought the case here for review on error.

The sole question presented is whether the complaint states a cause of action. In determining this question, the proposition is: Can a passenger lawfully upon a railroad train, conducting himself with propriety, recover damages from the railroad company for mental suffering caused by insulting language of the conductor of the train, directed to and of and concerning the passenger, of a character calculated to humiliate, mortify, and disgrace him? The contract of carriage, as evidenced by a railroad ticket, not only requires the carrier to exercise legal care in conveying the passenger to his agreed destination, but, in addition, the law imposes upon the carrier the obligation to absolutely protect the passenger against the misconduct of those employed to execute such contract. In other words, the contract evidenced by such ticket not only calls for safe carriage, but for respectful and decorous treatment at the hands of the employees of the carrier acting within the general scope of their employment. Thomp. Neg. §§ 3185, 3186; New Jersey S. B. Co. v. Brockett, 121 U. S. 637, 30 L. ed. 1049, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1039. Unquestionably, then, it is the duty of a railroad company to protect a passenger against insult from the conductor of the train upon which the passenger is lawfully riding; and, this being so, the unprovoked use by the conductor to the passenger of opprobrious words and abusive language, tending to humiliate or subject him to mortification, gives him a right of action against the company for compensatory damages. *Cole v. Counsel for defendant contend that "mental suffering alone, unaccompanied by physical injury or any other element of recoverable damages, cannot be made the subject of an independent action for damages." In some of the cases above cited, elements of damage other than insulting language were present; but the decisions did not turn on this feature. In some of these cases it is expressly held that insulting language of a character calculated to humiliate and mortify was sufficient. This is particularly true of Texas & P. R. Co. v. Tarkington, an action for damages for insulting language alone, which it was held could be maintained even though the language employed was not actionable per se;

it being sufficient to give a right of action when it was insulting and calculated to humiliate and mortify. Such, in effect, is the holding in Davis v. Tacoma R. & P. Co. That words used were of themselves defamatory would be proper, however, to consider on the question of damages. It should be borne in mind that actions of the character under consideration, based upon insulting language alone, are not for defamation, but for behavior on the part of the employees of the carrier in violation of the express terms of its contract. There are authorities cited by counsel for defendant which support their contention; but we shall not undertake to analyze them, or point out wherein they may be, or are, distinguishable from the case at bar. Some of them are based upon the theory that an action for wrongful conduct of the conductor in the particulars involved is one of tort; others, that an action will not lie against the railroad company for such conduct unless the conductor would also be responsible, which would not be the case where language employed was not actionable per se; while others are based upon the ground that mental suffering, unaccompanied by physical injury or some other element of recoverable damages, is not regarded as sufficient upon which to maintain an action for damages, for the reason that it is too remote, uncertain, and difficult of ascertainment. The cases holding that, upon one or other of these grounds, the passenger is without remedy against the railroad company for insulting language used by the conductor, fail to give sufficient consideration to the proposition that a passenger holding a ticket which entitles him to transportation by means of the train he is on is not there by sufferance, but by right; that a railroad company is a common carrier, upon which is imposed certain duties and obligations to passengers by operation of law; that the relation between carrier and passenger is contractual; that, independent of the terms of the ticket purchased by the passenger, the law imposes upon the carrier, as part of the agreement of carriage, respectful, decent, and decorous treatment at the hands of those intrusted with the execution of its contract; that the unprovoked use of opprobrious and insulting language by a conductor to a passenger is a breach of that contract; that the carrier selects the conductor and intrusts him with the fulfillment of its contract of carriage, and should, therefore, be responsible for his conduct; that passengers are peculiarly under the control of the conductor, and are practically helpless when compelled to defend themselves against his abuse; that, while it is true that damages resulting from mental suffering caused by the use of insulting language by a conductor to a passenger are difficult of ascertainment, the same is true, in a greater or less degree, in all actions brought to recover unliquidated damages; that for a breach of contract there should be a remedy; and that, unless the carrier is held responsible for the act of the conductor in using opprobrious and insulting language to a passenger conducting himself properly, the latter is practically without a remedy.

For a breach of the contract of carriage as the result of a conductor assaulting a passenger without provocation, the authorities are practically unanimous in holding that for insulting language used in connection with the assault, damages for mental suffering caused thereby may be recovered. If damages are recoverable for a breach of the contract in one instance, there is no good reason why a breach of such contract as the result of using insulting language should not give a right of action independent of other acts which may constitute a breach. Wounding a man's feelings by the use of opprobrious language in circumstances constituting a breach of the contract of carriage is as much actual damages as assaulting him. The difference is that by the breach in one instance mental suffering only is caused, while in the other it is physical; but this is the result of the difference in the means employed in committing an injury which constitutes a breach of the contract between the carrier and the passenger. To deny the passenger a remedy where, without justification, the conductor assails him with abusive and insulting language, would, in effect, abrogate an important element of the contract of carriage, render it a nullity, and permit the carrier to violate it with impunity. That a new field of litigation may be opened, where the damages claimed will be difficult of ascertainment, is not a reason why the carrier should be relieved from fulfilling its contract for decorous and respectful treatment of its passengers. In the case of St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Taylor, 84 Ark. 42, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 159, 104 S. W. 551, in which the majority of the court held that mental suffering alone, unaccompanied by physical injury or other element of recoverable damages, cannot be made the subject of independent action against a carrier for damages, Mr. Justice Wood, in dissenting from this conclusion, aptly remarked: "We are utterly unable to appreciate the fine distinctions necessary to be made in order to allow damages for mental anguish in cases of breach of contract, where there has been a physical injury, however slight, produced by the wilful and malicious act of the employee or carrier, and yet to deny them where there has been no physical injury, but where the only injury is mental suffering. According to the rule announced, the weight of the finger laid on in anger, or any other frivolous assault, will let in all the damages for mental anguish, while if there is no such trivial physical injury, there can be no recovery for the mental agony, although that may be of the most intense, humiliating, and crushing character. I will not indulge a figment of the imagination or fiction of the law that will enable common carriers of passengers to violate the plain terms of their contract, and yet leave their passengers remediless."

One of the early cases on the subject of damages for mental suffering caused by offensive conduct, but not involving physical injury, is Chamberlain v. Chandler, 3 Mason, 242, Fed. Cas. No. 2,575, decided by Mr. Justice Story, in 1823, then an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. The action was by passengers against the master of a ship for what appears to have been extremely unseemly conduct on the part of the master, in the way of obscenity, harsh threats, and immodest demeanor towards the passengers, although no physical violence was committed. In speaking of the duties of the master, the learned judge said: "In respect to passengers, the case of the master is one of peculiar responsibility and delicacy. Their contract with him is not for mere ship room and personal existence on board, but for reasonable food, comforts, necessities, and kindness. It is a stipulation, not for toleration merely, but for respectful treatment." Then, after reciting the facts upon which the cause of action was based, being, as we have said, unseemly conduct only, he proceeded to consider the proposition as to whether an action would lie in the absence of physical violence, regarding which he said: "It is intimated that all these acts, though wrong in morals, are yet acts which the law does not punish; that if the person is untouched, if the acts do not amount to an assault and battery, they are not to be redressed. The law looks on them as unworthy of cognizance. The master is at liberty to inflict the most severe mental sufferings in the most tyrannical manner, and yet, if he withholds a blow, the victim may be crushed by his unkindness. He commits nothing within the reach of civil jurisprudence. My opinion is that the law involves no such absurdity. It is rational and just. It gives compensation for mental sufferings occasioned by acts of wanton injustice, equally, whether they operate by way of direct or of consequential injuries. In each case the contract of the passengers for the voyage is, in substance, violated, and the wrong is to be redressed as a cause of damage."

It is also suggested by counsel for defendant that the complaint is insufficient for the reason that it is not alleged the defendant instructed its conductor in advance to act towards plaintiff in the manner asserted, nor that the defendant afterwards ratified these acts. The position is not tenable. It is well settled that in all cases where the master owes a contractual duty to third persons, he cannot shirk or evade it by committing its performance to another, but is bound to perform the duty, and is liable for a failure to do it in any respect whereby injury results to another, whether such failure results from negligence or from the improper conduct of the agent to whom the duty is committed. Being bound to do the act or perform the duty, if he does it by another, the master is treated as having done it himself, and the fact that his agent acted contrary to his instructions, without his consent, or that he did not subsequently ratify the wrongful act, does not excuse him. Diamond Rubber Co. v. Harryman, 41 Colo. 415, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 775, 92 Pac. 922, is cited by counsel for defendant in support of their contention that a cause of action is not stated in the complaint. That case is entirely different from the one at bar. The relation between the parties is not the same, and the mental suffering, for which it was said damages were not recoverable, relates to circumstances in nowise similar to the case under consideration.

We conclude that the use by a conductor, to a passenger lawfully upon a train, and conducting himself with propriety, of language calculated to humiliate, mortify, or disgrace the passenger, gives the passenger a right of action against the railroad company for compensatory damages for the mental pain thus occasioned. The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

Campbell, Ch. J., and Hill, J., concur.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Gabbert, J., on April 3, 1911, handed down the following additional opinion:

The petition for rehearing is based upon the ground that damages for mental suffering, unaccompanied by physical injury or any other element of recoverable damages, cannot be made the subject of an independent action for damages. This question is the vital one in the case, and we held that the complaint stated a cause of action upon the ground that for a wilful breach of the contract of carriage, as alleged in the complaint, damages were recoverable for the mental suffering thus occasioned. No reason is now advanced in support of the petition for rehearing that was not urged upon our attention in the briefs and on oral argument at the original hearing.

We must concede, of course, that there are authorities sustaining the contention of counsel for the railroad company; but there are also cases sustaining our conclusion. We think the latter are the more logical. When there is a wilful, tortious breach of the contract of carriage by those engaged in serving the public, it is certainly illogical to say that the person whose rights are thus infringed is without remedy for mental suffering thus caused, unless such breach is accompanied by some other element of damage. Such a conclusion would permit railroad companies to violate one of the most important elements of such contract; render it a nullity, and leave the passenger without remedy. Many cases are cited by counsel in the brief in support of the petition for rehearing; but, outside of those directly in point, they are in the main distinguishable from the case at bar. Take, for instance, our own decisions on the measure of damages in an action under § 1509, Mills's Annotated Statutes. Damages for mental suffering caused by grief are not recoverable; but this conclusion is based upon the ground that damages recoverable by the statute are limited to the net pecuniary benefit which the plaintiff might reasonably have expected to receive from the deceased.

The remaining cases cited, which hold that damages are not recoverable for mental suffering alone, are distinguishable from the one at bar in that they relate to cases brought under a statute not similar to our own, or where contractual relations did not exist between the parties, or where there was a mere passive breach of a contract,—that is to say, if there had been a violation of the contract, it was not occasioned by wilful, tortious conduct,—or where for simple negligence, or where the mental suffering was not the direct result of a tort, but remote; or the defendant was not engaged in a business quasi public. It may be true that cases like the one at bar should be reached by some statutory action on the part of the legislature; but until such a remedy is supplied, we have no right to withhold the remedy which the law now affords. Should excessive damages be awarded by a jury in a given case, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the trial court, or this court on review, can and should set aside such a verdict.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

A. W. SCHENBERGER

v.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY,
App't.

Interstate commerce — quoting rate — mistake — liability.

The plaintiff made inquiry at the defendant's station at Wakefield, Kansas, for the freight rate on wheat in carload lots from Wakefield to New Braunfels, Texas, and told the agent that this information was desired in order to fix the price to a customer at New Braunfels. In answer to the inquiry, the plaintiff was informed that the rate was 31 cents per hundredweight. Relying upon this information the plaintiff fixed the price, and sold two carloads of wheat and shipped it over the defendant's line to New Braunfels, when an additional charge of 12½ cents per hundredweight was made and collected, making 43½ cents per hundredweight on the shipment, which was the regular tariff rate on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The mistake in quoting the rate was unintentional, and not fraudulent. It is held that the provisions of the interstate commerce act govern the transaction, and that the plaintiff cannot recover.

Note. — Right of shipper where carrier negligently misquotes rate which has been filed or published as required by statute.

As to the effect of provisions of the interstate commerce act against rebates upon contracts prescribing rates less than those established in accordance with the act, see note to Armour Packing Co. v. United States, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 400, from which it appears to be the "general, though not universal, rule, that agreements for the transportation of goods by railroad at less than the established rates will be held invalid because in violation of the interstate commerce act, regardless of how the less rate came to be made, or the grounds upon which it is sought to enforce the contract therefor."

And the same rule seems to obtain in the case of contracts prescribing rates less than those established in accordance with state

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Clay County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been suffered by him by reason of the false and fraudulent statement of defendant's agent as to the rate for an interstate shipment of wheat. Reversed.

statutes. Central R. Co. v. Willingham, 8 Ga. App. 817, 70 S. E. 199; New York C. & H. R. Co. v. Smith, 62 Misc. 526, 115 N. Y. Supp. 838.

Upon the precise question involved in SCHENBERGER v. UNION P. R. Co., and which it is the purpose of this note to consider, as to the liability of a carrier for a mistake in quoting a rate, upon the ground of negligence, where the shipper, without relying upon any contract for a lower rate, pays the duly established rate for transportation, but thereby suffers loss by reason of having previously acted in reliance upon the lower rate quoted, few cases have arisen; but the rights of the shipper in such cases seem to be determined upon the same consideration as his rights under a contract for a lower rate than allowed, and it seems well settled that he cannot recover, as damages for the loss suffered, the difference between the rate which he pays and the rate as negligently misquoted, upon the basis of which he may have bought and sold the commodity shipped.

Thus, in A. J. Poor Grain Co. v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 12 Inters. Com. Rep. 418, rehearing denied in 12 Inters. Com. Rep. 469, the Interstate Commerce Commission said: "The question of the liability of carriers for the mistakes of their agents in quoting freight rates to shippers seems not to be open to further discussion. . . . While shippers rely largely upon the rates 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Benson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the false and fraudulent statements of its freight agents that the rate for the transportation of wheat in carload lots from Wakefield, Kansas, to New Braunfels, Texas, was 31 cents per hundredweight, when in fact the regular rate was 43½ cents per hundredweight, whereby the plaintiff suffered damages in the sum of $150.25, being the difference between the rate quoted and the regular rate charged upon two cars of wheat sold and shipped in reliance upon the truth of the statement of the defendant's agent that the rate was 31 cents per hundredweight. The case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that the plaintiff inquired of the defendant's agent at Wakefield, Kansas, for the freight rate on wheat in carload lots from that station to New Braunfels, Texas, and informed the agent that he desired to know the rate in order to fix the price of wheat which he had an opportunity to sell at New Braunfels. The agent said that he could not give the rate, but would obtain it. Shortly afterwards the agent received a letter from a general freight agent of the company advising him that the rate inquired about was 31 cents per hundredweight, and so stated to the plaintiff. Re-quoted by freight agents and billing clerks, the law charges them with knowledge of the lawful rates. And they will not be heard before this Commission to claim the benefit of a lower than the lawful rate on the ground that some railroad clerk has made a mistake in quoting a lower rate for a particular shipment. To permit shippers to impute negligence to carriers in quoting rates, and on that ground to enjoy the rate quoted instead of paying the lawfully published rate, would open a broad and ample way for the payment of rebates, and for other unlawful practices, and might, in its practical results, work a repeal of the essential feature of this legislation." It was accordingly held that where a grain dealer desiring to purchase wheat at points along the line of a certain railroad, for shipment to and sale at certain points in other states, inquired of the carrier's freight agents as to the rate between such points, and the agents negligently quoted a rate lower than the rate duly published in accordance with the interstate commerce act, and the dealer purchased and sold wheat on the basis of the quoted rate, he cannot recover against the carrier, on the ground of the negligence of its agents in misquoting the rates, the loss caused him by his having to pay a higher rate than that on the basis of which he purchased and sold.

So, in Forster Bros. Co. v. Duluth, South Shore & A. R. Co. 14 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, lying upon the information so obtained, the plaintiff fixed the price to his customer and sold to him two carloads of wheat, which were then shipped over the defendant's line to New Braunfels, and the plaintiff paid or offered to pay the rate named, viz., 31 cents per hundredweight. When the wheat arrived at the place of destination, an additional charge of 12½ cents per hundredweight was made and collected, making 43½ cents per hundredweight on the shipment, which was the correct rate on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission, being 12½ cents from Wakefield to Kansas City, and 31 cents from Kansas City to New Braunfels. The mistake in quoting the rate was unintentional, and was made without fraudulent intent. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff as prayed for, and the defendant appeals.

The defendant relies upon the provisions of the interstate commerce act; its tariffs of freight rates between the places named having been filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was held in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. New Era Mill. R. Co. 80 Kan. 141, 101 Pac. 1011, and in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Superior Ref. Co. 83 Kan. 732, 112 Pac. 604, that the schedule of rates published and filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission must govern. Any claim that such rate is unjust must be presented to that tribunal.

where it appeared that a shipper had assembled certain property at certain stations for shipment, in reliance upon information had from representatives of the carrier as to the rate to be applied on such shipments, and that subsequently he was notified that this rate did not apply, the Commission said: "It is unfortunate that shippers should be misled to their injury by erroneous information furnished by representatives of carriers as to the rate in effect. It is, of course, the duty of carriers' agents to furnish correct information as to the proper application of the lawful established rates. However, the law requires that tariffs shall be open to public inspection, and therefore shippers are themselves charged with notice of the rate lawfully applicable. The Commission cannot consider an erroneous rate quotation made by an agent of a carrier as the basis for an award of reparation to a shipper who thereby suffers damage. Collusion between the carrier and a shipper which it desired to favor, for protection of other than the tariff rates, would be rendered too easy of accomplishment."

And in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mugg, 202 U. S. 242, 50 L. ed. 1011, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 628, it was held, reversing 98 Tex. 352, 107 Am. St. Rep. 633, 83 S. W. 800, that where a carrier has negligently made and quoted to a shipper rates on interstate shipments of coal, upon which he has relied in contracting for the coal, and has sold at

This is not disputed by the plaintiff, but it is insisted that the claim is not based upon a contract for less than the regular schedule rates, but upon a misrepresentation of such rates, and that the interstate commerce act does not relieve a carrier from damages caused by its negligence and false representations in such matters, and that the action is not upon contract, but in tort. Can the plaintiff recover damages for a misrepresentation of the rate when he could not have recovered upon an express agreement for that rate? It is not necessary to inquire into the purposes and scope of the interstate commerce act. They have been elaborately considered and stated in decisions of the Federal Supreme Court. The interpretation of the law by that tribunal appears to be decisive of this controversy. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hefley, 158 U. S. 98, 39 L. ed. 910, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 802; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mugg, 202 U. S. 242, 50 L. ed. 1011, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 628; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co. 204 U. S. 426, 51 L. ed. 553, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1075; Armour Packing Co. v. United States, 209 U. S. 56, 52 L. ed. 681, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 428.

In the Mugg Case the action was to recover damages by reason of negligence in the misquotation of the rates for carrying coal on an interstate shipment, on which rates the plaintiff in that suit had relied, prices based on such rates, which were lower than the rates which had been duly published, printed, and posted, as required by the interstate commerce act, and the carrier, as required by the act, collects the prescribed rates, the shipper cannot recover against the carrier for damages occasioned by its misrepresentation of the rate.

Somewhat similarly, one who has contracted with a carrier for an interstate shipment at a rate lower than that shown by the schedules filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission in compliance with the interstate commerce law, which lower rate was inserted in the bill of lading by mistake, cannot obtain possession of the goods from the carrier without payment of the correct schedule rate. Gerber v. Wabash R. Co. 63 Mo. App. 145.

But in Atlanta, K. & N. R. Co. v. Horne, 106 Tenn. 73, 59 S. W. 134, it was held that where an initial carrier has negligently misquoted a through rate on an interstate shipment, approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the shipper is entitled to a delivery of the goods from the connecting carrier at the point of destination upon payment or tender of the rate quoted, in the absence of proof by the latter carrier that it has published the approved rate in the manner directed by the Commission, so as to bring it to the attention of the public.

and had sold the coal at a price based on the rate so given. The carrier collected freight charges according to the established rate as filed. The shipper sued, expressly alleging negligence in giving the rate as his ground of action. The supreme court of Texas ordered judgment for the plaintiff, but this was reversed, and it was held that, under the interpretation of the interstate commerce act by earlier decisions of the court, then reviewed and followed, there could be no recovery.

It was held in the case of the Armour Packing Company, in a prosecution for rebating, that, although a contract for carriage of goods at a stipulated rate was valid when made, being the same as the tariff rate, yet it was a violation of the law to carry the goods at that rate after it had been superseded by a higher one, made and filed as provided in the interstate commerce act. The court said that "neither shipper nor carrier may vary from the duly filed and published rate without incurring the penalty of the law." Referring to the effect of the decision upon contracts for future delivery, the court said (209 U. S. at page 81): "It may be, as urged by petitioner, that this construction renders impossible the making of contracts for the future delivery of such merchandise as the petitioner deals in, and that the instability of the rate introduces a factor of uncertainty, destructive of contract rights heretofore enjoyed in such property. This feature of the law, it is insisted, puts the shipper in many kinds of trade at the mercy of the carrier, who may arbitrarily change a rate upon the faith of which contracts have been entered into. But the right to make such regulations is inherent in the power of Congress to legislate respecting interstate commerce, and such considerations of inconvenience or hardship address themselves to the lawmaking branch of the government."

The judgment is reversed, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant upon the agreed statement of facts.

Johnston, Ch. J., and Burch, Mason, Smith, and Porter, JJ., concurring:

West, J., dissenting:

But for national legislation this action could be maintained. Such legislation has declared that all questions involving the propriety of an interstate rate must be presented to a Federal tribunal. But has it in terms or by intendment prohibited the recovery of damages for loss on a shipment caused by a negligent misquotation of the tariff rate? True, it happens in this case that the damages asked equal the difference between the quoted and the tariff rates, but it is not sought either in terms or in fact to recover such damages as a difference, but to recover for a loss on the wheat shipped, caused by the careless misquotation of the rate. Had the prayer of the petition been broader and the evidence sufficient, the allegations would support a verdict for punitive damages in an ordinary common-law action. Recovery was not sought upon any contract, or for the breach of any contract, for it is conceded that the law forbade a contract of shipment at the quoted rate. There was no payment of the tariff rate under protest; no attempt to clear the shipment of the carrier's lien; no complaint as to the legality or propriety of the tariff rate which was paid. Does the Mugg Case control? That action was begun in justice court where one is not held to orthodox strictness in pleading, but it sought to recover damages caused by reason of a misquotation, and by being forced to pay and paying the full rate under protest in order to obtain and deliver the coal. The bill alleged: "That plaintiffs' loss and damage in the sum aforesaid were occasioned by defendant's negligence in making and quoting to plaintiffs the said rates, on which rate quoted defendant knew plaintiffs relied and based their sales of the said three cars of coal shipped and sold thereafter, and then forcing plaintiffs to pay a greater rate, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $140.18 on said three cars of coal, thereby causing plaintiffs' loss and damage in the said sum." The Mugg Case was not argued in Supreme Court for the plaintiff, and the decision merely and only adopts and applies that in the Hefley Case, and holds that it (the Mugg Case) is ruled thereby. The Hefley Case by the Mugg decision is expressly given this effect, and this only so far as applicable here: "The clear effect of the decision was to declare that one who has obtained from a common carrier transportation of goods from one state to another, at a rate specified in the bill of lading less than the published schedule rates filed with and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in force at the time, whether or not he knew that the rate obtained was less than the schedule rate, is not entitled to recover the goods, or damages for their detention, upon the tender of payment of the amount of charges named in the bill of lading, or of any sum less than the schedule charges; in other words, that whatever may be the rate agreed upon, the carrier's lien on the goods is, by force of the act of Congress, for the amount fixed by the published schedule of rates and charges, and this lien can be discharged, and the consignee can become entitled to the goods, only by the payment or tender of payment of such amount."

The object of the legislation in question is to prevent favoritism and discrimination, and to bind shipper and carrier alike by the schedule rate, but it is not apparent that its further object is to bar action for damages caused by negligent misquotation. It is suggested that to permit recovery would in effect give the shipper transportation at less than the tariff rate. Logically this may be true in a sense, but it is not legally true, for he has already paid the full rate, and makes no complaint whatever concerning it. He is not seeking to recover back because wrongfully extorted, but, having obeyed the law by paying the legal rate without protest, he now seeks to recoup his loss on the wheat which the negligent misquotation caused. He was careful and inquired the rate, stating that it would be his selling basis. Had it been correctly given he would not have lost; and because of this loss, caused by this carelessness, he sues. It is no previously planned scheme to circumvent the national law, but a bona fide attempt to make good for an actual loss suffered while obeying that very law. He is not complaining that he paid or had to pay the full rate, or seeking to recover any portion of it back, but he is complaining that his proper obedience to the law still left him damaged by the carrier's negligence. Congress evidently intended that both shipper and carrier should know the rate, and the latter is required to keep it posted so the shipper may know it. Not having done so, it was proper for the shipper to apply to the proper source for information, and under the circumstances it seems but common sense and common fairness to say that he had a right to rely thereon, provided such relying in no way involved an infraction of the law; and no decision thus far found makes it clear that, having complied with the Federal statutes, he is restricted to a complaint under or concerning them in a national tribunal. His recovery cannot be construed into a judicial invitation to bring similar actions, for we must presume that only in rare instances will such circumstances arise, but if they should, that is no reason why redress should be denied.

Finally, it is urged that § 9 of the act of Feb. 4, 1887, chap. 104, 24 Stat. at L. 382, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3159, withholds jurisdiction from state courts. This section provides that one claiming to be damaged by any common carrier may either make complaint to the Interstate Commerce Commission or sue in any district or circuit court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, but he may not do both. But 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the preceding section provides that for any act wilfully done or omitted, in violation of the statute in question, the party damaged may recover the full amount of damages sustained, together with a reasonable counsel or attorneys' fee, and that the two sections together show that it is for such damages only that one must resort to the Federal tribunals. Nothing in the entire act makes the negligent but unintentional quotation of a rate unlawful; only the wilful violation being penalized.

Finding nothing in the statutes or in the decisions prohibiting the maintenance of this action, I believe the judgment should be affirmed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

CITY AND COUNTY OF DENVER et al.,
Plffs. in Err.,

v.

STATE INVESTMENT COMPANY et al.

Tax — special assessment — hearing — necessity of power to afford relief.

1. The hearing required by the constitutional provision for due process of law is not afforded by a municipality to which is delegated power to assess the cost of public improvements on property benefited thereby, where the body charged with the duty of conducting the hearing receives written protests and hears oral arguments, but refuses to take testimony, on the theory that it has no power to afford relief.

Same — lien — setting aside assessment — effect.

2. The lien upon property for the cost of a public improvement falls with the setting aside of the assessment for invalidity.

Same — illegal assessment — suit to attack — tender.

3. One is not bound to make a tender of any amount as a condition of instituting a suit to set aside an assessment for a public improvement, which is invalid in toto.

Same — tax not due — effect.

4. Tender of a portion of an assessment for a public improvement is not a prerequisite to the institution of a suit to set it aside for illegality, if no part of the assessment is due and payable when the suit is instituted.

White, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendants in error, as plaintiffs in the district court, prosecuted a suit against plaintiffs in error, as defendants, to relieve lands owned by the former from the assessment of a tax for the cost of paving a street upon which the lands abutted, in Colfax avenue paving district No. 3, in the city of Denver. The tax or assessment was imposed, or the attempt thereto made, under the law known as the 1893 charter of the city of Denver. The provisions of the charter regulating the exercise of the power, and the procedure thereunder essential to a valid assessment, are sufficiently set forth in Londoner v. Denver, 210 U. S. 373, 52 L. ed. 1103, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 708, and it is unnecessary to embody them herein.

Upon the trial of the cause it was admitted, or the undisputed evidence showed, each plaintiff to be the owner of a lot, or fractional part thereof, abutting upon the street paved; that the paving tax assessed on each of these lots was from two to five times the value of the lot, including the improvement, and from six to fourteen times the value of the special benefit. The court found and decreed that the assessment exceeded the special benefits to the respective lands or lots of plaintiffs, fixed the amount of the benefit as to each tract, and, after the same had been paid into court, canceled the balance of the assessment, and relieved the lots of the lien. To reverse that judgment, the defendants have brought the controversy here.

The principal contention of plaintiffs as to the invalidity of the tax assessment was (1) that the charter under which the improvements were made contained no adequate provisions for hearing and determining the objections of property owners to the assessments for public improvements, before the board of public works or the city council; (2) that there was in fact no notice to the property owners of a time for hearing, or hearing had upon their objections in writing properly made to such assessments; (3) that the assessments made against the property of the respective plaintiffs exceeded the special benefits thereto accruing from the paving, and to the extent of such excess the assessments were invalid.

The defendants contend (1) that the hearings provided for by the charter, either expressly or by implication, were adequate, and, if the procedure was followed, were in accordance with due process of law; (2) that plaintiffs had adequate notice and hearings in all matters of which complaint was made; (3) that the plaintiffs failed to make a tender, before the bringing of the suit, of an amount which, in their judgment, equaled the special benefits to their respective properties by reason of the pavement, and are therefore precluded from questioning the validity of any portion of such assessments.

1. That the charter under which the assessments were made contained, either expressly or by implication, adequate provisions for the hearing and determination of the objections interposed by the property owners to the proposed assessments, and in all respects complied with the constitutional requirements and the principles embodied in what is called "due process of law," has been heretofore determined by this court, and approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, as appears from the authorities herein cited.

Under the charter the lien upon the abutting land for the cost of the improvement is initiated by, and finds its support in, the assessment. Before the assessment can be legally fixed, the cost of the work and its provisional apportionment must be certified to the city council, and the landowners affected be afforded an opportunity to be heard before the city council, sitting as a board of equalization, upon the validity and amount of the assessment. Not only must the property owners, as required by statute, be given a notice, and have time in which to file complaints and objections to the proposed assessment, but, under the implied power vested in the city by the charter, the city authorities must fix the specific time for hearing and give notice thereof, or in some proper way afford the property owners the opportunity to be heard, and likewise "hear the parties complaining, and such testimony as they may offer in support of their complaints and objections as would be competent and relevant." Denver v. Dumars, 33 Colo. 94, 80 Pac. 114; Denver v. Kennedy, 33 Colo. 80, 80 Pac. 122, 467; Denver v. Londoner, 33 Colo. 104, 80 Pac. 117; Londoner v. Denver, 210 U. S. 373, 52 L. ed. 1103, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 708.

2. In the case at bar, after the paving was completed, a statement of the cost thereof, and an apportionment of it to the lots or land abutting upon the street, was certified to the city clerk, who thereupon, in compliance with the provisions of the charter, published a notice to the effect that the written complaints or objections of the owners, if any, should be filed within thirty days, and that before the passage of an ordinance assessing the costs of said improvements, "the city council, sitting as a board of equalization, shall hear and determine all such complaints and objections." This notice complied with the express statutory requirements, but it is not so certain that it fixed the time for hearing with any certainty, and therefore probably failed in one of the essential requirements, without which, or a waiver thereof, no valid assessment could have been made. The city authorities, under the implied powers vested in them by the charter, should have given a notice of the time and place of hearing. The notice given seems to be no different in substance and effect from the notice under consideration in the Londoner Case, supra, and, as therein said, "the notice purported only to fix the time for filing the complaints and objections, and to inform those who should file them that they would be heard before action," and "did not fix the time for hearing."

However, should we be mistaken in our view of the effect of the notice given, and it could be held to properly mean that immediately after the expiration of the thirty days in which objections could be filed, the council, sitting as a board of equalization, would hear and determine such objections, yet the city authorities had no power to impose the lien for the assessment upon the lands benefited, unless the property owners by some act waived their right to have, or actually had, a hearing upon their objections to the assessment.

contemplated by the charter; that, after filing their written complaints and objections to the assessment, they appeared before the city council, sitting as a board of equalization, either in person or by attorney, and orally presented their testimony and views concerning the assessment. As declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Londoner Case, supra: "Many requirements essential in strictly judicial proceedings may be dispensed with in proceedings of this nature." If, after filing their complaints and objections to the assessment, the parties, without further notice, appeared before the tribunal authorized to act, and assuming to exercise the power, and were permitted to present their testimony and other evidence competent and relevant to the matter under consideration, and to support their contentions by argument, it may be, though as to that we do not determine, such procedure was "a hearing within the meaning of the law." The very essence of a hearing, however, is the right, not simply the privilege, "to support one's contention or position by argument, however brief, and if need be by proof, however informal," before a tribunal authorized to act and willing and ready to do so. Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 30 Am. Rep. 239.

We are unable to agree with counsel that plaintiffs appeared and had a hearing. The complaint alleges that without hearing, or opportunity for hearing, though requested, none of the plaintiffs were afforded or given any opportunity to present any testimony or evidence whatsoever; but, on the contrary, the written protests were, without hearing thereon, disregarded, and the confiscatory assessments made without due process of law. A fair interpretation of the evidence seems to support and establish these allegations, and the court in its decrees found "that the allegations of the complaint are, and each of them is, true." A recitation of some of the evidence of the property owners will disclose the nature of the alleged hearing, to wit: "The board of equalization permitted me to talk, as they also did Col. Swallow and possibly one or two other property owners present, but refused to take any testimony, and no testimony under oath or otherwise was taken or hearing had. . . . This permission to talk was granted as a matter of favor, and not as a matter of right. . . . Several members of the board of equalization also spoke," and said "they had no such power (to make any change in the amount of the assessment as fixed by the board of public works), and gave that as a reason for declining to take testimony."

The conclusions most favorable to defendants' contention as to what occurred are that plaintiffs, or some of them, appeared before the council in response to a notice from that body to present in writing any objections or complaints they might have to the assessment, and then and there claimed that the proposed assessment was confiscation of their property; that there was an informal talk or protest made by the plaintiffs, or in their behalf, against the assessment; that the council, from its own membership, appointed a committee to examine the property; that such committee, or some member thereof, made a verbal report to the effect that the lots, including the benefit thereto by the paving, were worth about one half of the amount of the assessment on such lots, respectively, and the council took the position that neither it, nor the members thereof, sitting as a board of equalization, had the power to in any manner change the assessment as certified by the board of public works; that while recognizing it would be just and proper to grant the relief to plaintiffs, the board of equalization and the city council were powerless to act in the premises, as it would invalidate the assessment in the entire district, and there was no reason for hearing evidence thereon. It is certain that such procedure did not constitute a hearing within the meaning of the law. The record discloses that then, and for some time prior thereto, the general impression maintained, and such is said to have been the holding of the nisi prius courts, that the provisions of the charter rendered the city and the city council, as a board of equalization, powerless to do otherwise than assess the entire cost of a public improvement made thereunder upon the property benefited, as directed by the board of public works, without change, and not otherwise. It is clear that it was this mistaken view of the power of the council that prevented that body from hearing evidence and argument, and granting the relief demanded by the plaintiffs.

It was essential, in order to uphold the constitutionality of the assessment provisions of the charter, and the Supreme Court of the United States so held in the Londoner Case, supra, that there be vested in the city council implied power to not only fix the time and place for a hearing and notify the complaining property owners thereof, but likewise implied power vested in such body to alter the apportionment and grant proper relief in the premises.

Unless the law authorizing the assessment, expressly or by implication, provides for notice to the owner of the property to be affected, and gives him an opportunity to be heard at a specified time and place, before a board or tribunal competent and ready to administer proper relief, concerning the correctness of the charge, before it is made conclusive, the constitutional guaranty that no person's property shall be taken without due process of law has been infringed. Brown v. Denver, 7 Colo. 305, 3 Pac. 455. Notice or citation of the time and place for hearing, or possibly a waiver thereof by the property owner, was therefore essential to vest in the council the power to create a valid lien for the cost of the improvement, and it was likewise essential that the hearing be before a tribunal competent to act. The denial to a party in such a case of the right to appear and to be fully heard is, in legal effect, a recall of the citation to him. Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 23 L. ed. 914. And to notice or cite a party to appear, or the appearance of such party, before a tribunal competent to administer proper relief, but which assumes that it does not possess the power,—that though it be commanded by law to hear, it is by the same law rendered deaf to the appeals of justice, and refuses to take evidence and act,—is in no sense affording the party a hearing within the meaning of the charter, and is not a compliance with the constitutional requirement of "due process of law." It is, in effect, saying to a person, "Appear, and you shall be heard," and when he has appeared, saying, "Your appearance shall not be recognized, and you shall not be heard." A judgment, finding, or decree rendered under such circumstances is an arbitrary edict without the sanction of law. As stated by Brannon, in his work on the 14th Amendment, page 251: "Though there be service of process, yet, if the defendant is not allowed to make his defense, it is a withdrawal of the summons, 'a denial of the benefit of a notice, and would in effect be to deny that he was entitled to notice at all, and the sham and deceptive proceeding had better be omitted altogether,' because judgment without hearing is void."

The city council admitted, and the defendants concede, the assessment amounted to confiscation of the property of plaintiffs, and that the owners were entitled to a reduction of the assessment, and the council "stated they would like to remedy it, but did not know how they could do so without themselves violating the charter assessment provisions." It certainly cannot be said that a party has had a hearing when he has been called to appear, or appears, before a tribunal with power to act and grant relief, and which recognizes that such party is entitled to the relief for which he prays, yet disclaims in itself power and authority in the premises, and refuses to hear evidence and act upon the matter. The right to property, and the guaranty that it shall not be taken without due process of law, does not rest upon a basis so unsubstantial.

3. As the lien rests upon the assessment, and the latter, as we have seen, is invalid, the lien must necessarily fall. And as there can be no obligation to pay until there is a legal assessment, the doctrine of tender before suit brought has no application. No one is under obligation to pay, or tender payment, until there be something due. This is not a case where the procedure was lawfully followed, and the authority exceeded by an excessive assessment, but it is a case showing such a departure from the prescribed procedure that the assessment attempted to be made had no validity as against the property of plaintiffs. The language of the court in Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187, is peculiarly applicable to this case. It is there said: "The present case is not one in which—as in most of the cases brought to enjoin the collection of taxes or the enforcement of special assessments, it can be plainly or clearly seen, from the showing made by the pleadings, that a particular amount, if no more, is due from the plaintiff, and which amount should be paid or tendered before equity would interfere. It is rather a case in which the entire assessment is illegal. In such a case it was not necessary to tender, as a condition of relief being granted to the plaintiff, any sum as representing what she supposed, or might guess, or was willing to concede, was the excess of cost over any benefits accruing to the property. She was entitled, without making such a tender, to ask a court of equity to enjoin the enforcement of a rule of assessment that infringed upon her constitutional rights."

We have never held that a tender of the amount of the special benefit was a condition precedent to a property owner maintaining a suit in equity, to relieve his property from an alleged lien arising out of a void assessment. On the contrary, in Denver v. Londoner, supra, and other cases herein cited, the owners of the property upon which the assessments were made were held not to be entitled to relief in the suit instituted by them, because the assessment against their property was merely erroneous by being excessive, and they had not, prior to bringing the suit, tendered to the proper authorities the amount due, which would have been a valid assessment against their property; and it is therein expressly pointed out that the assessment was not void, but merely erroneous. The Supreme 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Court of the United States, to which that case was carried, and hereinbefore cited as Londoner v. Denver, determined that a hearing, or an opportunity therefor, to the property owners, had not been allowed, and that the assessment was therefore void, and the property owners were entitled to a decree discharging their lands from a lien on account of it, notwithstanding they had made no tender of the amount of the special benefits accruing to their property by reason of the improvement.

The trial court held that the testimony showed that the plaintiffs, either by themselves or their representatives, made protest to the city authorities against the excessive assessment, but were informed that the front footage plan had been recommended by the board of public works, and that the city authorities had no authority to change it, and were unable to render any relief whatever by way of decreasing the amount of assessment contemplated, and, under the circumstances, a tender would have been useless, and, as the parties had offered to do equity by paying into court the amount of benefits which the court should adjudge reasonable, there was a sufficient tender to meet the requirements of law and equity. Whether this view was correct is not necessary to determine, as the assessment was void for the lack of hearing.

Furthermore, it is apparent there was no necessity upon the part of plaintiffs, at or prior to the institution of this suit, to make a tender, even though we were to assume that the assessment was merely erroneous, and not void. While it has been held by this court that where property is excessively assessed for public improvements, but the procedure in making the assessment was regular, the owners, in order to maintain an action to annul the excessive part of the assessment, must first tender to the proper authorities the amount that should have been assessed, we do not understand that such tender should be of any greater sum than is then due and payable. In the case at bar, the record discloses that no part of the assessment was due, nor could any portion thereof presently become due, except by action of the property owners exercised under the provisions of the charter. Section 34. The assessing ordinance went into effect on the 29th day of August, and the suit for relief was filed on the 31st day thereof. Plaintiffs in their complaint, while denying the validity of the entire assessment, nevertheless alleged their willingness to pay any part thereof that was properly chargeable, or was a special benefit accruing, to their property by reason of the improvement, and further "offers and tenders the same to said defendant, . . . or into court at any time, and to keep said tender and offer good whenever the same shall be ascertained, or on demand, and to do equity in the premises." Plaintiffs thereafter paid into court, for the defendants, the full amount which the latter could justly have established as a lien upon the former's property, and, under the circumstances, sufficiently complied with all the rules of equity to entitle them to maintain their suit for relief.

The judgment of the court was manifestly just and proper, and we can perceive no reason why it should be disturbed. It is therefore affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS

v.

WILLIAM W. DREW.

(208 Mass. 493, 94 N. E. 682.)

Health — sale of milk — prescribing receptacles.

Statutory authority to examine into nuisances, sources of filth, and causes of sickness, and remove or prevent the same, and Note. — Right to prohibit sale of milk except in bottles.

No other case has been found involving the precise question decided in Com. v. Drew.

In Klopfers v. Dayton Bd. of Health, 20 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 384, 9 Ohio N. P. N. S. 33, the court upheld a regulation of a city board of health requiring that all milk or cream sold, kept, or offered for sale, to be kept in tightly closed and capped bottles or receptacles approved by the board, but excepting milk sold for consumption on the premises, and milk sold in wholesale quantities. The statutes which were held to confer power upon the board to adopt such regulation purported to give municipal boards of health general power to make such orders and regulations as should be necessary for the prevention or restriction of diseases, and specifically empowered them to make such orders as they might deem necessary to prevent the sale of "impure, adulterated, and unwholesome milk, or milk liable to carry disease." It will be observed that the regulation in this case was sufficiently broad to cover a sale under the circumstances appearing in Com. v. Drew. As a matter of fact, however, the party complaining of the regulation in the Klopfers Case was one who sold and delivered milk to customers from a wagon; make regulations for the public health relative thereto, and relative to articles which are capable of containing or conveying infection or contagion, or of creating sickness, which are brought into or conveyed from the town, does not empower a board of health to require the selling of milk only in tightly closed bottles or receptacles, to the exclusion of sales in small quantities from a wholesome receptacle kept under hygienic conditions.

R EPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of questions of law arising at a trial in which defendant was convicted of violating a health regulation in regard to the sale of milk. Verdict set aside.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Michael J. Dwyer, for the Commonwealth:

The regulation is a reasonable and lawful exercise of the powers of the board of health.

and in passing upon the reasonableness of the regulation, the court referred to the danger of contamination of milk in a can continually opened in a public highway, whereas there was much less danger of contamination incident to the mode of sale shown in the DREW CASE. Moreover, it will be observed that the statute involved in the Klopfers Case was more specific than that involved in the DREW CASE. It is stated in a note to the Klopfers Case that the judgment affirmed without opinion in Staas v. State, 81 Ohio St. 497, 91 N. E. 1139, was of like nature.

Mr. M. J. Sughrue for defendant.

Knowlton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a complaint against the defendant for the violation of a regulation of the board of health of the city of Boston, relative to the sale of milk. The material part of the regulation is as follows: "No person or corporation shall sell or offer, expose, or keep for sale in any shop, store, or other place where goods and merchandise are sold, milk or cream, unless the same is sold or offered, exposed, or kept for sale in tightly closed or capped bottles or receptacles which have been approved by the board of health." It was agreed that milk was kept for sale by the defendant in a vessel contained in a covered cooler, in his store; that it was always kept at a temperature less than fifty degrees Fahrenheit, and that none of it was allowed to stand outside of the cooler except while a sale of milk was being made; that the cooler was always kept properly drained and cared for and tightly closed, except during such interval as was necessary for the introduction or removal of milk or ice, and was kept in such location and under such conditions as were approved by the board of health. The milk was wholesome milk of standard quality, was taken from a clean, new tin cylinder or vessel, set in a clean, new ice chest, surrounded by clean, wholesome ice. The vessel had a removable cover which was new and clean, and the measure which was used by the defendant in retailing the milk was new and clean, and hung inside the tin cylinder so that it was not exposed to the air. The cylinder was simple in shape, is easily cleaned, and was susceptible of perfect sterilization. The sales were made in any quantities desired by customers from 1 cent's worth upward. The defendant's store was in a district in which many poor people live, and facts were agreed tending to show that such people often went to purchase a quantity less than the quantity contained in the smallest bottles used, and would be put to inconvenience by the enforcement of the regulation.

We do not consider the question whether this regulation is beyond the constitutional power of the legislature to enact as a statute, or to authorize the board of health to establish locally. For we are of opinion that the statute under which the board assumed to act is not broad enough to give them this authority. It is as follows: "The board of health shall examine into all nuisances, sources of filth, and causes of sickness within its town, or on board of vessels within the harbor of such town, which may in its opinion be injurious to the public health; shall destroy, remove, or prevent the same, as the case may require, and shall make regulations for the public health and safety relative thereto, and relative to articles which are capable of containing or conveying infection or contagion, or of creating sickness, which are brought into or conveyed from its town, or into or from any vessel." [Rev. Laws, 1902, chap. 75, § 65.] By § 140 of this chapter the section is made applicable to cities.

This statute does not give the board power to make regulations as to all matters affecting the public health. If the board should be certain that the smoking of cigarettes by boys affects their health injuriously, it would have no power to make a regulation forbidding the smoking of them by boys under a certain age, or the sale of them to such boys. It has no power to make general regulations as to conduct or practices injurious to health, which, if indulged in by many persons, affect the health of the public. The statute above quoted gives the board jurisdiction to deal with "nuisances, sources of filth, and causes of sickness within its town." Plainly the milk in question was not a nuisance or a source of filth. In determining the meaning of the words "causes of sickness," the doctrine of noscitur a sociis is to be applied. It is a little broader term than the two terms that precede it, but it is of the same general character. Primarily it refers to something local, and the board is directed "to destroy, remove, or prevent the same." In § 67 we have another indication of the meaning of these words in the requirement that the board shall order the owner or occupant of private premises to remove any "nuisance, source of filth, or cause of sickness found thereon." So, under § 74 he may obtain a warrant directed to an officer or to a member of the board, commanding him to destroy, remove, or prevent any "nuisance, source of filth, or cause of sickness," in reference to which they have made complaint to a magistrate. We are of opinion that, within the meaning of the language in these sections, milk kept in a vessel, as this was kept by the defendant, was not a "nuisance, source of filth, or cause of sickness," which gave the board of health jurisdiction to take any action or make any regulation under Rev. Laws, chap. 75, § 65.

The latter portion of this section gives the board jurisdiction to make regulations "relative to articles which are capable of containing or conveying infection or contagion, or of creating sickness, which are brought into or conveyed from its town, or into or from any vessel." This has reference to the bringing into the town or conveying away of articles capable of containing or conveying infection, in such a way as to affect injuriously the public health or safety. The legislation is found in Rev. Stat. chap. 21, § 6, in which the language is "when such articles shall be brought into or conveyed from their town, or into or from any vessel." In Gen. Stat. chap. 26, § 5, the words "when such articles shall be" are omitted, and the section reads in this part, "brought into or conveyed from its town, or into or from any vessel." In Pub. Stat. chap. 80, § 18, the language is the same. We are of opinion that this part of the section relates to articles of such a kind as to be dangerous in reference to their capability of containing or conveying infection or contagion, or of creating sickness, in connection with their removal from one town to another. The case of Train v. Boston Disinfecting Co. 144 Mass. 523, 59 Am. Rep. 113, 11 N. E. 929, relative to the disinfecting of rags, furnishes an illustration of what is meant by the statute.

The regulation in the present case has no reference to property in connection with its removal from one city or town to another. Nor is pure milk such an article as is referred to in the statute. We are of opinion that this part of the section does not authorize a regulation as to the sale of milk kept and sold in the manner that is disclosed in this case.

We have no occasion to consider the objection to the regulation in that part which subjects the business to an absolute determination of the board as to whether they will approve of the bottles or receptacles used in making sales. See Com. v. Maletsky, 203 Mass. 241, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1168, 89 N. E. 245.

Verdict set aside.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

ALEX SCHULTZ, Plff. in Err.,
v.

STATE OF NEBRASKA.

(— Neb. —, 130 N. W. 972.)

Indictment — sufficiency — manslaughter.

1. Substance of the information stated in the opinion, and held sufficient to charge the defendant with the crime of manslaughter by carelessly, recklessly, unlawfully, and wilfully driving his automobile on the public streets and highways of the city of Omaha, thereby causing the death of another.

Homicide — reckless driving of automobile.

2. One who drives an automobile wilfully, recklessly, carelessly, and negligently, and at a rate of speed forbidden by the statute,

Headnotes by BARNES, J.

Note. — Homicide by negligent operation of automobile.

This subject is treated in the note to State v. Goetz, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 458, since the time of which one case in point, aside from SCHULTZ v. STATE, has been reported.

In People v. Darragh, 141 App. Div. 408, 126 N. Y. Supp. 522, where a chauffeur testing a new sixty-horse power automobile drove along a city street at a speed of from 35 to 40 miles an hour, in violation of a statute making it a misdemeanor to exceed a speed of 15 miles an hour, and, charging down upon a group of boys whom he saw at a distance of at least a full block, within which he could have stopped his machine, hit and killed one of them, it was held that he was properly indicted for murder in the first degree, under a statute providing that the killing of a human being, unless excusable or justifiable, is murder in the first degree when committed by an act imminently dangerous to others, and evincing a depraved mind, regardless of human life, although without a premeditated design to effect the death of any individual; and that the evidence sustained a verdict of guilty of manslaughter in the first degree under a statute providing that homicide, unless excusable or justifiable, is manslaughter in the first degree when committed without a design to effect death, by a person engaged in committing or attempting to commit a misdemeanor affecting the person or property either of the person killed or of another.

upon the public streets or highways of this state, and thereby causes the death of another, is guilty of criminal homicide.

Trial — instructions — definition.

3. On the trial of a person charged with such crime, it is permissible for the court to define an unlawful rate of speed in the language of the statute regulating the use of motor vehicles upon the public streets and highways of this state.

Highway — speed of automobile — who to determine rate.

4. Ordinarily, the courts will not substitute their opinions for the judgment of the legislature as to the reasonableness of an act fixing the rate of speed at which motor vehicles may be lawfully driven.

Trial — repeating instructions.

5. Where the substance of an instruction requested by the defendant has been given by the court upon his own motion, he is not required to repeat it because of such request.

Same — lack of evidence.

6. Where there is no evidence upon which to predicate a requested instruction, it is proper for the court to refuse to give it.

Homicide — contributory negligence — effect.

7. Where a person wilfully, recklessly, carelessly, and negligently, and at an unlawful rate of speed, as defined by the statute, drives his automobile upon the public streets and highways (of this state) and thereby kills another, negligence of the driver of another car in which the deceased was riding when he was killed cannot be invoked, under ordinary circumstances, to relieve such person of criminal liability.

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment convicting defendant of manslaughter. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John W. Battin and W. W. Slabaugh, for plaintiff in error:

The information does not charge a crime.

Com. v. Adams, 114 Mass. 323, 19 Am. Rep. 362; Johnson v. State, 66 Ohio St. 59, 61 L.R.A. 277, 90 Am. St. Rep. 564, 63 N. E. 607; Gee Wo v. State, 36 Neb. 241, 54 N. W. 513.

Mere operating of an automobile in excess of the speed limit fixed by law is not the "commission of an unlawful act," as contemplated in the law of manslaughter.

A conviction of manslaughter cannot be had and maintained because of violation of a speed limit fixed by law. As a rule the cases are brought on the ground of negligent or reckless and dangerous driving, and speed is considered simply as an element of negligence, as it is held to be frequently in civil suits.

Mr. S. F. Neble also for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Grant G. Martin, Attorney General, and Frank E. Edgerton, for the State:

One who wilfully drives an automobile in a public street of this state at a rate of speed or in a manner expressly forbidden by statute, thereby causing the death of another, or one who, with reckless disregard for the safety of others, so negligently drives an automobile in a public street as to cause the death of another, is guilty of criminal homicide.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Alex Schultz, hereafter called the defendant, was prosecuted in the district court of Douglas county on a charge of manslaughter. His trial resulted in a conviction, and he was sentenced to serve a term of three years in the state penitentiary.

From that judgment he has brought the case here by a petition in error.

1. Defendant's first contention is that the information on which he was tried does not charge a crime, in that it fails to state that defendant committed an assault. The charging part of the information reads as follows: "That on the 21st day of June, in the year of our Lord 1910, Alex Schultz, late of the county of Douglas aforesaid, in the county of Douglas and state of Nebraska aforesaid, then and there being in said county, and then and there being upon a public highway, to wit, at the intersection or crossing of Thirty-Fourth and Leavenworth streets in the city of Omaha, which said streets are public highways, and the said Thirty-Fourth street at the point aforesaid being a part of the boulevard system of said city, and the said intersection or crossing being a place at which there is much traffic, did then and there negligently, carelessly, recklessly, unlawfully, and feloniously drive, propel, and operate a motor vehicle, commonly called an automobile, upon said public streets and highways and at said crossing or intersection aforesaid, at a rate of speed greater than was reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of said streets and highways at the place aforesaid, and having regard to the safety of the public, and did then and there so drive, propel, and operate said automobile at a rate of speed so as to endanger the life and limb of persons using and traveling said streets and highways at the point aforesaid, and at a rate of speed in excess of the rate permitted by law, and then and there, while so negligently, carelessly, and unlawfully propelling, driving, and operating said automobile, did in and upon one William Krug make an assault, and the said automobile which he, the said Alex Schultz, was then and there, upon said streets and public highways, and at said intersection and crossing, so negligently, carelessly, and unlawfully propelling, driving, and operating, in and against the said William Krug, unlawfully and maliciously did force and drive, and him, the said William Krug, did then and there throw to and upon the ground, curbstone, and pavement, and did then and there thereby give to the said William Krug, in and upon the upper part of the body and head of him, the said William Krug, certain contusions, fractures, and mortal wounds, of which the said William Krug, on said 21st day of June, 1910, in said county and state, did die; and so the said Alex Schultz, him, the said William Krug, in the manner aforesaid, and unintentionally while in the commission of said unlawful act, did then and there unlawfully and feloniously kill and slay,— contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Nebraska." It thus appears that the information not only charges an assault, but contains every element necessary to constitute the crime of manslaughter. The record also discloses that the defendant fully understood the nature of the charge against him, and conducted his defense in such a manner as to have exonerated himself from criminal liability had the jury believed his evidence. A like question was before the supreme court of Missouri in State v. Watson, 216 Mo. 420, 115 S. W. 1011, upon a similar information, in which the defendant was charged with killing a pedestrian while carelessly, recklessly, and negligently running his automobile over and upon a certain street in the city of St. Louis. Speaking of the information in that case, the court said: "This in our opinion is a sufficient charge, and fully informed the defendant of the nature and character of the offense he was called upon to answer. It was not in our judgment essential that the information should undertake to set out in detail in what such carelessness, recklessness, and culpable negligence consisted, but the charge that he operated and propelled this automobile along a public street carelessly, recklessly, and with culpable negligence, was in effect notifying the defendant that he was not using, operating, or propelling his automobile in accordance with the law or the ordinances of the city regulating the use and operation of such machines." From the foregoing we are of opinion that the information in this case was sufficient in all respects to charge the defendant with the offense of which he was convicted.

2. Defendant's second and third assignments of error will be considered together. They each, in a different form, raise the question of the rate of speed at which automobiles may be operated upon the public streets and highways of this state. By § 147, chap. 78, Comp. Stat. 1907, it is provided that "no person shall operate a motor vehicle on a public highway at a rate of speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway, or so as to endanger the life or limb of any person; or in any event in the close built-up portions of a city, town, or village at a greater rate than one (1) mile in six (6) minutes, or elsewhere in a city, town, or village at a greater rate than one (1) mile in four (4) minutes, or elsewhere outside of the city, town, or village, at a greater rate than 20 miles per hour; . . . and in no event greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic then on such highways and the safety of the public." The trial court, by paragraph 5 of his instructions, charged the jury, in substance, that, in order to convict the defendant, they must find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that William Krug was alive June 21, 1910; that on the same day he was killed, and his death was the result of an unlawful act on the part of Alex Schultz; that such killing occurred on the streets of Omaha; that it was the result of a collision between the automobile driven by Schultz at an unlawful rate of speed and the automobile in which Krug at that time was riding. In defining an unlawful rate of speed, the court's instruction No. 6 stated the substance of the section of the statute above quoted. The giving of those instructions is jointly assigned as error, and it is argued that the conviction cannot be maintained solely because of a violation of the speed limit fixed by law. It will be observed that this case is not prosecuted solely for a violation of the speed limit fixed by the statute, but is based in fact on the negligent, reckless, careless, and dangerous driving of his automobile by the defendant. In a recent case in Connecticut the defendant was found guilty of manslaughter in negligently and recklessly driving his automobile over a man named Morgan. In that case the court took occasion to read to the jury the automobile act of that state, which is quite similar to the statutes of Nebraska regulating the use of automobiles on public streets and highways. It was claimed that it was error to read those statutes and apply them in that case, but the supreme court of Connecticut found no error in the instruction. It was there said: "One who wilfully drives an automobile in a public street of this state at a rate of speed or in a manner expressly forbidden by statute, and thereby causes the death of another; or one who, with reckless disregard for the safety of others, so negligently drives an automobile in a public street as to cause the death of another, is guilty of criminal homicide." State v. Campbell, 82 Conn. 671, 135 Am. St. Rep. 293, 74 Atl. 927, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 236.

It will be observed that by instruction No. 5 the court told the jury that to find the defendant guilty they must find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that he operated his machine at an unlawful rate of speed. This is explained in instruction No. 6, as a speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and the use of the highway, or so as to injure the life or limb of any person, as defined by the words of the statute; and it was thereupon properly left to the jury to determine whether or not the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) defendant was driving his automobile at an unlawful rate of speed when the collision occurred. We find no error in the instructions complained of.

It is argued that the act regulating the speed of motor vehicles is unconstitutional and void, because it is unreasonable. No authorities are cited in support of this argument, and we doubt if any authority can be found to sustain it. The act seems to be a proper exercise of the police power of the state. The legislature no doubt was aware of this new method of public travel, and, recognizing the fact that the automobile furnishes a means of transportation by which a speed may be attained greater than by any other vehicle in common use, deemed it necessary to regulate its use in such a manner as to prevent collisions and accidents like the one in the case at bar, and, having due regard to the safety of life and limb of all persons rightfully upon our public streets and highways, passed the act in question defining the methods of operation and the rate of speed which would in their judgment best subserve the public interest. In such case the courts should not under ordinary circumstances substitute their opinions for the judgment of the legislative branch of the government, as to the reasonableness of such regulation.

3. Error is assigned because of the refusal of the trial court to give instructions 17, 24, and 26, requested by the defendant. By No. 17 the court was asked to instruct the jury that if they had any reasonable doubt that the death of William Krug was the natural and probable result of the collision, they should find the defendant not guilty. It appears that the substance of that instruction was given by the court on his own motion, and it was unnecessary to repeat it at the request of the defendant.

By instruction No. 24 the court was asked to charge the jury that if they had any reasonable doubt as to whether or not William Krug was thrown from the gray car because of the plunge forward by the gray car, and that as a result of being thrown from said car he was killed, and that such plunge forward was made by the driver of the gray car, then they should find the defendant not guilty. That instruction was properly refused, because there was no evidence upon which to predicate such a defense, as we shall presently see. Instruction 26 was in substance a repetition of instruction 24, and was therefore properly refused.

4. Error is assigned for giving instruction No. 7 by the court on his own motion, and the refusal to give instruction No. 25 requested by the defendant. By instruction No. 25 the court was requested to instruct the jury on the law of contributory negligence, to wit, negligence on the part of the driver of the car in which Krug was riding. In support of this contention defendant cites State v. Stentz, 33 Wash. 444, 74 Pac. 588. In that case the jury were informed that if they should find from the evidence that the deceased came to his death by the mutual mistake of the deceased and the defendant in the honest endeavor to avoid a collision, both on the part of the deceased and the defendant, then in that event such killing would be accidental, and not criminal, and their verdict should be not guilty. But in the same paragraph it was further said: "Gentlemen of the jury, I instruct you that if the defendant was, at the time alleged in this information, engaged in an unlawful act, to wit, the act of driving horses and a wagon upon the public highway in such a manner as to endanger the lives and persons of others, and such unlawful act resulted in the killing of the person named in the information mentioned, it would then be immaterial whether the killing was accidental or intentional. The defendant would be guilty." It will thus be seen that the case cited does not support the defendant's contention. On the other hand, in State v. Campbell, supra, the court said: "Contributory negligence as such is not available as a defense in a criminal prosecution for a homicide caused by the gross and reckless misconduct of the accused, although the decedent's behavior is admissible in evidence, and may have a material bearing upon the question of the defendant's guilt. If, however, the culpable negligence of the accused is found to be the cause of the decedent's death, the former is responsible under the criminal law, whether the decedent's failure to use due care contributed to his injury or not." The rule of law concerning contributory negligence by the injured person as a defense in civil actions for damages for personal injuries had no application to this case. The state was required to prove the alleged unlawful act of the accused and its consequences, but not that the deceased exercised due care to avoid the consequences of the unlawful act. The authorities are not in conflict as to this question. Uniformly the courts have said a man will not be excused for killing another, even though his victim was negligent. While contributory negligence is a complete defense to an action for private injury resulting from homicide, it is no defense to a prosecution for a public wrong. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 195. We think the refusal of this instruction was clearly right for the further reason that the evidence disclosed no theory upon which such an instruction could be predicated.

It is also contended that there is a distinction between offenses mala prohibita and mala in se. The distinction, if any, is not accounted of much practical consequence by the text writers. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 190; 1 Bishop, New Criminal Law, § 333. In State v. Stanton, 37 Conn. 421, it was said: "Where a man was knowingly engaged in a criminal act, and unintentionally committed a greater offense than the one intended, proof of an intent was not essential to a conviction for the latter crime. We perceive no error in this part of the charge. The defendant claims that the proposition of the court, though correct when applied to crimes which are mala in se, is not correct when applied to crimes which are mala prohibita. We do not recognize the distinction as law. The cases cited by the defendant's counsel are all cases where the prisoner was engaged in doing a lawful act, and the offense was committed through carelessness." There seems to be no conflict in the decisions where the defendant is violating some statute, and where his manner is negligent and careless. The courts in such cases uniformly say that he is guilty of manslaughter if the death of some other person is the result. Ford v. State, 71 Neb. 246, 115 Am. St. Rep. 591, 98 N. W. 807; Flinn v. State, 24 Ind. 286; Bias v. United States, 3 Ind. Terr. 27, 53 S. W. 471; Adams v. State, 65 Ind. 565; Thompson v. State, 131 Ala. 18, 31 So. 725; Irwin v. Judge, 81 Conn. 492, 71 Atl. 572; State v. Watson, 216 Mo. 420, 115 S. W. 1011.

5. It is contended that the verdict is not supported by sufficient evidence. This question is not discussed in the defendant's brief. We deem it proper, however, to state the facts as they appear from the record. On the morning of June 21, 1910, the deceased and his friend McCormick were riding in an automobile driven by one William H. Wallace. They were going north on what is called Central boulevard, which is one of the principal streets of the city of Omaha. As they approached the intersection of the boulevard with Leavenworth street, which is also one of the principal thoroughfares of that city, they were driving at the rate of from 8 to 10 miles an hour. The south-east corner of Leavenworth street, where it crosses the boulevard, is what is called a blind corner. It appears that trees and shrubs were growing on the east side of the boulevard clear up to its intersection with Leavenworth street, so that persons approaching from the east on that street were unable to see vehicles approaching from the south on the boulevard until they reached the intersection. While the car in which the deceased was riding was crossing Leavenworth street, the automobile driven by the defendant approached the intersection from the east at an excessive rate of speed, and struck it with such force as to cause the death of Mr. Krug. The state produced five or six persons, some of whom were within 100 feet of where the collision occurred, and saw the entire transaction, who without substantial variance testified that the defendant's car as it approached the intersection, and up to the very instant of the collision, was running at a speed of between 30 and 50 miles an hour. It appears that Central boulevard at the place where it crosses Leavenworth street is one of the main traveled streets in the city of Omaha, and is extensively used by persons driving automobiles; that Leavenworth street is also used by them as well as by all other kinds of conveyances. A number of the witnesses who resided within a few hundred feet of that intersection testified that there was no time of the day during business hours that both of those streets were not occupied by automobiles and other vehicles. It appears that, as the defendant's car approached the intersection, he discovered the presence of the automobile in which the deceased was riding; that he saw a collision was imminent, and, in order to avoid it, he turned his automobile to the left so as to pass behind the one in which the deceased was riding. This was the proper course for him to pursue, and accorded in all respects with the rules of the road. It also appears that when the driver of the car in which the deceased was riding, which was proceeding at a rate of speed not exceeding 8 to 12 miles an hour, discovered the approach of the defendant's machine, he applied additional power in an attempt to get out of the way and avoid a collision. This was the proper course for him to pursue, and in all respects accorded with the rules of the road. Notwithstanding all of this, the speed of the defendant's car was so great that, although he discovered the presence of the other car when he was from 150 to 200 feet distant from it, he was unable to avoid the collision, and struck the Wallace automobile at about the right hind wheel with such tremendous force that it was lifted off from the pavement, thrown into the air several feet, and while it was going north when the collision occurred, when it again struck the pavement it was facing south. It was thrown from 20 to 25 feet in a northwesterly direction and landed against a telephone pole at the edge of the curb, while the machine in which the defendant was riding, although it had a wheel broken by the impact of the collision, could not be stopped until it ran a distance of 152 feet, jumped over the curb which was from 10 inches to a foot in height, went across the sidewalk, and hung on the edge of a hole in a vacant lot on the left-hand side of the street. At least two of the witnesses who were looking directly at the cars when the collision occurred testified that the deceased, who was a man weighing over 200 pounds, was thrown into the air from 10 to 15 feet, and a distance of from 25 to 30 feet, and struck on his head on the pavement or curbstone, receiving such injuries that he almost instantly died.

It thus appears that the excessive, unlawful, negligent, and reckless rate of speed at which the defendant was driving his car as he approached the intersection of the boulevard and Leavenworth street was the sole cause of the collision which resulted in the death of William Krug. It was claimed by the defendant that Wallace, who drove the car in which the deceased was riding, was guilty of contributory negligence in applying his extra power; or, in other words, in attempting to speed up as some of the witnesses designated it at the time of the collision. There is no merit in this contention, for the evidence is clear that Wallace, recognizing the danger, attempted in a proper manner to avoid it, and, if he had not applied his extra power in order to move out of the way, the defendant's machine would have struck his automobile about the center, instead of striking it at or about the right hind wheel. At least two of the witnesses for the state, who lived in the immediate vicinity of the intersection in question, testified that they had observed the passing and running of automobiles upon both the boulevard and Leavenworth street for many years, and that in all that time they had never seen an automobile running as fast as the one which the defendant was driving at the time the collision occurred. It is true that the defendant and some of those who were riding in the car with him testified that they were driving at a rate of speed not exceeding 12 to 20 miles per hour. But this testimony must give way to the physical facts shown by the result of the collision. It is utterly inconsistent with such results. Each of the machines with its load weighed something like 5,000 pounds, and the speed at which the automobile driven by the defendant was going was so great, and the impact was so powerful, as to lift the automobile in which the deceased was riding bodily into the air and hurl it a distance of from 20 to 25 feet; not only this, but to completely reverse its direction so that when it landed against the telephone pole it was facing south, while at the time of the collision it was moving and facing north. The testimony of the defendant and those riding with him serves but to illustrate the axiom of the law of evidence that officers and crews of respective vessels or vehicles where collisions have occurred will defend the vessels to which they are attached. It seems to be a curious psychological fact that when passengers are aboard of a vessel or other means of conveyance they appear to be controlled by the same bias. 2 Moore, Facts, § 1110.

6. Finally, it is contended that the court erred in excluding the evidence offered by the defendant to prove that McCormick, the friend of the deceased, who sat at his left side in the rear seat of the Wallace car, said within a minute or so after the collision: "I told the damn fool to look out." It is claimed that this was a part of the res gestæ, and was therefore admissible as tending to prove that the driver of the car in which Krug was riding was guilty of contributory negligence. What we have heretofore said in regard to that question is a sufficient answer to this assignment.

We are aware of the importance of our decision of this case, both to the defendant and to the public. The questions presented by the record are before us for the first time, and we have examined them with great care. We recognize the necessity, utility, and convenience of the automobile as a means of travel, and it is neither our purpose nor our desire to unnecessarily hamper or restrict its reasonable use. On the other hand, we deem it our duty to hold the persons who make use of such machines to that degree of care necessary for the protection of the lives of all persons who are rightfully upon the public highways and streets of our state. The statute regulating the use of such machines was passed solely for that purpose, and amounts to a valid exercise of the police power of the state. This view accords with the great weight of authority. In Berry, Law of Automobiles, § 159, it is said: "One may be criminally responsible for the negligent operation of an automobile. A person is guilty of criminal negligence when he does some act or omits some duty under circumstances showing an actual intent to injure, or when the breach of duty is so flagrant as to warrant an implication that the resulting injury was intended; that is, when his negligent conduct is incompatible with a proper regard for human life. Negligence is the gist of the offense, and, in the absence of recklessness or of want of 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

due caution, there is no criminal liability. Actual intent is not an essential element of the offense. It is enough if there is shown a negligent and reckless indifference of the lives and safety of others." The evidence contained in the record conclusively establishes a case of negligent and reckless indifference to the lives and safety of others on the part of the defendant, sufficient to sustain his conviction and justify the judgment of which he complains.

We find no reversible error, and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

C. H. PEAKE, Master for Union County, Appt.,
v.

JOHN RENWICK et al., Resp'ts.

(86 S. C. 226, 68 S. E. 531.)

Mortgage — failure of suit to foreclose — restoration of parties.

1. Upon failure of a suit to foreclose a mortgage for unpaid purchase money upon a partition sale, because of failure of title to the property, the suit should not be dismissed, but the parties should be restored to their original condition.

Partition — sale — misrepresentation — relief.

2. In case of reliance by the purchaser at a sale for partition, upon an innocent misrepresentation that an improved parcel of land was included in the sale, he may be relieved from his contract where such representation was a principal inducement to the purchase and a pro tanto reduction of the purchase money would result inequitably to the other parties.

(July 4, 1910.)

Note. — Applicability of rule of caveat emptor to sales for partition.

Doctrine that rule of caveat emptor applies.

In many jurisdictions the rule prevails that on a sale of land in proceedings for partition, the court does not undertake to sell more than the title of the parties to the suit, and the doctrine of caveat emptor applies to such a sale, the purchaser taking at his own risk as to the title, in the absence of any express warranty or representation. Bassett v. Lockard, 60 Ill. 164; Hall v. Gabbert, 213 Ill. 208, 72 N. E. 806; Owsley v. Smith, 14 Mo. 153; Schwartz v. Dryden, 25 Mo. 572; Cashion v. Faina, 47 Mo. 133.

In Bassett v. Lockard, the court said that the general rule is that there is no warranty of title at a judicial sale, but the rule of caveat emptor applies, and the purchaser takes at his own risk as to title and that APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Union County dismissing an action brought to foreclose a certain real estate mortgage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wallace & Barron, for appellant:

Failure to announce that the Dolly Ann Hawkins inclosure was not included in the lot to be sold was not a misrepresentation which misled, for the purchasers already knew the contrary.

Aultman v. Utsey, 34 S. C. 559, 13 S. E. 848.

As there was no value proved as to the part as to which defendants claimed the title had failed, the judge would have erred in allowing any discount; and did err in not giving judgment for the full amount claimed by plaintiff.

Equity Comrs. v. Smith, 9 Rich. L. 521; Mitchell v. Pinckney, 13 S. C. 203; Latimer v. Wharton, 41 S. C. 511, 44 Am. St. Rep. 739, 19 S. E. 855.

Messrs. Townsend & Townsend, for respondents:

When an untrue statement is made in the honest belief of its truth, so that 'it is the result of an innocent error, and the truth is afterwards discovered by the person who has made the incorrect representation, if he then suffers the other party to continue in error, and to act on the belief that no mistake has been made, this, from the time of the discovery, becomes in this doctrine equally applies to a sale for partition.

In Owsley v. Smith, 14 Mo. 153, the court said that the law does not intend that parties to a partition proceeding shall be responsible for the title, where the real estate partitioned is directed to be sold, the whole object of the statute being to enable parties who have an undivided interest in land to divide that interest whatever it may be, and when a sale is made, no warranty attends the sale, nor is any authorized.

Sales in partition suits stand on the same footing as execution sales,—the purchaser buys at his peril, and must beware of his title. He cannot be excused from completing the transaction on the ground of a defect in the title to the premises purchased. McNamee v. Cole, 134 Mo. App. 266, 114 S. W. 46.

The doctrine that the maxim caveat emptor applies to a sale in partition is not affected by the fact that the purchaser at such sale is a part owner of the property, such doctrine applying equally there as where the purchaser is a stranger. Stephens v. Ellis, 65 Mo. 456.

But where a partition sale is voidable because one of the parties thereto is an infant, it is proper after such infant arrives at his majority, to settle the validity of the sale in a proceeding against the purchaser upon a purchase price note given by him, and such matter should be settled before compelling him to pay the same. Fulbright v. Cannefox, 30 Mo. 425.

While the rule of caveat emptor applies in judicial sales, including sales for partition, and hence it cannot be said that in a partition sale there is any warranty of title which would make an adverse title subsequently acquired by the plaintiff in the partition inure to the benefit of the purchaser at such sale, nevertheless, such plaintiff is estopped from claiming that the partition sale is void as to the title to one half the property, when she accepted and appropriated the proceeds from the sale of that portion. Gruenewald v. Neu, 215 Ill. 132, 74 N. E. 101.

A purchaser of real estate in proceedings for partition, to which the widow and children of the deceased owner are parties, cannot recover from such widow and children the amount he is required thereafter to pay to prevent the sale of the land for the decedent's debts. The case is not analogous to the right of the purchaser at execution sale of property to which the title is defective, to recover the amount paid by him from the judgment debtor, on the theory of money paid for his benefit. Weakley v. Conradt, 56 Ind. 430.

In some jurisdictions it is held that the doctrine of caveat emptor does not apply to sales in partition, (see infra, "Doctrine that purchaser need not complete purchase if title is defective"), while in other jurisdictions, although it is asserted that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies to partition sales, yet this general rule is subject to the qualification that while the proceeds of the sale are yet in court, if the purchaser is disturbed in his possession, or expects to be so disturbed, by one having a clear title to the estate, which title was entirely unknown to the purchaser at the time of the sale, he will be relieved from the purchase. This is the doctrine in Maryland. Scarlett v. Robinson, 112 Md. 202, 76 Atl. 181; Glenn v. Clapp, 11 Gill & J. 10.

And the court, will not hold the purchaser at a partition sale to his contract of purchase, and compel him to take the title, where it is apparent upon the face of the proceeding that he is liable to be thereafter disturbed by innocent parties to the proceeding, for defects in the proceeding manifest on their face. Earle v. Turton, 26 Md. 23.

So, a purchaser at a partition sale may intervene in the partition proceedings, and except to the ratification of the sale, upon the ground that some necessary parties were omitted in the proceeding, and that no clear or good title to the property can be conveyed. Handy v. Waxter, 75 Md. 517, 23 Atl. 1035.

In Holt v. Love, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 131 S. W. 857. the doctrine is asserted that the rule of caveat emptor applies to this equity a fraudulent representation, even though it was not so originally.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 888, 891, 895; Eaton, Eq. Jur. 298, 299.

Where one has been in possession a long time without claim of title, and then acquires one, but without any change in the mode and character of his occupancy, such possession is not notice to a subsequent purchaser of any right acquired since the first entry, for the first entry determines the character and equity of the possession.

9 Rich. L. 515; Barkley v. Barkley, Harp. L. (S. C.) 441; People's Bank v. Bramlett, 58 S. C. 478, 79 Am. St. Rep. 855, 36 S. E. 912.

Hydrick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to foreclose a mortgage given by defendants to plaintiff, as master, for the credit portion of the purchase price of a lot in the town of Union, sold under order of court for partition amongst the heirs of C. C. Culp. By mistake, the lot, as described in the complaint, in the advertisement for sale, and in the master's deed to defendants and their mortgage to him, included a lot which had been sold by Mr. Culp some years before his class of judicial sales, as well as to those made under execution, and the purchaser must exercise a certain degree of diligence for his own protection, but he has a right to rely upon the record title. The court added, "He takes such title as he would acquire through a conveyance made by the defendant in execution, or the parties who claim the property and participate in the proceeds of the sale. It has been held that one who purchases at an execution sale can claim the protection of an innocent purchaser for value, and that such an one has a right superior to those claiming the property through an undisclosed trust."

We see no good reason why that rule should not be extended to judicial sales such as are here under consideration, as well as to execution sales." But while the rule of caveat emptor in some sense applies to this character of sales, it is not applied as rigidly as it is to sales under execution and other sales in invitum.

And a court of equity, when its action is invoked to effect a sale for partition, will endeavor to see that a purchaser under its process gets a good title, and on application by the purchaser before completion of the purchase, he may be relieved from his bid if he shows that the title purchased by him is worthless. He cannot, however, be relieved from his purchase on the ground of an outstanding paramount adverse title, where he does not seek to rescind until some time after having completed the purchase. Buetell v. Courand, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 564, 29 S. W. 1146.

—effect of fraud or misrepresentation as to title.

Where there is fraud or misrepresentation in a sale in partition, or where the purchaser has been led into mistake as to the title by the conduct of the seller, the court has ample authority at all events previous to a confirmation of the report, to set aside the sale. Schwartz v. Dryden, 25 Mo. 572.

While in Owsley v. Smith, 14 Mo. 153, the rule of caveat emptor was held applicable to sales in partition, it was said: 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"Undoubtedly the courts will not permit a fraud to be committed. If the parties whose interests are ordered to be sold are guilty of any fraudulent concealment or misrepresentation, or choose voluntarily to guarantee the title, the purchaser at the sale would occupy a different position from the present complainants."

But false representations or fraud by one of several joint owners of land does not affect the validity of the sale in partition proceedings, and such false representation cannot be relied upon by a purchaser in an action to recover the amount of his bid. Matlock v. Bigbee, 34 Mo. 354.

If trustees for the sale of land in partition represent to the purchaser that he is to get a clear, fee simple title to the land sold, he will be entitled to have the property free from the liens of mortgages by having the same deducted from the purchase money, or be released from the purchase. Brillhart v. Mish, 99 Md. 447, 58 Atl. 28.

Doctrine that purchaser need not complete purchase if title is defective.

In New York, the rule of caveat emptor does not apply to purchasers at judicial sales generally, neither does it apply to purchasers at partition sales. The purchaser at such sale has the right to demand a marketable title, free from reasonable doubt as to its validity. He bids on the assumption that there are no undisclosed defects in the title, and the seller receives a consideration regulated in view of this implied condition. Hence a purchaser cannot be required to complete his purchase unless a title free from reasonable doubt is tendered him. Crouter v. Crouter, 133 N. Y. 55, 30 N. E. 726; Cambrelleng v. Purton, 125 N. Y. 610, 26 N. E. 907; Miller v. Wright, 109 N. Y. 194, 16 N. E. 205; Rice v. Barrett, 102 N. Y. 161, 6 N. E. 898; Fleming v. Burnham, 100 N. Y. 1, 2 N. E. 905; People v. Open Board S. B. Bldg. Co. 92 N. Y. 98; Jordan v. Poillon, 77 N. Y. 518; Parish v. Parish, 77 App. Div. 287, 78 N. Y. Supp. 1089, reversed in 175 N. Y. 181, 67 N. E. 298, on the ground that the title was good; death to Dolly Ann Hawkins, upon which there were valuable improvements, including a dwelling house, well, orchard, and vineyard. The defendants knew that Dolly Ann Hawkins was, at the time of the sale, and for many years prior thereto had been, in possession of a part of the lot covered by the description, but allege that they believed, nevertheless, that they were buying all the land included within the boundaries given, and, before complying with their bid, they called the attention of the master to the fact that she was in possession of a part of the lot, and were assured by him that they would get all the land covered by the description, and that, relying upon his assurance, they completed the purchase by paying the cash portion of their bid and executing the bond and mortgage. Having failed to get possession of the Hawkins lot, they refused to pay the bond given for the balance of the purchase price, and to the complaint herein they pleaded failure of consideration. The circuit judge found that, on account of the mistake in the description, the master thought he was selling, and the defendants thought they were buying, the Hawkins lot, together with the adjacent vacant lot, which alone was intended to be sold; that the minds of the parties did not meet, and therefore no contract was made, and he dismissed the complaint. It was error to dismiss the complaint. The decree should at least have restored the parties to their original condition.

The rule of caveat emptor does not apply to judicial sales of property for partition. The officer making such sales is the agent of the parties to the action, and his representations are binding upon them. Tunno v. Fludd, 1 M'Cord L. 121; People's Bank v. Bramlett, 58 S. C. 477, 79 Am. St. Rep. 855, 36 S. E. 912.

While the court will not lend too ready ears to defenses by which parties seek to Bowler v. Ennis, 46 App. Div. 309, 61 N. Y. Supp. 686; O'Toole v. O'Toole, 39 App. Div. 302, 56 N. Y. Supp. 963; Recor v. Blackburn, 71 Hun, 54, 24 N. Y. Supp. 692; Kopp v. Kopp, 48 Hun, 532, 1 N. Y. Supp. 261; Re Cavanagh, 14 Abb. Pr. 258; McGowan v. Wilkins, 1 Paige, 120.

The rule is thus stated in Jordan v. Poillon, 77 N. Y. 518, "A purchaser on a partition or foreclosure sale has a right to expect that he will acquire a good title; the law presumes that he bids with that object in view. He should not be left upon receiving a deed, to the uncertainty of a doubtful title, or the hazard of a contest with other parties, which may seriously affect the value of the property if he desires to sell the same. It is easy to see how a claim of this kind might impair the value of the real estate sold by casting a cloud over the title, or by subjecting the purchaser to the risks of a contest at law. From such a result he is entitled to protection, and the case should be very plain which would authorize a court to decide a question arising on motion to compel a party to take a conveyance, and then it should be determined only with the consent of such purchaser."

In McGowan v. Wilkins, 1 Paige, 120, the court said that for the purpose of obtaining a fair price for the premises on such sales, it is important that the purchaser shall know that, if he pays a fair price for the property and it is sold without reserve, he will be protected by the court, and will not be compelled to accept an encumbered or worthless title.

If the partition proceedings are of doubtful validity, the purchaser cannot be compelled to complete his purchase. Re Cavanagh, 14 Abb. Pr. 258.

Neither is a purchaser bound to complete the sale, unless he can be put into possession under the decree of sale. Kopp v. Kopp, 48 Hun, 532, 1 N. Y. Supp. 261.

While a purchaser will not be required to take a doubtful title, yet, if the alleged defect depends upon a very remote or improbable contingency, it will not be sufficient to excuse him from completing his purchase. Cambrelleng v. Purton, 125 N. Y. 610, 26 N. E. 907.

In Smith v. Brittain, 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 347, 42 Am. Dec. 175, it is asserted that a partition sale is but a mode of sale by the parties themselves, that it is not merely a sale by the law in invitum of such interest as the party has or may have, in which the rule is caveat emptor, but it professes to be the sale of a particular estate, stated in the pleadings to be vested in the party and to be disposed of for the purpose of partition only. Therefore, if there be no such title, the purchaser has the same equity against being compelled to go on with his purchase as if the contract had been made without the intervention of the court, for, in truth, the title has never been judicially passed on between persons contesting it. Hence, if a purchaser pays his money on such a sale, and discovers a defect in the title at any time before a conveyance is executed, he may recover it back.

In South Carolina, it is held that the rule of caveat emptor does not apply to partition sales, and the purchaser at such a sale cannot be compelled to comply with his bid, unless a reasonably clear and marketable title is tendered him. McMichael v. McMichael, 51 S. C. 555, 29 S. E. 403; Fuller v. Missroon, 35 S. C. 314, 14 S. E. 714; Bolivar v. Zeigler, 9 S. C. 287.

In the latter case, in considering the reason for this rule, the court said: "Whatever doubts may have once been entertained as to whether the doctrine of caveat emptor get rid of the obligation of contracts solemnly entered into, especially as in cases like this, the court will afford reasonable opportunity for investigation of the titles to property sold under its order, and will even order a reference to ascertain whether they be good; still, where it appears that a purchaser at such sale has been imposed upon by fraud or misrepresentation, even when the misrepresentation was innocently made, as it was in this case, and where it further appears that he relied not upon his own investigation and judgment, but upon such misrepresentation, and that it was a principal inducement to the purchase, he is entitled, in an action brought against him for the purchase money, to relief, which may, according to the circumstances, consist either in a pro tanto abatement of the purchase price, or in a total rescission of the contract. Means v. Brickell, 2 Hill, L. 657, and Latimer v. Wharton, 41 S. C. 508, applied to sales made by the commissioner in equity, those doubts were finally settled by the principles established in the case of Equity. Comrs. v. Smith, 9 Rich. L. 515, and there can be now no doubt that this maxim does not apply to such sales, and, therefore, that the defense here set up, if established on the trial, will be a sufficient defense to the action. For, although the sale in this case was made by the sheriff, yet it was not a compulsory sale under process of execution, where the rule of caveat emptor does apply, but a sale for partition at the instance of the parties, and must be governed by the same principles as applied to such sales when made by the commissioner in equity."

A purchaser may defend a bond given to a sheriff at such a sale, on the ground that the parties to the action for partition had no title. Bolivar v. Zeigler, 9 S. C. 287.

But there being no implied warranty in a sale of land in partition proceedings, the purchaser at such a sale, from whom the land is recovered by a title paramount before the purchase money has been paid over by the ordinary conducting the sale, to the parties thereto, is not entitled to recover the same from the ordinary. Evans v. Dendy, 2 Speers, L. (S. C.) 9, 42 Am. Dec. 356.

At such a sale there is no implied warranty as to the quantity of land sold, and no deduction will be allowed for a deficiency unless it amounts to a failure of consideration, or defeats the great object of the purchaser, or is sufficient as evidence of a total mistake in the character of the land. Equity Comrs. v. Thompson, 4 M'Cord, L. 434.

A purchaser at a judicial sale who, before paying the price or entering into possession of the property purchased, discovered an 44 Am. St. Rep. 739, 19 S. E. 855, and the cases cited therein.

In this case, as the Hawkins lot is improved, and the lot which was intended to be sold is not improved, a pro tanto reduction of the purchase price would probably result inequitably to the heirs of Mr. Culp, who, according to the testimony, thought that only the vacant lot was being sold, and made it bring a price with which they were satisfied. Therefore, the sale should be wholly rescinded, and the original status of the parties restored, unless the defendants are now willing to confirm the purchase and pay the bond and mortgage sued on, and take that portion of the lot covered by the description of their deed, exclusive of the Hawkins lot.

illegality in the proceedings which led up to the sale, calculated to throw a cloud upon his title, may refuse to execute the purchase. Gassen v. Palfrey, 9 La. Ann. 560.

Ordinarily a purchaser at a judicial sale need not look beyond the order of the sale. This rule, however, applies only where the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and exercises powers vested in it by law. Hence, where a probate court cannot validly exercise its powers in connection with the disposal of the property of a minor, by one having no authority to represent the minor and receive the price in case of a sale, the purchaser at the sale is bound, at his risk and peril, to look behind the order of sale to ascertain whether the power exercised is one which could have been legally exercised. James v. Meyer, 41 La. Ann. 1100, 7 So. 618.

Where real estate at the time of its sale on partition proceedings was encumbered by two judgments which were of record, and would have been known to the purchaser before the sale but for his carelessness, and he apparently purchased the property subject to the judgments, he cannot thereafter restrain the enforcement of the judgments out of the property, or have the same paid from the money derived from the sale in the partition proceedings. Wood v. Winings, 58 Ind. 322.

But where a conveyance by commissioners of real estate, made by virtue of an order of the court in a suit for partition, passes no title to the purchaser because the land at the time of the sale was in the adverse possession of a third person, a note under seal given by such purchaser for the purchase price may be defended by him on the ground that it is not supported by valid consideration. Martin v. Pace, 6 Blackf. 99.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

MARY J. LOSEY, Appt.,

v.

ATCHISON, TOPEKA, & SANTA FE RAILWAY COMPANY.

(— Kan. —, 114 Pac. 198.)

Carrier — duty to shipper in yard.

1. Evidence that, at a railroad station where cattle in shipment were frequently detained at night, it was customary for persons accompanying live stock in transit to walk back and forth over the yards between their cars and the depot, is sufficient to justify a finding that the company owed a duty to such persons so engaged to give a warning of the approach of a train.

Same — contributory negligence — walking near tracks.

2. One who is accompanying live stock in shipment, and has occasion to walk at night between his train and a depot, cannot be said, as a matter of law, to be guilty of negligence if, in attempting to walk in the safe space between two tracks, he inadvertently gets close enough to one of them so that he is struck by an approaching train.

Same — failure of shipper to carry light — effect — proximate cause.

3. Where under such circumstances a shipper is killed by being struck, while walking near a track, by a freight train running backward without a sufficient watch being maintained at the rear, and without a whistle or bell being sounded, the fact that he was not carrying a lantern, although his shipping contract required him to do so, does not, as a matter of law, bar a recovery of damages on account of his death, since it does not conclusively prove that if he had carried a lantern he would have escaped injury.

Evidence — form of expression — effect.

4. The ordinary presumption is that a witness who uses the expression "I think" means that his observation was indistinct, or his recollection uncertain, regarding the matter testified to, rather than that he is without personal information on the subject.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mary J. Losey sued the Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fé Railway Company, alleging the death of her husband to have been caused by its negligence. A demurrer to her evidence was sustained, and she appeals.

There was evidence tending to show these facts: The deceased, Robert M. Losey, was accompanying a shipment of live stock and household goods. The train arrived at Strong City about 10 o'clock at night, and was placed on a siding; his car being about a block and a half east of the depot. Losey, with two other shippers, G. F. McClean and James H. Russell, went to the depot to learn when their train would leave, and were informed that it would not go out before morning. After eating at a restaurant they returned to the train to look after the stock and lock the cars for the night. They then started back to the depot to spend the night; the weather being cold. They walked west between the track on which their train stood and a track lying between four and five feet north of it; one witness said it was about four feet from the south rail of the north track to the cars on the other track. They all walked between the tracks, nearly abreast, Losey on the right, McClean on the left, and Russell a little behind them. When they were about halfway to the depot, the rear car (a coal car—that is, a flat car with a coal bin on top of it) of a part of a freight train backing west over the north track, at the rate of about five miles an hour, struck Losey, throwing him under the wheels and causing his death. His companions were listening, but heard no bell or whistle. They looked up the track before starting, but saw no train. None of the three carried a light of any kind. There was no person on the rear end of the rear car, but a brakeman with a lantern was on the other end of it, or on the nearer end of the car next to it. A string of freight cars stood on a track north of that on which the accident occurred. These cars, with those of the train to the south, increased the darkness by cutting off a part of the light from the street lamps. There was still enough light, however, so that a man could have been seen at a distance of two car lengths. It was usual for shippers of live stock, while waiting at Strong City at night, to walk back and forth between their cars and the depot over the railroad yards, as Losey did. After McClean had described the manner in which he and the two others walked between the tracks, this question was asked on cross-examination: "Mr. Losey, then, must have been walking on the ends of the ties of the track upon which the train was approaching, was he not?" He answered, "I rather think he was." Russell also testified that he believed Losey was walking on the ends of the ties. Russell himself was walking south of the ends of the ties, and was struck on the right shoulder by a coal car. It was not shown whether or not the ground between the tracks was surfaced up level with the ties.

It may fairly be inferred that it was sufficiently common for shippers of live stock to be walking at night near where the deceased was killed, so that the presence of some one there was reasonably to have been expected. Therefore there was room for a finding that the trainmen owed a duty to Losey to give warning of the approach of the train; for the evidence tends to show that he was not a trespasser, nor a mere licensee; that he was engaged in a legitimate errand incident to the proper care of his car, and was subject to the rule applicable to a shipper in charge of stock on a freight train. Coon v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 82 Kan. 311, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1013, 108 Pac. 85. The fact that McClean and Russell heard no bell or whistle, although they were listening, justifies an inference that none was sounded, unless the train was so long that the sound would not carry the distance. In that case there was warrant for holding the railroad company to the requirement of maintaining an efficient watch at the rear. Although the brakeman on the train may have been in a position to see the three men, the fact that he gave them no warning would support a finding that he was not keeping a sharp lookout, since there was evidence that a man could be seen at a distance of two car lengths. The alternative would be that he did see them, but remained silent—a less favorable supposition for the defendant. Upon these grounds we conclude that upon the issue of whether the company was negligent there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury.

A more difficult question is whether the deceased was himself, as a matter of law, guilty of such negligence as prevents a recovery. He was not in the situation of an ordinary passenger; that is, he was not absolved from all duty to watch for approaching trains. He was required to exercise care in that regard for his own protection, adapted to the circumstances. Ibid. If when struck he had been walking upon the track between the rails, while he might with equal convenience have walked in safety between the tracks, no recovery could be had, because it would then be clear that he had voluntarily and unnecessarily chosen an unsafe place in lieu of a safe one. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Schwindt, 67 Kan. 3, 72 Pac. 573; 33 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 826. If he had been walking upon the ends of the ties as a matter of deliberate choice, the situation would have been substantially the same, since he must have known that the danger there was as great as between the rails. Or if he occupied that position unconsciously, but by reason of a failure to use ordinary care to avoid it, his negligence would bar a recovery. But if he attempted to walk in the safe space between the two tracks, and while using reasonable diligence to that end inadvertently came within the overhang of the cars, and so met his death, he was not guilty of contributory negligence. We think the evidence is not necessarily inconsistent with the last hypothesis, and therefore that he cannot be said to have been negligent as a matter of law. He was, of course, in fact quite close to the track on which the train was approaching; but he may have supposed that he was near the middle of the space between the two tracks. In the yards, within so short a distance from the depot, it is not unreasonable to suppose the ballast between the tracks was surfaced even with the ties; the contrary not being shown, and the burden of proving contributory negligence being on the defendant. The presence of the freight train on the track to Losey's left may have made it easier for him to misjudge his position, or caused him involuntarily to incline to the other side, bringing him within reach of the cars on the right-hand track without his realizing it. Such an error under the circumstances cannot be said conclusively to show a want of ordinary care. It cannot be said with certainty that the exercise of reasonable diligence would enable one so situated to keep within the narrow zone of safety. Of a somewhat similar situation, it was said in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Troyer, 70 Neb. 293, 303, 304, 103 N. W. 680, 683, 684: "It is . . . argued . . . that in stepping to one side of the center of the path between the tracks where he was walking, so as to come in the path of the projecting portions of the engine, his act was equivalent to stepping between the rails of the track with knowledge, which he is shown to have possessed, that this track was being used by passing engines and cars, used in and about the business of the company in its freight yard where the injury occurred. . . . A person in walking between the two tracks . . . would at times, in all probability and perhaps unconsciously, swerve his body from the true center line, so as to come within the path of the overhanging parts of a car or engine moving on the adjacent track. Under such circumstances we cannot believe that negligence ought, as a matter of law, to be imputed to one who, while thus traveling, permitted himself to depart from the straight and narrow path in so slight a degree and, because of which, came in collision with a moving object on the track, the coming of which he was wholly unconscious of."

The language quoted is obviously in point, although the decision in support of which it is used might perhaps be distinguished from the present one upon various grounds. With this possible exception none of the many cases cited in the plaintiff's brief quite reaches the precise point here involved. A number of them relate to the duty of looking and listening before crossing a track, or while necessarily or excusably upon a track. There is abundant authority for the proposition that if one is rightfully upon a track the question of how often he must look for an approaching train, in order to show due diligence, is one for the determination of the jury. But the contention of the defendant is that Losey was negligent in unnecessarily placing himself in a position of peril. In the cases most nearly resembling the present one, the following differences may be noted. In two the public were accustomed to use the railroad track as a pathway, and it does not appear that there was a safe place by the side of the track. Stanley v. Durham & N. R. Co. 120 N. C. 514, 27 S. E. 27; Bourassa v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 75 N. H. 359, 74 Atl. 590. In two a person walking between two tracks got upon one of them in avoiding an engine which approached him on the other, occasioning some fright and confusion on his part. Laverenz v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 56 Iowa, 689, 10 N. W. 268; Ray v. Aberdeen & R. E. R. Co. 141 N. C. 84, 53 S. E. 622. In another the space between the tracks, although as a matter of fact reasonably safe, was "not wholly free from obstructions more or less formidable to those walking after night." Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Lagerkrans, 65 Neb. 566, 91 N. W. 358, 95 N. W. 2.

A shipping contract had been issued to and signed by Losey, which included an agreement as to his conduct thus expressed: "We, the undersigned, owners or in charge of the live stock . . . mentioned in the within contract . . . agree that . . . (we) will not walk or stand on any track or station or other places at night or in the dark without a lantern, and will not be upon or attempt to cross any track while switching is being or is about to be done thereon, or cars moved thereon, but will first use every effort to ascertain whether it is safe to go upon or across said track or tracks." Except for a reference to a lantern, this language does not materially alter the situation, since with this exception the obligation assumed is substantially what the law would impose in any event, being implied in the requirement that the shipper should use reasonable diligence for his own protection. Moreover, as already stated, the evidence does not conclusively establish that Losey's getting upon the track, or too near the track, was either intentional or negligent.

The failure to comply with the requirement regarding a lantern is not a bar to a recovery, unless the evidence conclusively establishes that if the deceased had carried a lantern he would have escaped injury. The mere possibility or probability that such would have been the case is not enough. Such an omission, in order to constitute contributory negligence, must have been the proximate cause of the injury (29 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 526-528); that is, one without which the injury would not have occurred. 32 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 745, note 77; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 371. A lantern might have helped him to judge of his own true position with regard to the track, but would not necessarily have prevented a mistake; nor can the court say with certainty that it would have been of material aid in this respect, in view of the manner in which a light sometimes interferes with the vision of one who carries it. If it were established that the brakeman on the train had been keeping a lookout along the track, it might be said that he certainly must have seen the lantern, although he might not have been able to see the men without it. But there is no conclusive evidence that the brakeman was in fact watching the track, or, indeed, any evidence whatever to that effect. Therefore it is not proved that the absence of the lantern caused the injury.

The court sustained objections to several answers given by witnesses, and a review of these rulings is sought. McClean, having testified that he had looked up the track before starting for the depot, was asked whether Russell and Losey had done the same. He answered, "I think they did," and the answer was stricken out. If a witness employs such an expression as "I think" or "I believe," meaning that his uncertainty results, either from lack of close observation of the fact originally or from want of clear recollection regarding it, his testimony is admissible, and the qualification goes to its weight; but if he means that he did not observe the fact at all, and so has no personal information regarding it, and has acquired his opinion from other sources, his testimony is incompetent. 1 Wigmore, Ev. §§ 658, 726, 727, 728, and cases cited, and also additional cases in volume 5, § 728. Ordinarily there may be something in the manner of the witness that helps to show what he really intends, but here this aid was not available, for the evidence was by deposition. Usually further questions develop the source of his belief; but here the subject was not pursued, either in direct or cross-examination. That a witness uses the expression "I think" does not of itself indicate an entire want of personal knowledge on the subject, and in the present instance there is nothing in the circumstances to suggest that such meaning was intended. The witness had an opportunity to observe the conduct of his associates, and, when he says that he thinks they looked up the track, he must be deemed to be speaking from his observation and recollection, rather than from his judgment of what they would have been likely to do.

In answer to the question whether Losey and McClean looked up and down the track at the same time he did, Russell answered, "I couldn't say as to that, but I rather think they did." This is not essentially different from the reply given by McClean. We think the natural presumption is that the witness meant that he could not speak with certainty, but thought he had observed such conduct on their part.

McClean was also asked whether there was a brakeman or other person on the rear end of the car that struck Losey. He answered, "I don't think there was; I think he was likely in the second car." This, as well as another similar answer, was stricken out. The witness testified in substance that at the time of the accident he did not know what had happened until he had assisted Russell, who had been hit; that he then looked up and saw the cars going by; that about opposite him he saw a man with a lantern on the rear of the first car or the front end of the second, who came down from the car and proved to be a brakeman; that a few minutes later several other persons came. This shows enough actual observation to give a basis for the testimony.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance herewith.

Burch, J., dissenting:

In order that the appellee may discharge

its public duties as a common carrier, it is entitled to the exclusive possession of its switch yards and tracks, and it owes no duty to be cautious toward one who enters upon such property without right. "A railway company has exclusive right to occupy, use, and enjoy its railway tracks, trestlework, and bridges, and such exclusive right is absolutely necessary to enable it to properly perform its duties; and any person walking upon a track or bridge, or any part of the same, of a railway track [company] without the consent of the company is held in law to be there wrongfully, and therefore to be a trespasser; and in case of an injury happening to such person while so trespassing upon it, from the movement or operation of the cars of the company over it, he is without remedy, unless it be proved by affirmative evidence that the injuries resulted from negligence so gross as to amount to wantonness." Mason v. Missouri P. R. Co. 27 Kan. 83, 84, 41 Am. Rep. 405 (syllabus).

The need of shippers to walk through the yards at Strong City and the danger attending such conduct had been considered by the appellee. If such persons were allowed to roam at will about the yards, along and across the tracks and among moving trains of cars, the appellee would be obliged to put into effect a special set of regulations for the handling of its business and the protection of stockmen at that point. So the appellee chose to withhold liberty to use its grounds, except upon certain definite and specific conditions. By mutual agreement with Losey it was provided that he would not walk upon any track or other place at night, or in the dark, without a lantern (evidently to guide his own footsteps and to disclose his whereabouts to train men), would not be on any track while switching was being done, and would use every effort to ascertain whether it was safe to go upon or across the tracks. The matter was a fair subject of contract, and the conditions imposed were reasonable and beneficial to both parties. Two of these provisions were positive conditions, and the third superseded the common measure of prudence with the requirement that Losey should use the utmost effort to avoid danger. This contract was the source and measure of Losey's right. It gave him the privilege which he did not otherwise possess, and unless he complied with its terms he could not justify his presence at the place where he was injured. The appellee's duty was measured by the same contract, and Losey could not at will substitute in his own favor another right and another duty by a deliberate disregard of his contract. He was obliged to regulate his con-

Whatever the appellee's relation to other shippers may have been, its liability in this case can be founded only upon a breach of the duty which it owed to Losey. United States Exp. Co. v. Everest, 72 Kan. 517, 522, 83 Pac. 817; Carey v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. — Kan. —, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 114 Pac. 197. The fact that other shippers of live stock were accustomed to walk through the yards means nothing. Probably it occasioned the contract with Losey. There is nothing to show that the other shippers referred to were under contract not to do as they did, and in any event Losey's contract cannot be avoided by proof of a custom. Ft. Scott, W. & W. R. Co. v. Sparks, 55 Kan. 288, 297, 39 Pac. 1032.

No monitor was needed to tell Losey that walking at night, without a light, down a railroad track in crowded yards where switching was going on, was dangerous. If so, the track and the surroundings were sufficient, and his contract was sufficient.

The result is that the appellee owed no duty to Losey, except not to injure him wantonly when he went about the yards at night without a lantern, and when he went upon the track while switching was being done; and, having voluntarily placed himself in a position of danger in violation of the terms of his contract, an action for damages resulting from his injury cannot successfully be maintained. Ft. Scott, W. & W. R. Co. v. Sparks, 55 Kan. 288, and cases cited at page 295.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA

v.

J. H. NICHOLS, Plff. in Err.

(67 W. Va. 659, 69 S. E. 304.)

Intoxicating liquor — unlawful sale by agent — liability.

1. An unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors made by the agent or bartender of a licensed saloon keeper, at his place of business, is a sale by both, and the saloon keeper, as well as his agent, is liable.

Same — effect of instructions.

2. In such case the saloon keeper cannot escape liability on the ground that his agent made the unlawful sale without his knowledge and in violation of his express instructions. The unlawful sale constitutes the offense, and the seller's motive is immaterial.

Same — sale to minor.

3. If a licensed saloon keeper or his agent deliver intoxicating liquor to a minor, and receive from him the money therefor, under the belief, however induced, that the minor is buying as agent for another whose identity is unknown and is not disclosed, it constitutes a sale to the minor.

(October 18, 1910.)

Note. — Criminal responsibility for sale of intoxicating liquor by partner, servant, or agent.

The present note is supplementary to notes on the same subject appended to Bryan v. Adler, 41 L.R.A. 660; State v. Gilmore, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 786; and Partidge v. State, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 321.

Authority in fact.

While, as shown in the earlier notes, the question whether express or implied authority from the defendant to his partner, servant, or agent by whom the alleged illegal sale was made, is often decisive of his criminal responsibility, it is not always so, for the reason that even though express authority cannot be shown, implied authority from the defendant, or at least his knowledge of the violation of the law, may be inferred from the circumstances of the case.

For example, the decision in Com. v. Perry, 148 Mass. 160, 19 N. E. 212, is merely to the effect that evidence tending to show a sale by a clerk of the defendant in the regular course of defendant's business is sufficient to warrant a finding that the sale was authorized by him.

And even proof of formal instructions by defendant to his employee not to make sales in violation of law does not necessarily negative implied authority, since the evidence may justify the conclusion that those instructions were merely colorable, and not in good faith.

Thus, while the court in Hugill v. Merrifield, 12 U. C. C. P. 269, held that an instruction that defendant would be liable for a sale of liquor during prohibited hours by his bartender, though done in direct opposition to his commands, was too broad, it recognized that the defendant would be responsible if the circumstances led to the conclusion that the command was merely colorable and intended only to evade responsibility.

And it will be observed that the results in the cases next cited rest upon the ground that express or implied authority might be inferred from the circumstances; at least the cases do not necessarily involve the proposition that the defendant is responsible for the act of his partner, servant, or ERROR to the Circuit Court for Cabell County to review a judgment convicting defendant of selling intoxicating liquors to a minor in violation of law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Lewis D. Isbell, for plaintiff in error:

The sale was to a guest of the hotel in his room.

State v. Davis, 62 W. Va. 500, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1142, 60 S. E. 584.

Mr. William G. Conley, Attorney General, for the State:

A licensee cannot be excused from criminal liability if he sells to a minor, whatever imposition may be practised upon him; and he cannot escape liability for an unlawful sale made to a minor by an employee without his knowledge, even though he has instructed such employee to make no sales to minors, for the act of the employee, while carrying on the licensed business, is his act, and the offense is completed when the sale is made either by himself or his employee.

It is no defense that the barkeeper supposed and intended that the liquor sold Peabody was to be used by an adult.

Com. v. O'Leary, 143 Mass. 95, 8 N. E.

agent, without reference to authority express or implied.

An employer engaged in the unlawful business of selling liquor is criminally liable for a sale made by his employee in the course of the employer's business, whether the employer be present and consenting to the particular sale or not. Cox v. State, 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 129, 104 Pac. 1074, rehearing denied in 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 129, 105 Pac. 369; Stack v. State, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 109 Pac. 126. Upon this hypothesis it is clear that the authority of the agent is implied.

The decision in State v. Winner, 153 N. C. 602, 69 S. E. 9, is merely to the effect if defendant knew of an arrangement on his premises by which liquor was furnished to a customer without the appearance of any person, he was guilty as a principal, and that it was inconceivable that such an arrangement could exist on his place of business without his knowledge.

In State v. Brown, 151 Mo. App. 349, 131 S. W. 760, where the defendant was present at the time the sale was made, even though he did not make it himself, the court said that it did not make a particle of difference in the criminal liability whether he handed out the liquor and took the money, or his agent did that service for him, declaring generally that when a person acts as a servant or agent of another in selling intoxicating liquors in violation of law, either may be indicted.

A principal who sells intoxicating liquor and delivers it by the hand of his agent, in a local option district, is jointly indictable with the latter for violation of the local option law. Com. v. Bottom, 140 Ky. 212, 130 S. W. 1091. This is a case where the principal knew, and at least impliedly authorized, the act of the agent.

One having control of a place knowingly allows it, permits it, to be used as a place of resort, within the meaning of a statute directed against the maintenance of liquor nuisances, if he has authority over it to prevent that use or to permit that use, and he permits it. State v. Fogg, — Me. —, 77 Atl. 714.

If a sale to a minor in violation of law is made by defendant's clerk, and it was authorized by him by special authority in the particular case or by a general authority which included it, it would be no defense to show that he did not intend to make sales to minors, but was negligent in not taking any measures to prevent them. Com. v. Stevens, 155 Mass. 291, 29 N. E. 508. The court in this case, however, recognizes that the test of the master's liability for the act of his servant is whether or not it is done by his authority; but adds that if the act is the master's because done by the servant within his authority, and especially if it is an act which is made punishable, even when done in ignorance of its punishable quality, the statute applies to the master as well as to the servant.

As shown in the earlier notes, there is some conflict among the cases which hold or assume that the criminal responsibility of the defendant rests upon express or implied authority, as to whether the burden of proof as to authority rests upon the prosecution or on the defendant. In addition to the cases on that point cited in the other notes, it is held in State v. Heinze, 45 Mo. App. 403 and Liberty v. Moran, 121 Mo. App. 682, 97 S. W. 948, that proof that a sale in violation of law was made by an agent presumptively shows authority, consent, or knowledge of the principal.

View that authority, express or implied, is necessary.

The cases cited in this note reflect the conflict of authority disclosed by the other notes on the question of substantive law, whether express or implied authority from the defendant is essential to his criminal responsibility for a sale of liquor by his partner, agent, or servant in violation of law. In view of the tendency of the courts in any event to hold that the proof of the illegal sale is at least prima facie evidence of authority, the practical question is generally whether proof of such sale merely makes a prima facie case or a con-

887; Sumner v. State, 4 Ind. App. 403, 30 N. E. 1105; People v. Garrett, 68 Mich. 487, 36 N. W. 234, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 399.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

J. H. Nichols, the proprietor of a hotel and a licensed saloon keeper in the city of Huntington, was convicted in the criminal court of Cabell county for unlawfully selling spirituous liquors to Frank Peabody, a minor, and on the 3d of March, 1908, was fined $50. The judge of the circuit court of said county refused a writ of error, and one was awarded by this court.

It is insisted that the verdict is against the evidence, and that the criminal court clusive case against the defendant. This question depends to a considerable extent upon the terms of the particular statute under which the case is decided; and some cases make a distinction between a sale without a license and a sale in violation of a license.

Thus, in State v. Fagan, — Del. —, 74 Atl. 692, where defendant, having a license to sell only liquors to be drunk on the premises, was charged with selling liquor to be drunk off the premises, the court said that, as the defendant was the recipient of a license from the state giving him the authority and the privilege to sell liquor in a certain manner, and as he saw proper to conduct his business under that license by the agency of a bartender, he, as principal, must be held prima facie liable for the sales of liquor made by his agent in a manner different from that authorized by his license, and beyond and without the authority of a license. The court further held, however, that, as the defendant was not charged with a violation of his license in the sense of the rule laid down in the case of State v. Peo, 1 Penn. (Del.) 525, 42 Atl. 622, he might avoid this prima facie liability by producing evidence in rebuttal that the act of his bartender was without his authority or knowledge and against his instructions. The court said in this connection: "When a principal is charged with selling liquor by an agent or servant, not in violation of a license, but without a license, and a conviction is sought, it must appear expressly, or by implication such as that indicated in this case, that he gave authority to or had knowledge of his agent's acts, just as in any other case where criminal responsibility is sought to be attached to a principal for the wrongdoing of his agent."

A majority of the court of criminal appeals of Texas, in Ollre v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 520, 123 S. W. 1116, were of the opinion that a sale of intoxicating liquor during prohibited hours, by an agent, clerk, or employee, established merely a prima facie case, and not a conclusive case against the owner of the premises under a errred in overruling a motion to set it aside and grant defendant a new trial, and that it also erred in refusing to give the jury certain instructions, and in refusing to permit a certain question to be answered by defendant's witness.

The state proved that Frank Peabody, a boy seventeen years old, bought from William Reible, defendant's bartender, a half pint of whisky in June, 1907, and paid him the money for it. These facts are not controverted. The defense is that the sale was not made to the boy, who was at the time serving as bell boy in the hotel of defendant, but that it was made to some guest in the hotel, through the boy, who was simply acting as agent of the purchaser. But the boy did not say statute prescribing that certain offenses against the liquor law, including sales during prohibited hours "by any agent, clerk, or other person acting for any retail liquor dealer, . . . shall be deemed and taken to be for all purposes of this act as the act of such retail liquor dealer or retail malt dealer or other person." In other words the principal is not precluded by the mere fact that his agent, clerk, or employee has sold in violation of the statute, but has the right to show want of authority on the latter's part. This decision was based largely on the fact that the statute in question was adopted from Missouri, and that such construction had been previously placed upon it by the Missouri court, citing in this connection State v. McCance, 110 Mo. 398, 19 S. W. 848. Two of the judges prepared elaborate dissenting opinions.

To the same effect are Freedman v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 115, 38 S. W. 993; Pecaria v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 139, 90 S. W. 42; Holland v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 101 S. W. 1001, and other Texas cases cited in the earlier notes.

So, a conviction of selling intoxicating liquor without a license cannot rest upon evidence merely that the person who made the sale was the defendant's clerk, in the absence of any evidence that defendant authorized the sale or participated therein. Daniel v. State, 149 Ala. 44, 43 So. 22, citing Seibert v. State, 40 Ala. 60.

A conviction of a corporation of selling intoxicating liquor to a minor cannot be sustained where the state's evidence negated the idea that the agent of the corporation either knew of, consented to, or permitted the delivery of the liquor to the purchaser. Southern Exp. Co. v. State, 1 Ga. App. 700, 58 S. E. 87. Apparently it was not proved that the boy by whom the liquor was delivered was in the employment of the corporation.

A wife is not subject to the penalty prescribed by statute for selling or allowing liquors to be sold unlawfully upon one's premises, by reason of sales by her husband at her grocery store, of which he was that he bought the whisky for any person other than himself, or that he told the bartender that he wanted it for a guest of the hotel. Nor does it appear that the bartender even inquired of him whether he was getting the whisky for himself, or for another person to whom the saloon keeper may have had a right to sell. So that, upon these uncontradicted facts, it becomes a question of law whether or not it was an unlawful sale. Section 21, chap. 32, Code 1906, makes it a penal offense for a person having a state license to sell or give spirituous liquors, wine, porter, ale, beer, etc., to a minor; and § 23 of the same chapter says that a sale by one person for another shall be deemed a sale by both, and makes both liable, either jointly or severally. Hence it is not material to inquire whether or not Reible was instructed by the defendant not to sell to minors. There is no pretense that the sale by Reible was not for Nichols, and, being made by his agent for him, the statute says it is a sale by both Reible and Nichols. Consequently, the intent of Nichols to observe the law is immaterial. The question of his intention is not an ingredient of the offense. The act of making the sale is a positive act implying volition, understanding, will; from its very nature a sale could never be accidental. One cannot make sale of an article, and receive the money for it, without knowing it, and without willing to do the act. It is the sale alone that manager, she being unaware that he was selling liquor at that place, and in fact having expressly forbidden him to do so. Thurman v. Adams, 82 Miss. 204, 33 So. 944. The court distinguishes between this case and cases where the principal was in the liquor business, and was charged with violations, such as sales to minors or intoxicated persons. See, in this connection, Teasdale v. State, — Miss. —, 3 So. 245, holding that the fact that a clerk violated instructions of a druggist and sold without his knowledge or consent is immaterial, under a statute which subjects to punishment not only the person violating the law by personally selling, but also "any person who may own or have any interest in any vinous or spirituous liquors sold contrary to this act."

So, a dramshop keeper is only prima facie liable for the act of his agent, and he may show that he in good faith gave positive orders not to make such sale. State v. McCance, 110 Mo. 402, 19 S. W. 648; State v. Weber, 111 Mo. 204, 20 S. W. 33.

In passing on the question whether the action of the license commissioners in revoking a license on complaint that the licensee had violated the law by selling liquor to an intoxicated person was binding upon the sureties on his bond, the court remarked, arguendo, that a violation by an agent or servant of the holder of the license would constitute a breach of the bond conditioned upon constant adherence to the terms of the license, but that the licensee could not be convicted of crime because of a violation of the act by his servant not authorized or ratified by him. State v. Corron, 73 N. H. 434, 62 Atl. 1044, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 486.

To warrant a conviction for sales by a bartender to excepted persons, it must either appear that defendant gave no orders not to sell to such persons, or that if such orders were given they were not in good faith. Com. v. Titlow, 28 Pa. Co. Ct. 341.

One cannot be convicted of maintaining a liquor nuisance by proof of sales on Sunday by an agent employed by him on week days, without proof or knowledge on his part of the unlawful act on Sunday, and without proof of authority, either express or to be inferred from the testimony in the case, that the agent might act for him on Sunday. State v. Burke, 15 R. I. 324, 4 Atl. 761.

A licensee who has given notice to his employees not to sell intoxicating liquor to children under fourteen years of age, except in sealed and corked bottles, is not responsible for a violation of those instructions by a bartender without his knowledge or connivance, under a statute providing for the conviction of one who knowingly sells or allows any person to sell intoxicating liquors to children in contravention of the statute. Emary v. Nolloth [1903] 2 K. B. 264, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 620, 67 J. P. 354, 89 L. T. N. S. 100, 19 Times L. R. 530, 52 Week. Rep. 107, 20 Cox, C. C. 507, 620. The decision is upon the ground that the word in the statute "allows" imports notice; and that while one may be held to have allowed the thing to be done when he has delegated his authority to another by whom it is done, yet he cannot be deemed to have allowed it to be done where he kept control, and did not delegate his authority, it appearing that he was present and in control of the business though he did not see the transaction in question.

In some instances the statute, by expressly declaring the defendant responsible for the acts of one class of persons, impliedly negatives his responsibility for those of another class.

Thus, one partner is not criminally responsible for an unlawful sale of liquor by a copartner, under a statute declaring that any person or principal shall be liable for the acts of its clerk, servant, agent, or employee for a violation of the law, there being no evidence that he had any connection with or knowledge of the unlawful sale. State v. Burns, — S. D. —, 126 N. W. 572. Compare with State v. Grant, 20 S. D. 164, 105 N. W. 97, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1017, holding that a statute imposes upon the keeper of a bar or saloon the affirmative duty to see that it is closed during certain hours and on holidays, and the neglect of this duty is an offense, and it is constitutes the offense, and the law does not stop to inquire into the motives of the seller. Whatever the motive may be, it cannot change the nature of the offense. State v. Denoon, 31 W. Va. 125, 5 S. E. 315; State v. Gilmore, 80 Vt. 514, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 786, 68 Atl. 658, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 321; State v. Kittelle, 110 N. C. 560, 15 L.R.A. 694, 28 Am. St. Rep. 698, 15 S. State*, 37 Miss. 379; Carroll v. State, 63 Md. 551, 3 Atl. 29; State v. Hartfel, 24 Wis. 60; People v. Roby, 52 Mich. 577, 50 Am. Rep. 270, 18 N. W. 305; Paducah v. Jones, 126 Ky. 809, 104 S. W. 971; Woolen & T. Intoxicating Liquors, § 725; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 418. However, the decisions of the courts of the several states are not uniform on this question. A large number of them hold that an unlawful sale made by the agent without the knowledge and assent, express or implied, of the principal, or a sale made in violation of his express directions, is not a sale by the principal. A number of decisions taking this view of the law are cited in the case of State v. Gilmore, 80 Vt. 514, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 786, 68 Atl. 658, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 321. But the better view seems to us to be the one followed by this court in State v. Denoon, supra.

no defense to show that the place was open by an agent, servant, or employee without authority or contrary to direction.

View that authority, express or implied, is unnecessary.

The view taken by some of the courts, as shown in the earlier notes, that proof of a sale in violation of law by a partner, servant, or agent conclusively established the criminal responsibility of the defendant, without reference to the question of express or implied authority, is sustained by some of the later cases.

Thus, under a statute declaring that one who shall sell for himself or another, or be interested in the sale of liquor without a license, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, the owner or proprietor of a saloon is responsible for the illegal sales of liquor made by his servant and agent within the scope of their general employment. Bell v. State, 93 Ark. 600, 125 S. W. 1021, quoting from Robinson v. State, 38 Ark. 641: "The law says to persons wishing to engage in selling liquors, 'You must be careful in the selection of your partners or servants, and watchful of their conduct in your business; for, if they make forbidden sales, you are responsible. You must see that sales in which you are interested are not made without license.'"

In Walters v. State, — Ind. —, 92 N. E. 537, applying the doctrine that it is no defense that a sale is made by a clerk without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, the court said that criminal intent is not an essential ingredient of the offense; that "when appellant elected to engage in the sale of articles subject to legal restrictions, he did so at his own peril, and cannot escape responsibility for the nonobservance of such regulations, on the ground that he did not knowingly violate the law."

So, a saloon keeper is responsible for the act of his bartender in selling liquors on Sunday, as though he made the sale himself. He cannot be shielded by the fact that he has given his agent positive instructions not to make such sale. Olson v. State, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

143 Wis. 413, 127 N. W. 975. The court said that the statute imposed a penalty upon the acts prescribed, irrespective of the motive or intent of the person doing them; its purpose being to regulate the conduct of the liquor business, and to prohibit the specified acts whether done by the licensee himself as principal, or by his bartender as agent.

A licensee is answerable for the acts of an agent though he was absent from the place of business, and instructed the agent not to make the forbidden sales, under a statute providing in effect that if the licensee shall sell or give away intoxicating liquors to minors without the written authority of parent or guardian, his license shall be subject to revocation. State ex rel. Conlin v. Wausau, 137 Wis. 311, 118 N. W. 810. The court said that while the system grants the licensee the privilege of conducting the business through an agent, it also imposes upon him the affirmative duty to see to it that every regulation is obeyed by his agents as well as by himself.

Under a statute providing that the occupant of any place in which a violation of the act shall have taken place shall be personally liable to a penalty, notwithstanding that the sale, barter, or traffic be made by some other person who cannot be proved to have so acted under or by direction of the occupant, the occupant is responsible in all cases, and he cannot be heard to say that the act was done by some other person without his direction. Reg. v. Green, 30 U. C. Q. B. 84.

In Austin v. Davis, 7 Ont. App. Rep. 478, it is held that not even instructions to a bartender not to sell to a particular person would relieve the employer from liability for the penalty prescribed by statute against one who, being notified not to sell liquor to one in the habit of becoming intoxicated, delivers or "suffers to be delivered" any liquors to such person.

Rex v. McQuarrie, 37 N. B. 374, seems to hold that even where the sale was by an hostler in a livery stable, it was not necessary to introduce any proof that the sale

A licensed saloon keeper usually conducts the business of selling liquors through agents, clerks, or bartenders, not in person; and if he were permitted to defend an indictment for unlawful selling, on the ground that his bartender had violated his instructions, the result would be that a conviction in many such cases could not be had, and the statute, in a large measure, would be defeated. Such a defense is of a kind that is easy to manufacture to suit the emergency, yet difficult to overthrow, and many unscrupulous persons would not hesitate to fabricate such facts as would be needful to accomplish their defense.

We do not see how the jury could have found any other verdict upon the evidence than "guilty." The boy, at the time in question, was a bell boy in defendant's hotel. The defense which was sought to be made is that it was customary for the bell boy to get whisky for the guests of the hotel, on their orders, and carry it to their rooms, and that Reible thought the boy was getting the whisky on this occasion for a guest, and let him have it in good faith, believing it was for a guest. But there is no evidence that the boy told Reible that he was getting the whisky for another.

Reible's testimony on this point is as follows:

Q. About the latter part of June, 1907, Frank Peabody says that he purchased a half pint of whisky from you. State what was with the authority or by the direction of the employer, the defendant, or that he was in any way connected therewith.

The apparent conflict among the Michigan cases on the question is due to differences in the phraseology of the statutory provisions under which the cases were decided. In People v. Metzger, 95 Mich. 121, 54 N. W. 639, it was held that one could not be convicted for the act of his bartender in making unlawful sales of liquor, where he knew nothing of such sales and had not directed them.

But as pointed out in People v. Longwell, 120 Mich. 320, 79 N. W. 488, the Metzger Case was decided under a statute which made a sale by a clerk or an agent "prima facie" evidence of intent on the part of the employer, thus negating any intention on the part of the legislature to make the employer responsible for the act of his employee, irrespective of his actual intent.

In the Longwell Case it was held under a statute declaring that "any person who himself, or by his clerk, agent, or employee," shall violate any of the provisions of a designated section, which prohibits, inter alia, the sale by a druggist to a person intoxicated, it is no defense that the sale was made by a clerk in the employment of the druggist, without his knowledge or consent.

was said when he made that purchase, and what it was for.

A. He purchased it for upstairs for the rooms,—he had always taken the order up and fetched the money,—he was there as bell boy, and would get the orders and take them up.

It will be observed that he does not say that the boy told him he had an order from a guest for the whisky, or that the boy said anything which would justify the inference that he was getting it for anyone but himself. If Reible thought that a guest of the hotel had sent the boy for the whisky, it was his duty, at least, to have ascertained who the principal was, and what authority the boy had to act for him. The evidence shows that Reible was culpably negligent in this respect. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to defendant, it proves that his bartender delivered whisky to a bell boy in defendant's hotel, whom he knew to be a minor, and received the money therefor from him, under the impression and belief that the bell boy was getting it for some guest in the hotel, who was unknown to the bartender. But it does not follow that a lawful sale could be made to every guest. The guest might himself be an infant. It seems to be a rule of law well settled by decisions, and recognized by all text writers on the subject, that where a sale of intoxicating liquor is made to a minor for an undisclosed principal, it is a sale to the

The case of People v. Parks, 49 Mich. 333, 13 N. W. 618, was distinguished on the same ground as the Metzger Case; and Faulks v. People, 39 Mich. 200, 33 Am. Rep. 374, upon the ground that the statute involved in that case did not contain the words employed in the statute involved in the Longwell Case, "or by his clerk, agent, or employee."

While cases involving the violation of provisions of the statute against keeping saloons open on Sunday or holidays are not within the scope of this note, it may be remarked here that the Michigan cases (People v. Roby, 52 Mich. 577, 50 Am. Rep. 270, 18 N. W. 365; People v. Kriesel, 136 Mich. 80, 98 N. W. 850, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 5; People v. Lundell, 136 Mich. 303, 99 N. W. 12; People v. Possing, 137 Mich. 303, 100 N. W. 396; People v. Tolman, 148 Mich. 305, 111 N. W. 772,) holding that the defendant is criminally responsible for his agent's violation of those provisions, irrespective of the question of knowledge or authority are distinguishable from the Parks Case and the Metzger Case upon the ground that the Sunday closing provision of the statute makes no reference to the intention of the defendant.

minor. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 337; 23 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 196; and Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 420. This rule of the criminal law is not inconsistent with the general law of agency, which treats a contract made by an agent with a third person, for an undisclosed principal, as the contract of either the agent or his principal, at the election of the other contracting party after he has discovered the principal and the relation of agency. This is generally true, whether the agent assumed to act in an individual capacity or as the agent for another who is not disclosed. Story, Agency, § 160; 1 Clark & S. Agency, § 457; 2 Clark & S. Agency, §§ 568, 569; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1124; 31 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1574.

"If liquor is sold to a minor who at the time declares that he is purchasing it for another whose name is not disclosed, the sale must be regarded as made to the minor, and not to the undisclosed principal, and the seller is liable to punishment under a statute making it criminal to sell liquor to a minor." Neely v. State, 60 Ark. 66, 27 L.R.A. 503, 46 Am. St. Rep. 148, 28 S. W. 800.

In Ross v. People, 17 Hun, 591, Ross was convicted of selling liquor to a minor, under a statute of New York almost identical with the statute of West Virginia, forbidding sales of liquor to minors. The boy purchased the liquor as agent for one Martin, an adult, who lived in the home with him, and with money furnished by his principal, but did not disclose his principal. It was held "that the conviction was proper, and that the fact that the boy was acting as agent for an undisclosed principal did not relieve the accused from penalties imposed by the statute."

In Ritcher v. State, 63 Miss. 304, the defendant was convicted of selling to a minor, and offered to prove that the minor purchased as agent for the minor's uncle and for the uncle's use, with money furnished by him. The trial court excluded this evidence, and it was held not error because there was no offer to prove that the agency was known at the time of the sale. "For if the minor was acting as agent it was an agency for an undisclosed principal, and, as in such case either might be treated as the buyer of the liquor, R. is guilty of the charge of selling to the minor."

Under a statute of Massachusetts forbidding the sale or delivery of intoxicating liquor to a minor, the supreme court held that it was a violation of law to deliver it to a minor even as agent for a disclosed principal. Com. v. Joslin, 158 Mass. 482, 21 L.R.A. 449, 33 N. E. 653.

held to be no defense that the minor told the saloon keeper at the time of buying the whisky that it was for his sick mother, and that the saloon keeper was induced to believe the statement from the fact that his mother had on two or three previous occasions sent him for whisky, and that the saloon keeper acted in good faith. See also Sumner v. State, 4 Ind. App. 403, 30 N. E. 1105; State v. McLain, 49 Mo. App. 398; Horsky v. State (June, 1896) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 36 S. W. 443.

"Although a minor acts as the agent of his parent in purchasing liquor, if that fact be not disclosed to the seller at the time of the purchase, and the sale is made without the parent's written consent or order, it is unlawful, and a subsequent disclosure of the agency will not avoid a conviction." Siceluff v. State, 52 Ark. 56, 11 S. W. 964.

In Com. v. Finnegan, 124 Mass. 325, Finnegan was convicted of selling intoxicating liquor to Robert E. Devine, a minor. It appears that Devine had authority from his mother to get whisky for her use and on her account, and had done so frequently; but on the occasion in question he and two other boys made up the sum of 25 cents and went to defendant's place of business and bought a bottle of whisky. The supreme court upheld the following instruction given by the trial court, viz.: "That if Devine, when he bought the whisky, acted under authority from his mother, and bought it for her, the defendant could not be convicted; but if he did not act under authority from her, but bought the whisky for himself and the other boys, it would be a sale to him, although he had authority from his mother to buy for her, and stated to the defendant that he was buying for her, and the defendant believed that he was so buying."

The recent decision by this court, State v. McNeal, 66 W. Va. 411, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 178, 135 Am. St. Rep. 1038, 66 S. E. 512, harmonizes perfectly with the foregoing authorities. In that case the father, Ben Jaggie, had told McNeal, the saloon keeper, to let his son Joe, a minor, have spirituous liquors whenever he sent him with a written order for it. McNeal delivered whisky to Joe Jaggie on a written order from Joe's father, and he carried it to his father. That was a very different case from the one under review. That was clearly not a sale to Joe Jaggie, but only a delivery of the goods to him on a sale to the father, a known purchaser. In the present case there is no evidence that the minor, Frank Peabody, was acting as an agent for either a disclosed or an undisclosed principal; hence there can be no question that the sale was made to him.

There seems to be no conflict in the decisions on the question that a sale of intoxicating liquors to a minor who buys as agent for an undisclosed principal is a sale to the minor, in view of statutes forbidding sales of such liquors to minors.

The court refused to give defendant's instructions numbered 1, 2, and 3, and this is assigned as error. No. 1 would tell the jury that they must believe that the sale of whisky was to Frank Peabody, "and not for the guests of the hotel," before they could find defendant guilty. No. 2, that the defendant was not guilty unless his bartender knew at the time of the sale that the whisky "was not ordered for the guests of the hotel." And No. 3, that "they must believe beyond reasonable doubt, and to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis, that the defendant knew or had reason to believe that the whisky was not for the guests of the hotel."

These instructions are bad and were properly refused because they do not state the law of the case. There is no evidence that the boy was buying the whisky for any person other than himself. The fact that the whisky had been delivered to the boy, and the money received from him at the time by the bartender, is not denied. In legal contemplation, this establishes a sale to the boy, whether he was buying for himself or for an undisclosed principal.

It is assigned as error that the court refused to allow witness Reible to answer the following question, viz.: "State whether or not, if you, as bartender at the West Virginia Hotel, did not let, or was in the habit of letting, this boy take up drinks ordered by the guests at that hotel, to the guests at their rooms." It is not shown what answer the witness was expected to make to this question, and we do not see that the defendant was prejudiced by the court's refusing the answer to be given. Furthermore, the question is objectionable in form, being leading and suggestive of the answer desired. Even if we could infer that the answer, if allowed to be given, would have been in the affirmative, still it could not have aided the defendant's cause. If it was, in fact, the custom for the boy to "take up drinks ordered by the guests at the hotel," it does not follow that previous acts constituting the custom were not also violations of law; neither does it follow that the facts in other instances were similar to the facts in this case.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment of the Criminal Court of Cabell County will be affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

G. A. CLARK, Appt.,

v.

MRS. A. T. TENNESON, Resp't.

(— Wis. —, 130 N. W. 895.)

Husband and wife — necessities — artificial teeth.

1. Artificial teeth are necessities which a man must furnish to his wife.

Same — personal liability of wife.

2. A married woman is not personally liable for artificial teeth purchased by her for her own use, although she has always attended to the dental affairs of herself and her children, and paid the bills, and the dentist who made the teeth has never had any dealings with the husband, if there is nothing to show that she made the payment out of her separate estate.

Note. — Liability of married woman for necessities purchased by her.

This note does not attempt to define necessities, and the fact that a case is included should not be taken to mean that the particular articles in that case were held necessities.

As to what constitute "family expenses" within a statute rendering a wife or her property liable for such expenses, see the note to Vose v. Myott, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 277.

In the absence of statute, there can be no legal claim against the estate of a married woman for necessities furnished at her request. Brown v. Sumner, 31 Vt. 671.

In Walford v. de Pienne, 2 Esp. 554, however, Lord Kenyon said if the wife was not to be personally charged for debts contracted by her when her husband was absent for some years, or had abjured the realm, she would be without credit, and might starve.

Other English cases are authorities for the doctrine that under such circumstances a married woman might contract and sue and be sued as if sole; but in most of them, if not in all, the contracts were for other things than necessities.

In equity.

But where a married woman purchases necessities for the support of herself and family, and for the benefit and advantage of her separate estate, which she directly and expressly agrees to pay for out of her separate estate, against which the amount should be a charge, her property is liable in equity therefor. Miller v. Newton, 23 Cal. 554; Priest v. Cone, 51 Vt. 495, 31 Am. Rep. 695; Porter v. Baldwin, 7 Humph. 177; Craft v. Rolland, 37 Conn. 491.

In Priest v. Cone, 51 Vt. 495, 31 Am. Rep. 695, the court announced the above rule as a safe and practicable deduction "from the conflicting decisions of the APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Eau Claire County affirming a judgment of the Municipal Court of the city of Eau Claire, dismissing an action brought to recover the purchase price of a set of artificial teeth purchased by defendant from plaintiff. Affirmed.

Statement by Siebecker, J.:

This is an action to recover the sum of $40 for an upper plate of artificial teeth and a partial lower plate, which the plaintiff alleges were made for the defendant at her special instance and request, for her own and separate use and benefit, and which were reasonably worth the sum demanded. One of the defenses alleged is that the defendant is a married woman, living with her husband, and that she has no separate estate. It is therefore averred that the defendant's husband is liable for the price of the teeth as articles of necessity. None of the other alleged defenses are material to the question raised on this appeal.

The plaintiff testified that he was a duly licensed dentist; that as such dentist he had made the plates for the separate use and benefit of the defendant; that the reasonable value of the plates was the sum claimed; that the plates were of no value to anyone but the defendant; that the defendant had an upper set of artificial teeth which she was using when he made the new sets for her; that he knew she was a mar-

American and English courts touching the power of married women and persons dealing with them to subject their separate estates to liability upon their contracts."

The attitude of equity toward the debts of a married woman contracted for necessities while the common-law disabilities still existed is thus tersely expressed in Hall v. Faust, 9 Rich. Eq. 301: "Deserted by her husband, as the defendant has been, for more than fifteen years, divorced from him by the laws of a sister state, she is still regarded as his wife by the law of South Carolina. Although the owner of a competent estate, with which her husband has no authority (nor, according to his answer, any inclination) to interfere, she has no legal power to bind that estate. Without the ordinary recommendation to credit which attaches to proprietorship, she might thus frequently be subjected to many of the inconveniences of destitution. Under such circumstances it is the peculiar province of this court to interfere, as well for the benefit of the married woman as for the protection of those who have supplied her necessities. But we are of opinion that, the plaintiffs asking the aid of this court, their recovery may properly be restricted to such articles as were necessary and proper for the defendant in the condition in society which she occupied."

The fact that a promise by a married woman to pay for necessities purchased by her is not in writing does not affect her liability therefor in a court of equity. Miller v. Newton, 23 Cal. 554.

Under general enabling statutes — power to bind herself.

Although the so-called enabling acts enlarging the rights of married women make no special provision therefor, nevertheless a married woman may charge her separate estate with her debt contracted for necessities as fully in all respects as she was authorized to do by the rules of equity previously existing in regard to such acts. Conlin v. Cantrell, 51 How. Pr. 312.

Under a statutory provision that a married woman shall hold to her own use, free from the control of her husband, all property inherited by, bequeathed, given, or conveyed to her, and may sue and be sued in her own name as though sole in all matters pertaining to such property, a married woman is personally liable on a contract for necessities for her use, made by her personally, with the promise to pay out of her separate property, and the person from whom she bought so understanding it. Hammond v. Corbett, 51 N. H. 311.

A statute providing that "all the legal disabilities of married women to make contracts are hereby abolished except as herein otherwise provided" confers a general power which authorizes a married woman to make a valid contract for necessities, and is not limited by an additional statutory provision allowing a married woman to contract concerning her separate personal estate. Arnold v. Engleman, 103 Ind. 512, 3 N. E. 238.

The New York statute providing that a married woman shall be liable on her contracts as if unmarried has been applied to a purchase of necessities by a married woman while living with her husband, and a recovery against the wife upheld. Mayer v. Lithauer, 28 Misc. 171, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1064.

It was held in Dobbins v. Thomas, 26 App. D. C. 157, that the liability of a married woman for debts contracted by her for necessities is not relieved because of a statutory provision continuing the common-law liability of a husband for "debts contracted or engagements which the wife may incur or enter into upon the credit of her husband or as his agent, or for necessities for herself or for his or their children."

Statutes enlarging the capacity of married women to take and hold property do not enlarge their capacity to contract, but operate to disable the husband as to those rights which at common-law devolved on him in and to the property of his wife. The common-law duty of the husband to maintain the wife continues, therefor, and purchases by the wife of necessities are presumed to be on his credit, by his assent ried woman; that the defendant had returned the upper set of teeth; that she never had had the lower plate; that the defendant had sent him payment for a bill for other work, but had stricken out from the bill these items for which he seeks to recover; that the defendant wore the upper plate from his office, and he had notified her that the lower set was ready for her; that she came back to his office, wearing her old set of teeth, and returned the teeth to him; and that she refused to wear the new teeth because the expression of her face was changed thereby. The defendant had always personally paid her dental bills and those of her children. The defendant offered no evidence in the case.

The municipal court of the city of Eau

Claire rendered judgment, dismissing the action. Upon appeal to the circuit court, the judgment of the municipal court was affirmed upon the record, and costs were awarded against the plaintiff. This is an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court.

Mr. Arthur H. Shoemaker, for appellant:

The capacity of a married woman to bind herself to pay any indebtedness incurred for property acquired by her is not dependent upon the purpose to which she intends to devote the property, or whether she has a separate property or business. She may pledge her credit for anything of value ac-or authority, so that her property is not liable therefor unless the necessities are obtained on her own credit, and to the express exclusion of the credit of the husband. Gayle v. Marshall, 70 Ala. 522.

Upholding the validity of a married woman's contract for medical services rendered her after being abandoned by her husband, the court said, in Carstens v. Hanselman, 61 Mich. 426, 1 Am. St. Rep. 606, 28 N. W. 159; "Our statutes, before we had any law enlarging the business rights of married women, contained liberal provisions to enable women who were deserted to act for themselves. Since their rights have been put under their own control, they have had general power to contract concerning their own property, and have been authorized to sue singly for all causes of action, and to be sued separately for all their torts. Their power to make any kind of purchases on their own credit has been fully recognized. . . . And while they have not a general power to make agreements of all kinds, we think they must necessarily be able to make contracts concerning what it is essential for their safety and security for them to procure. . . . Where a husband utterly deserts his wife, it would be a cruel rule for her if she cannot, in his absence, at least, or in his presence, if he does not himself provide for her, make a binding agreement for any necessary, whether articles to be purchased or professional help, without becoming a public chafge."

It was held in Wagg v. Gibbons, 5 Ohio St. 580, that a married woman who had been abandoned by her husband in a foreign country, and had come to Ohio to live, might, under such circumstances, contract and sue and be sued as if sole, in respect to necessities.

But see Valentine v. Bell, 66 Vt. 280, 29 Atl. 251, which was an action against a married woman to recover upon a contract for the support of the defendant's minor child. At the time the contract was made, the defendant was not living with her husband. There is reference in the opinion to a statute enacted subsequently to the making of this contract which apparently had to do with the rights of married women, but it is uncertain whether this was the first statute in Vermont to abrogate the common-law disability. The holding of the court is thus stated: "It was error to rule that, in the circumstances, the defendant was bound by that contract. Having been made when she was covert, and she having no separate estate nor property of any kind, as the case shows, that contract is entirely void, though for necessities for the child; and therefore unenforceable in this action."

In Covert v. Hughes, 8 Hun, 305, the property of a married woman was held liable for necessities purchased by her as the agent of her husband, under the New York statute of 1860, which exempted her property from her husband's debts, except such "as may have been contracted for the support of herself or her children, by her, as his agent."

Referring to the New York act of 1860 and its exception, the court of appeals of New York, in Tiemeyer v. Turnquist, 85 N. Y. 516, 39 Am. Rep. 674, held that the plain scope and purpose of the sections of the act in question was to free a married woman's property from the control of her husband and the burden of his debts, and make it her sole and separate estate; but that it has no reference to, and makes no provision for, the liability of the wife in a personal action. The exception, which has proved the source of some confusion, is interpreted to leave her property exposed to be taken for the debt of the husband as if the statute had not been passed. "The sole effect of the provision is not to make her personally liable for her husband's debt, for not a word of such grave import is contained in the statute; but merely that the shield and protection thrown over her property against the debts of her husband shall be withdrawn in a case where his debt has been contracted, his liability incurred, through her, acting as his agent, and for the purpose of providing for her own support and that of the children."

Abb. Pr. N. S. 335, where this same section was under consideration. The debt in that case, however, was found by the referee to have been contracted by the husband, through the wife, as his agent.

It was held in Reed's Estate, 4 Phila. 375, that where a married woman contracts a debt as in that case, for necessities, the proviso of the act of 1848 applies, and her separate property is not exempt from the debt. The report of this case furnishes no information as to the provisions of the act referred to.

The statutory right of a married woman to acquire property by purchase, and charge the debt upon her separate estate, allows her to buy necessities upon her own credit, although she has no separate property other than the goods thus purchased. Tiemeyer v. Turnquist, supra.

And so in Crisfield v. Banks, 24 Hun, 159, it was held that when a married woman purchases necessities, and promises to pay for them herself, she is liable therefor although she has no separate property. "If that which was acquired by purchase was the only separate property she had, she would still be liable to pay for it. By the purchase she created a separate estate, so far as the purchased property made one, and no principle of justice will permit her to escape liability for the payment of the purchase price."

Opposed to the doctrine of the above New York cases that the purchase by a married woman of necessities made them a part of her separate estate, so as to bring the contract within the provision of the enabling statute, is Schneider v. Garland, 1 Mackey, 350, where the court says: "A married woman cannot undertake to purchase an article, and call it, when bought, her separate estate, so that her agreement to buy the thing thus purchased may be considered a contract in relation to the property she thus proposes for the first time to acquire. A fortiori would this be so when the thing acquired consisted of supplies, consumed in their use, and never, except by the wildest latitude of construction, admitting of the 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) designation of 'her sole and separate estate.'"

And so in Brown v. Thomson, 27 S. C. 500, 4 S. E. 345, it appeared that the trial judge charged that if the defendant, a married woman, induced the plaintiff to sell her articles used for the support of herself, husband, and family on her credit, and the credit of her separate estate, she and her separate estate were responsible. The appellate court, however, reversed the judgment because it did not concur in the portion of the charge "which held the defendant responsible in this action for those articles used by herself and family." Examination of the dissenting opinion in this case indicates the probable ground of the decision to have been that a contract for the family supplies was not a contract as to her separate estate, within the statute.

And it has been held that statutes providing that married women may bind themselves at law by contract as if sole, so far as necessary or convenient to the beneficial enjoyment of their separate property or the carrying on of their separate business, but partially remove the common-law disability; and a married woman living with her husband is not liable for necessary medical services for herself and her son, contracted for by her, but without a promise by her to pay therefor, and without knowledge by the creditor that she had separate property. Stack v. Padden, 111 Wis. 42, 86 N. W. 568.

A statute providing that "any married woman may contract and sue and be sued in her own name in all matters having relation to her sole and separate property, in the same manner as if she was unmarried," does not so enlarge the common-law rights of a married woman as to make her liable at law for necessities furnished her, although upon her agreement to have them charged to her separate estate, and her promise to pay out of her own estate. Schneider v. Garland, supra.

Legislation so far removing the common-law disability of married women as to permit them to hold real and personal property as their separate estate does not

Stebecker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The only question in dispute is whether the defendant's husband is liable for these sets of artificial teeth, as articles of such necessity that he, as husband, is obligated to pay for them. This court in Warner v. Heiden, 28 Wis. 517, 9 Am. Rep. 515, declared what in general constitute "necessaries" which a husband is bound to furnish to his wife, and declared that they embraced the usual provisions for the maintenance of the wife's health and comfort appropriate to her mode of life, in view of their social station and standing and his financial abilities. It is a matter of common knowledge that artificial teeth are most useful and necessary articles for the allow a married woman to contract for necessities, and her express promise to pay therefor is invalid and unenforceable. Thomas v. Passage, 54 Ind. 106.

And even where the statute removing the common-law disabilities of married women, and allowing them to hold as their separate estate all real and personal property, free from the debts and obligations of their husbands, also permits them to sue and be sued in relation to their sole property, they have not power to make valid contracts for necessities. Howe v. North, 69 Mich. 272, 37 N. E. 213.

By virtue of particular statutes, numerous cases determine that the separate property of a married woman is liable for necessities, even though they were not contracted for by her nor charged against her. Such cases belong to the broader question of the general liability of a married woman's estate for necessities; and while not setting up arbitrary limitations, this note is intended to be confined to the scope of its title. In those states where the statutes give creditors broad rights against a married woman's property where the debt is for necessities, the question here presented would seem to allow of but one decision, if indeed it would arise; in other words, where a statute subjects a married woman's property to the payment of debts for necessities under all general circumstances, the contention that she was not liable when she herself contracted the debt would hardly be advanced.

In some states statutes have been enacted specifically subjecting the separate property of a married woman to debts contracted by her for family supplies or necessities. See Pendleton v. Galbreath, 45 Miss. 43; Porter v. Casper, 54 Miss. 359; Palmer v. Coghlan, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 55 S. W. 1122; Bair v. Robinson, 108 Pa. 247, 56 Am. Rep. 198.

In those states which have passed such statutes, the cases in most instances are decisions merely upon the question of what 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

are necessities within the statute. Such cases, of course, are not within the scope of this note.

In some jurisdictions the statutes expressly subjecting the property of a married woman to her debts contracted or incurred on account of necessities for herself or any member of her family require that the debt shall be evidenced by writing signed by her. See Marsh v. Alford, 5 Bush, 392.

And such a statute has been held applicable even as to property acquired after the debt was contracted. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Harned, 79 Ky. 279.

A statute subjecting the real estate of a married woman to debts "contracted after marriage, on account of necessities for herself or any member of her family, her husband included, as shall be evidenced by writing signed by her and her husband," requires that the contract for such necessities be made by the wife, and the credit therefor given to her. Gatewood v. Bryan, 7 Bush, 509.

It was said in Sawtelle's Appeal, 84 Pa. 306: "The act enables the wife to bind her separate estate for necessities obtained for herself and family, but the very essence of the liability is that they are furnished at her request and on her credit. If not so furnished, her separate estate is not liable."

The execution by a married woman and her husband of a note in payment of a debt contracted by her for necessities subjects the general estate of the wife to the payment thereof, as specifically provided by statute; and the fact that the intent of the wife was to charge her separate estate, such separate estate not being subject to the debt according to the statute, did not relieve her general property, no express intentions on her part to charge her general estate being necessary. Marshall v. Miller, 3 Met. (Ky.) 333.

In Jones v. Neall, 19 W. N. C. 256, the statute allowed a recovery against a married woman for necessities furnished her only where her husband had been absent a year or more.

promotion of personal comfort and health, and that their use in this country has attained practical universality. We consider that such teeth come within the class of articles constituting "necessaries," which a husband may be bound to furnish his wife. It was so held in Gilman v. Andrus, 28 Vt. 241, 67 Am. Dec. 713.

2. It is contended that the plaintiff and the defendant understood from the course of the transaction of ordering, providing, and delivering these teeth that it was an individual and personal sale to the defendant, and that she personally assumed to pay for them. The facts and circumstances do not sustain this claim. True, the plaintiff had no personal dealings with the defendant's husband. But this is not necessary, if the articles were purchased under circumstances indicating that they were supplied her in the usual manner, as necessities for which a husband is liable as such. The question is, Did the wife negotiate the purchase under circumstances indicating that she was authorized to do so?

It appears with sufficient certainty that the defendant attended to the dental affairs of herself and of other members of the family, including the payment of such bills. There is nothing in the record to show that she paid such bills out of her separate funds or estate. Presumably, then, she made the payments for the husband and father. This is sufficient to apprise the plaintiff of this fact, and he must be deemed to have dealt with her upon this basis, —necessity of express contract.

In the absence of an express contract by a married woman to pay for necessities, her property is not liable for the debt. Gunn v. Samuel, 33 Ala. 201; Freeman v. Holmes, 62 Ga. 556; Nelson v. Spaulding, 11 Ind. App. 453, 39 N. E. 168; Edmiston v. Smith, 13 Idaho, 645, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 871, 121 Am. St. Rep. 294, 92 Pac. 842; Quisenberry v. Thompson, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1554, 43 S. W. 723; Weber v. Zook, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1027, 53 S. W. 1034; Campbell v. White, 22 Mich. 178; Paul v. Roberts, 50 Mich. 611, 16 N. W. 164; Hirshfield v. Waldron, 83 Mich. 116, 47 N. Moul*, 22 N. Y. S. R. 762, 4 N. Y. Supp. 299; Bradt v. Shull, 46 App. Div. 347, 61 N. Y. Supp. 484; Feiner v. Boynton, 73 N. J. L. 136, 62 Atl. 420; Miller v. Brown, 47 Mo. 504, 4 Am. Rep. 345; Bear's Estate, 60 Pa. 430; Berger v. Clark, 79 Pa. 340; Robinson v. Bair, 2 Sadler (Pa.) 223, 18 W. N. C. 120, 3 Atl. 669; Reed's Estate, 4 Phila. 375; Darlington v. Ervin, 13 Phila. 127; Warren v. Freeman, 85 Tenn. 513, 3 S. W. 513; Dodge v. Knowles, 114 U. S. 430, 29 L. ed. 144, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1108, 1197.

Holding that the evidence failed to show a special promise to pay for certain dresses bought for herself and children, so as to make her liable for the debt, the court said, in Kegney v. Owens, 18 N. Y. S. R. 482, 2 N. Y. Supp. 319: "The common-law rule that a married woman living with her husband is presumed to have authority from him to order such goods as are ordinarily required for family use is not changed by the statute regulating the rights and liabilities of married women. If the party dealing with the wife knows she is a married woman, living with her husband, and the order is of a character to indicate that it is for the benefit of her husband's family, he is bound to presume that she is acting for her husband, and cannot hold her personally liable, unless she expressly agrees to become so."

Just what conditions operate to establish the liability of a married woman for necessities are stated in the alternative in Powers v. Russell, 26 Mich. 179, thus: "Now if he [the tradesman] knew that she was a married woman, living with her husband, and the goods were not of a character to indicate that they were bought for other than family use in the husband's family, and she did not claim affirmatively to be purchasing them on her individual account, the natural inference would be that she was purchasing them on her husband's account and for the use of his family; and she could not be made individually liable without an express agreement to become so, or that the goods should be charged or the credit given to herself."

The necessity for charging a married woman's property with her debt for necessities, that it must be contracted by her, has been made a statutory requirement in some instances. Thus, in Murray v. Keyes, 35 Pa. 384, a statute providing for judgment against a married woman when the debt was contracted "by the wife, or incurred for articles necessary for the support of the family," was construed as if the "or" read "and," and recovery against the wife denied because the evidence did not bring the case within the provision of the statute. See also, in connection with this interpretation of the statute, Rigoney v. Neiman, 73 Pa. 330.

But it is intimated in Mayer v. Lithauer, 28 Misc. 171, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1064, that an express promise by a married woman to pay for necessities bought by her is not necessary to charge her separate property, the court saying: "It appears that the defendant is a married woman living with her husband, and the principal point urged by the defendant upon this appeal is that the dress ordered by the defendant, being in the nature of a necessity, the husband was presumptively liable for the materials furnished and the services rendered in making, and that the defendant could not be charged therewith, except by an express which showed her relation to the transaction. For cases defining the authority of the wife to obtain "necessaries," charged to the husband, and under what circumstances he will be exempt from the obligation to pay for articles, see Wanamaker v. Weaver, 176 N. Y. 75, 65 L.R.A. 529, 98 Am. St. Rep. 621, 68 N. E. 135, and the cases and comments in the note. Under the circumstances, we consider that it was established that the defendant was acting under the authority of her husband, and the court properly held that it was not shown that the defendant was individually liable upon the claim presented against her.

Judgment affirmed.

promise on her part to pay therefor. This contention is not well founded. While an action may be maintained against a husband, under certain circumstances, for goods sold or services rendered to the wife, an action of that character may be brought directly against a married woman. Laws 1896, chap. 272, § 21. The section referred to provides that a married woman has all the rights in respect to property, real or personal, to make contracts in respect thereto, and to exercise all powers and enjoy all rights in respect to her contracts, and to be liable on such contracts, as if unmarried.

—what sufficient to show contract to bind herself.

The facts necessary to the establishment of liability on the part of a married woman for necessities bought by her must be alleged in the complaint or declaration in order to sustain the action. Cummings v. Miller, 3 Grant, Cas. 146.

A married woman living with her husband is not liable for necessities purchased by her, although she promises to pay for them, unless her promise expresses the intent that her separate estate shall be charged with the debt. Salmon v. McEnany, 23 Hun, 87; Weir v. Groat, 4 Hun, 193.

And so it has been held that a married woman may charge an estate held in trust for her with debts which she contracts for necessities when it is her evident intention to charge her own estate. Jackson v. West, 22 Md. 71.

If there is no agreement by a married woman that necessities purchased by her are to be paid for out of her separate property, the mere fact that they are charged to her without her knowledge or assent does not make her liable therefor. Smith v. Allen, 1 Lans. 101.

Treating services of a seamstress as in the nature of necessities, it was held in Flynn v. Messenger, 28 Minn. 208, 41 Am. Rep. 279, 9 N. W. 759, that a married woman could not be held liable therefor in the absence of circumstances to take the hiring of the plaintiff out of the ordinary presumption that the employment was in behalf of the husband, although the wife made the arrangements and agreed upon the amount of the wages. Nothing was said as to who would pay the seamstress, but while she was at work the wife told her she had property of her own, and when she sold some land she would pay her. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

This was held to be a mere voluntary promise, and was not sufficient to shift the obligations of payment from the husband to his wife.

An undertaking by a married woman to pay for necessities is never presumed, and the act of delivering the goods to her, or the fact that the creditor charges them to her, is not sufficient to establish her promise. Moore v. Copley, 165 Pa. 294, 44 Am. St. Rep. 664, 30 Atl. 829.

The fact that a note given for necessities is in the language, "We or either of us promise to pay . . . for necessities furnished for myself and family," is not sufficient to charge the separate property of the wife, in the absence of evidence that the necessities were contracted for by her and the credit given to her. Gatewood v. Bryan, 7 Bush, 509.

A married woman was held not liable for necessities, in Weir v. Groat, 4 Hun, 193, because there was no express contract to charge her estate, although the evidence showed that the merchant of whom the goods were bought refused to trust the woman's husband, and so told her in a conversation in which she said she would be responsible for everything. In the statement of the case as reported, in addition to her assertion that she would be responsible, it is said that she promised to pay the debt after it was made. The court said in the course of the opinion: "In order to charge her estate, therefore, she must express such intention in her contract. This she has not done. The respondent labors under the false idea that such intention may be inferred from her simple promise to pay. That would destroy the only distinction now remaining between the contracts of a married and unmarried female. No case goes to that extent."

Baken v. Harder, 4 Hun, 272, presenting the same state of facts and the same legal question, follows the above holding.

In some cases courts have taken the view that surrounding circumstances may be relied on to show an implied contract sufficient to bind the separate property of a married woman. Re Totten, 137 App. Div. 273, 121 N. Y. Supp. 942; Conlin v. Cantrell, 64 N. Y. 217; Wilson v. Herbert, 41 N. J. L. 461, 32 Am. Rep. 243.

As to the question of extending credit to a married woman upon her implied contract, the court said in Cook v. Ligon, 54 Miss. 368: "With reference to family supplies, clothing, tuition, and the like, we think that where the husband has property or an income of his own, the legal presumption would be that the credit was given to him; and in order to hold the wife liable, she must have either expressly assented or failed to object to the purchases, after being advised that her separate property was looked to. Where, on the other hand, as in the case at bar, the wife knows that the husband has no property which the law can reach, and he is engaged in no business save attending to her estate, and devoting his time to the productions of profits, all of which must inure to her benefit, the presumption would be that she was aware that the credit was being extended to herself rather than to him; and if, under such circumstances, she bought goods herself, or suffered him to buy goods which she consumed, her consent that her estate should be bound therefor would be implied. We do not mean to say that this would be a necessary and inflexible conclusion of law, but rather that, upon the question of fact as to whether or not she had consented that her estate should be bound, these circumstances would fully warrant an affirmative response."

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

UNION DEPOT & RAILWAY COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.
WOLFE LONDONER.

(— Colo. —, 114 Pac. 316.)

Union depot — duty to passengers.

1. A union depot company which undertakes to provide common terminal facilities for the passenger-carrying railroads entering a city owes to passengers and their attendants the duty of keeping the station and its facilities in a proper condition for their safety.

Same — servants — train employees — liability for negligence.

2. A union depot company which relied upon train employees to direct passengers

Note. — Liability of union depot company for negligence of its own or carrier's employees.

For notes on the liability of carrier on account of misdirection of passenger by employee, see St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. White, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 110, and Mace v. Southern R. Co. 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1178.

For a note on liability of railway company for injury to its servants by negligence of union depot employees, see Floody v. Great Northern R. Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1196.

Apparently few cases have considered the question of the liability of union depot companies for the negligence of their own or the carrier's employees.

In Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Cooper, 6 Ind. App. 202, 33 N. E. 219, where the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to their trains is liable for injury caused to a passenger's attendant by following the direction of such employee, which takes him into an unsafe place, where the danger is not obvious, although the one giving it was not in its immediate employ.

Trial — failure to answer interrogatory — receiving verdict.

3. Failure of the jury to answer a special interrogatory as to an immaterial fact will not prevent receiving their verdict.

Damages — personal injury — loss of time.

4. In determining the compensation to be awarded for a negligent injury to one conducting a business of his own, the jury may consider the value of his time or services in such business during the time he was compelled to be away from it by the injury, and their diminished value while he could work only part time.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for the City and County of Denver in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered as a result of a fall while on defendant's premises. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dorsey & Hodges, for appellant:

The appellee, if he had any right upon any portion of the depot grounds, was a licensee of the Rio Grande Company, and not of the Depot Company.

plaintiff alleged in his complaint that he was waiting with a proper ticket at defendant's union station, and that when the caller announced the train, he started for the train, but was assaulted at the gate through which he had to pass by the gate-man, one of the employees and servants of the defendant, it was held that a good cause of action was set forth. The court said: "It is clear that this union railway company has assumed to carry out a portion of the obligations owed by the railroad companies whose lines ran into Indianapolis to the traveling public, and, this being true, this company assumed also toward the passengers the same liability within the sphere of its operations as rested upon the railroad companies from whose shoulders it took the burden. The railroad company has the right to select the places where passengers are to mount and dismount, and if it has provided an adequate and proper way of access to and egress from its trains, and a passenger chooses some other or different way, and suffers injury thereby, the railroad company is not liable.

teet its passengers from assaults and injuries by its servants; nor does the question of its liability for a breach of this duty depend upon whether or not the servant, in the performance of the act, is within the scope of his employment."

And where, from the complaint and a stipulation by consent considered with it, it appeared that the defendant corporation was organized for the express purpose of furnishing depot and station-house accommodations at the city of St. Paul for the use of such railway corporations as entered into contract with it; that it leased a room in its depot building to a tenant, who therein carried on the business of storing for hire the parcels and light baggage of travelers; that plaintiff arrived at said depot by rail, and as a passenger, and proceeded to said room for the purpose of temporarily storing his valise, and was there wilfully and maliciously assaulted and beaten by an employee of defendant's tenant, and it was further charged that this employee was a man of savage and vicious propensities, who had frequently, during the six years of his employment there, attacked and beaten persons lawfully upon the premises, and that all of this was well known to the defendant corporation on the day of the attack upon the plaintiff.—it was held that the complaint, in connection with the stipulation, stated a good cause of action. Dean v. St. Paul Union Depot Co. 41 Minn. 360, 5 L.R.A. 443, 16 Am. St. Rep. 703, 43 N. W. 54. The court said: "This complaint, considered in connection with the stipulation, charges that the defendant knowingly and advisedly permitted its tenant to keep in his employ for more than six years, in its depot building, into which it encouraged people to come, and was under contract to admit the plaintiff as an arriving passenger, a man of savage and vicious propensities, and who had, during said period of six years, frequently assaulted and beaten persons lawfully upon said premises, and who, upon the day named, attacked and beat the plaintiff without provocation. Whatever obligation otherwise, by virtue of its contract with the carrier, rested upon the defendant as to the plaintiff, it is manifest that it was bound to use ordinary care and diligence to keep its premises in a safe condition for those who legitimately came there. It had no more right, therefore, to knowingly and advisedly employ, or allow to be employed, in its depot building, a dangerous and vicious man, than it would have to keep and harbor a dangerous and savage dog, or other animal, or to permit a pitfall or trap into which a passenger might step as he was passing to or from his train."

Musser, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On a certain morning in September, 1905, Wolfe Londoner accompanied his daughter from his residence to the Union Depot in Denver, to aid her in getting aboard a train of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company as a passenger for Colorado Springs. Upon arriving at the depot, they walked through an open, arched passageway, which ran through the depot building, thence through an open gateway, directly in line with the said passageway, into the yard, and they came upon a platform about 50 feet in width, made of brick and plank and built to the level of the rails, so as to afford a convenient walk for those coming from and going to trains. On either side of this walk, the various trains, about to depart, were standing and receiving passengers. After passing through the gateway, the first track reached was called track No. 1. Then came a brick platform about 16 feet wide, running for a considerable distance from the broad walk, parallel to the tracks, and designed for the use of those boarding trains standing on tracks No. 1 and No. 2. Then came track No. 2; then a passageway parallel to the tracks and about 9½ feet wide, between the right rail of track No. 2 and the left rail of track No. 3, looking to the southwest toward Sixteenth street; then track No. 3; then another brick walk about 16 feet wide, running parallel with the tracks, and designed for the use of those boarding trains standing on tracks No. 3 and No. 4. The train that the daughter desired to board was standing on track No. 3. It was the occasion of a Grand Army Encampment in Denver, and a great crowd of people were congregated on the wide walk, going to their various trains. Londoner and his daughter proceeded in the crowd to the train on track No. 3. The testimony on behalf of Londoner shows that on the broad walk at the rear of the train were two or three men dressed like railroad men, who cried out that that was the Rio Grande train for Colorado Springs and Cripple Creek. The crowd seemed to turn back from the 16-foot walk between tracks No. 3 and No. 4, and these men indicated by their gestures that the people should pass down the narrow passageway between tracks No. 2 and No. 3. A large number, among whom were Londoner and his daughter, turned down this passageway. The way was not bricked, but was formed of charred coal or cinders to the level of the tracks. In it and about 43 feet from the broad platform was a gas valve, elliptical in shape, several inches long and several inches wide, projecting above the walk 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

about 4 inches. Londoner stumbled over this, fell, and severely hurt his knee. He arose, went forward with his daughter, until he came to an open door of a car. He then assisted his daughter into the car. After this he went home. The fall had affected his knee in such a way that it caused what one of the physicians who testified called water on the knee, and gave as the technical name "acute synovitis." He suffered pain, was bedfast for about two months, and was kept away from his business for about four months, after which, by the aid of crutches for a time, he gave some attention to business, and more as the knee improved. There was evidence that the knee was not yet well at the time of the trial in May, 1907, and that the weakness would continue. He expended about $800 for physicians, surgeons, nurses, and other things necessary for treatment. He was engaged in the grocery business, and had been so engaged in Denver for about forty years, giving the business his constant supervision and care. The jury returned a verdict of $2,000 in his favor, and from a judgment entered on this verdict the Depot Company appealed.

A special interrogatory was submitted to the jury, asking them whether there was a train standing upon track No. 2 at the time of the accident. The jury answered that they were unable to agree on that point. If there was a train there, then the space between the car on track No. 2 and the car on track No. 3 was about 4 feet. The appellant claims that it was but an agent for the several roads that made use of its depot, tracks, and yard, and that therefore, if anyone is liable for the injury, it is the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company, in whose train the daughter intended to and did become a passenger. It is upon this claim of agency that most of the errors assigned by appellant are based.

The appellant was organized in 1899, under the laws of Colorado, for the purpose, among others, of becoming the successor to the Union Depot & Railroad Company, which constructed, owned, maintained, and operated the Union Depot yards and tracks. The appellant asserts that it took over and succeeded to all the property, rights, and contracts of its predecessor; that among the things to which it succeeded was a contract between its predecessor and the railroad companies relative to the depot, yards, and tracks, wherein such a relation was established between it and the several companies as to make the appellant the agent of the railroad companies, and to relieve it of any duty to the public and of any liability in this case. The appellant was organized for the further purpose of owning, maintaining, and operating a Union Depot in Denver, and in the accomplishment of this purpose it owned, used, maintained, and operated for profit, in its own name, the depot building, yards, and tracks for the accommodation of the traveling public, the same as any depot, yards, and tracks are maintained and operated for such use. It has been already determined in this state that the purpose for which the appellant was organized, and which had been accomplished by it, was for the accommodation of the traveling public. Union Depot & R. Co. v. Meeking, 42 Colo. 89, 126 Am. St. Rep. 145, 94 Pac. 16. It is the duty of railroad companies, as carriers of passengers, to provide proper stational accommodations and safeguards for persons who may come to stations in order to become passengers, or who may be discharged from incoming trains. Hutchinson, Carr. 3d ed. § 928. This duty, relative to stational facilities, is a duty which the carrier owes to the traveling public as much as any other of its duties, and it is a part of the duties which it thus owes. If this stational duty is performed by someone other than the carrier itself, it must of necessity remain a duty to the traveling public due from the one that undertakes to perform it. It is not intended to intimate that the carrier would be relieved of its duty because another undertakes to perform the same duty. The duty and liability of the carrier is not considered in this case. It was for the performance of this stational duty that the appellant was created, and it accomplished the purpose of its creation when it undertook and performed that duty in its own name, under its own direction, with its own buildings, tracks, and other structures, in its own yards, and on its own property. By its conduct it professed and made ostentatious the fact that it was performing this duty. There is no doubt that by private contract between the appellant and the railroad companies, the latter made use of the facilities which the former afforded, and it may be that the contract established certain private relations between them, which would be considered in any controversy among themselves or their privies, but that private contract does not profess to, nor could it, if it did, change the relation of the appellant to the public,—a relation which arose out of the very object of its creation, and was assumed, professed, and held out by it in the ostensible accomplishment of that object. The appellant was the owner and occupant of this station, yard, and tracks, and it is clear from the very nature of its business that it invited all those who might desire to take passage on any of the roads running from its station to come upon its premises. This invitation extended also to those who desired to accompany an intending passenger, to see him off or to aid him in getting aboard a train, and such persons came lawfully upon the premises by virtue of such invitation. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Spencer, 27 Colo. 313, 51 L.R.A. 121, 61 Pac. 606; Dowd v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 84 Wis. 105, 20 L.R.A. 527, 36 Am. St. Rep. 917, 54 N. W. 24; Elliott, Railroads, 2d ed. § 1256. There is a well-known rule of law that declares that any owner or occupant of land who induces or leads others to come upon his premises is liable in damages to such persons, they using due care, for injuries occasioned by the unsafe condition of the land or its approaches, if the condition was known to the owner, and not to them, and was negligently suffered to exist without timely notice to the public or those who are liable to act upon the invitation to come there. Lunt v. Post Printing & Pub. Co. 48 Colo. 316, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 60, 110 Pac. 203; Bennett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 102 U. S. 577, 26 L. ed. 235; Carleton v. Franconia Iron & Steel Co. 99 Mass. 216. In Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644, speaking with reference to an owner or occupant of land, it is said: "If he directly or by implication induces persons to enter on and pass over his premises, he thereby assumes an obligation that they are in a safe condition suitable for such use, and for a breach of this obligation he is liable in damages to a person injured thereby." This rule is applied to the owner and occupant of railway stations, and the law imposes upon such an owner and occupant the duty to keep the station and facilities in a proper condition for the safety of those who go upon the premises in response to the invitation extended. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Grush, 67 Ill. 282, 16 Am. Rep. 618; McDonald v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Iowa, 124, 96 Am. Dec. 114; Patten v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 32 Wis. 524; Atlantic & B. R. Co. v. Owens, 123 Ga. 393, 51 S. E. 404; Hutchinson, Carr. § 928; Dowd v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 84 Wis. 105, 20 L.R.A. 527, 36 Am. St. Rep. 917, 54 N. W. 24; Maxfield v. Maine C. R. Co. 100 Me. 79, 60 Atl. 710; Elliott, Railroads, 2d ed. §§ 1256, 1641.

Among other things which the appellant undertook to do in the operation of its station was to direct passengers to their proper trains, as is shown by a rule which it had, requiring depot officers and their assistants and train men, when on duty, to perform this service for it. The rule also shows the means or agency through which the appellant chose to perform that service. While the evidence is not clear that the employees who directed Londoner and the others to go down the passageway wherein the accident happened were train men, and not depot officers or assistants, for the purpose of this case, it may be assumed that these men were train men of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company, on duty. The appellant argues that it did not employ these men, could not direct them nor discharge them; that they were not its agents; and that therefore it was not responsible for their direction of Londoner. These men were the agency through which the appellant chose to perform its service of directing passengers to their trains, and they were the only agency which it employed in this case to perform that service. It availed itself and had the benefit of the service of these men, made them the agents or means for the performance of that particular part of its work which it had undertaken in the operation of its station, and it cannot now be permitted to say that Londoner had no right, so far as it was concerned, to follow the directions of the agency which it adopted and used as the means through which it gave directions. This principle has already been settled in this state in Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Gustafson, 21 Colo. 393, 41 Pac. 505. It follows, therefore, that the court did not err in its instructions in coupling the train men with the depot officers of the appellant and their assistants. While in the Gustafson Case it was shown that there may be instances when it is a question whether a person is justified in acting solely on directions, as at a crossing where danger is obvious, yet the reasoning plainly shows that in cases like the present, where no danger is obvious, a person may rely on the directions. Here, even if it be assumed that a train stood on track No. 2, the situation, as revealed by the testimony of both sides, was not one of obvious or apparent danger. There is no evidence that there was any sign or warning that the passageway was at all dangerous, or that it was not to be used in the face of directions to use it. The plat and evidence on the part of appellant show the absence of those things, and do not reveal anything that would cause, in an ordinary man, standing amidst the crowd on the wide walk, the slightest apprehension of danger in going into the passageway when directed. The passengers knew that trains would not pull out until schedule time, and that was about fifteen minutes away. They might think that the passageway was narrow or inconvenient, but there was nothing about the premises or in the circumstances to indicate that there was any danger in going into the passageway when directed to do so, or that in any way suggested that they should do other than obey the directions given. There was nothing for the jury to conclude but that a person of ordinary caution would unhesitatingly and of right follow the directions and go down the passageway between the cars to board the train. Hence it follows that it was immaterial whether a train stood upon track No. 2 or not, for Londoner had the right to, and could not be expected to, do anything else than follow the others into the passageway to board the train. That fact being immaterial under the circumstances, the court did not err in receiving the verdict, notwithstanding the jury failed to answer the special interrogatory which covered the immaterial matter. Denver v. Teeter, 31 Colo. 486, 74 Pac. 459.

In an instruction relating to damages and the elements thereof, the jury were told that they could take into consideration, among other things, the pecuniary loss, if any there was, by reason of the suspension of Londoner's personal oversight and attention to his business during the time he was confined to his home on account of his injuries, his loss, if any there was, by reason of any decreased ability to give his personal attention and oversight to his business from the time he was able to return to his work until the trial, and his loss, if any there was, by reason of any decreased ability to earn money in the future, or to continue to give the same personal oversight and attention to his business as before the accident. These matters are objected to. The appellant does not say that they are not proper matters for consideration by a jury when supported by evidence, but asserts that they were not proper matters for consideration in this case, because there was no evidence justifying their submission to the jury. It was alleged in the complaint that Londoner was confined to his bed and home for four months; that thereafter he was unable to properly attend to his business or perform his ordinary duties; and that in the future he will not be able to attend to or perform more than a part of his work. There was evidence sustaining these allegations, and there was therefore evidence that his time was lost by reason of the suspension of his personal oversight and attention to his business, and by his decreased ability to give his personal oversight and attention. Was there evidence of the value of this lost time? There was evidence showing the character of the business; that Londoner had built it up and had always given it his personal attention and oversight; that he had been engaged therein for many years, and the particular duties and work performed by him were shown generally. There was also evidence showing that the services rendered by Londoner in his business were worth $500 or $600 a month. These were all matters for the jury to consider in fixing the value of his time. In Masterton v. Mt. Vernon, 58 N. Y. 391, at page 396, it is said: "The plaintiff had the right to prove the business in which he was engaged, its extent and the particular part transacted by him, and, if he could, the compensation usually paid to persons doing such business for others. These are circumstances the jury have a right to consider in fixing the value of his time." There was no allegation of a loss of profits, nor any attempt to prove a loss of profits. That was not necessary. As is said in Silsby v. Michigan Car Co. 95 Mich. 204, at page 209, 54 N. W. 761: "The loss of profits in conducting a business involving the labor of others is not a necessary consequence of personal injury to the plaintiff. The extent of his recovery upon this ground would be what his services were worth in the conduct of such a business as he was engaged in." In Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Martin, 41 Mich. 667, 3 N. W. 173, evidence of the nature and extent of plaintiff's business to show how far he was affected in it was held competent to show his pecuniary loss by reason of the suspension of his personal oversight and labor, and hence must have been considered as some evidence of his damage in that regard. The court said: "We think it was competent to give such a full account of plaintiff's business as to show how far he was affected in it, and this could not be done without showing its nature and extent. There was no evidence received as a ground of damage beyond his pecuniary loss by reason of the suspension of his personal oversight and labor. There was no error in this regard." Londoner had a definite status in a regular and established business to which he devoted his whole time. He was not engaged in odd jobs or various schemes. The value of his time or services was thus capable of measurement, and had a value, as shown by the uncontradicted evidence of a competent witness. Such evidence may be taken into consideration by the jury. Harmon v. Old Colony R. Co. 168 Mass. 377, 47 N. E. 100; Whipple v. Rich, 180 Mass. 477, 63 N. E. 5. It is thus seen that there was evidence to support these elements of damages embraced in the court's instruction. If more evidence could have been given, the company cannot complain of its omission. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) sion, for it probably would have increased the verdict above the sum of $2,000. There were other elements that were considered in arriving at that verdict, such as expenses for doctors and nurses, and damages for physical pain and suffering. In a general way, all of the 76 assignments of error have been answered upon the phases of the case embraced in the assignments, the question of the negligence of the company and contributory negligence of Londoner were submitted to the jury, and, as no error has been discovered, the judgment is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIRST CIRCUIT.

MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK, Appt.,
v.

JEREMIAH SMITH, JR., Trustee, etc., of Edwin J. Dunning.

(106 C. C. A. 593, 184 Fed. 1.)

Insurance — future annuities — validity.

1. A contract by which an insurance company undertakes for a present cash premium to pay to the insurer annuities beginning at a designated future time, and continuing during his life, is not invalid as against public policy.

Bankruptcy — future annuity contracts — setting aside.

2. A trustee in bankruptcy has no right to set aside contracts made by the bankrupt with money fraudulently obtained, by which an insurance company, in consideration of a present cash premium, undertook to pay him annuities beginning at a designated future time, where the company acted in good faith without notice of the source of the funds, since it acquired rights and advantages under the transaction of which it could not be deprived.

Aldrich, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity by a trustee in bankruptcy who offers to surrender certain insurance contracts entered into between the bankrupt and an insurance company, and asks that the company be ordered to pay to the trustee upon their surrender all sums which the company received from the bankrupt.

The case is a novel one in the sense that it involves a kind of insurance or indemnity which has not been in general use, if in use at all.

One Edwin J. Dunning, who was insolvent at the time, secured from the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York three policies which are designated by the appellee, and perhaps correctly, as "deferred annuity contracts," whereby the company obligated itself to pay to Dunning $1,000 yearly under each contract or policy, commencing in 1916, 1921, and 1926, respectively, provided Dunning was then alive, and the payments were to continue as long as Dunning should live.

The total amount paid by Dunning for these policies or contracts was $4,920. There were three payments,—one in January, another in February, and another in July, 1901.

There is no substantial argument against the general proposition that Dunning was insolvent, and that he was acting in general bad faith with respect to his creditors, and that he was scheming to get money by fraudulent means from the Brooks family, and perhaps others, which he never intended to pay; and we think the record discloses a condition of things from which it should be assumed that, at a time at least as early as the date of the policies, Dunning was engaged in transactions of a hazardous and fraudulent character, whereby he was to secure financial advantages and securities for which he never intended to pay; but we are not aware that the proofs establish any precise fact connecting any particular fraudulent transaction under which he was to receive money with the particular transaction of securing the deferred annuities or insurance. It is, however, probably quite true that the policies were paid for with money which he fraudulently obtained.

It is neither alleged nor argued that the insurance company had any knowledge of Dunning's fraudulent career, and it is admitted that the company acted in good faith, and without having any ground to suspect the existence of any fraudulent intent on Dunning's part.

The position of the trustee in bankruptcy is that Dunning's payments were transfers in fraud of creditors, and that the insurance company, though acting bona fide, is not a purchaser for value, because it has not paid the purchase money, or secured it in such a manner that it cannot be relieved against payment.

In support of this position counsel rely upon that class of cases which are concerned with transactions between seller and purchaser, and transactions between grantors and grantees, with respect to which it has sometimes, and perhaps generally, been held that the execution and delivery of non-negotiable notes and bonds, and other things done by the purchaser or grantee less than actual payment before notice, do not constitute one a bona fide purchaser or grantee, and therefore that the creditors may have property restored to them where the purchaser or grantee may be placed in statu quo.

There is, of course, some diversity of authority in respect to the particular circumstances under which rescission and restoration is justifiable; but in our view we are not called upon to consider the large number of cases relating to such situations, because they have no direct application to the question involved in this case, and have very little bearing, if any, by way of analogy.

If we are right in this position, it is because the relations here are not those of seller and buyer, and because the insurance company was in no sense a purchaser. The fundamental idea of the remedy for restoration is that it directs itself against the purchaser, and if either of the parties to the insurance contract in question could be considered a purchaser it would be Dunning, while the remedy is sought against the insurance company.

The courts are, of course, reluctant to give any aid whatever to parties tainted with fraud; but this is not a case between the trustee in bankruptcy and Dunning, but between the trustee and the insurance company, against whom there is no suggestion of fraud, and is therefore a case where the rights between these particular parties do not depend so much upon the bad faith and the wrongful intent of Dunning, who is one of the parties to the contract, as upon the good faith and innocent intent of the insurance company, who is the other party to the contract.

As stated at the outset, the contract between the insurance company and Dunning, or the policy of insurance from the company to Dunning, if it may properly be called that, is novel in kind; but that is no reason why it should be rescinded by the parties or repudiated by the law, provided it does not offend the law or general considerations of public policy.

All insurance was once new, and insurance in its early stages covered few contingencies; but the business under the law has grown until the idea of insurance now spreads itself broadly over many subjects and many contingencies.

Generally speaking, the contingency, so far as contingency is concerned, in life insurance, is death, with, of course, endowment plans, under which there is payment of a certain sum at a particular age.

The policies in question provide for payments of annuities beginning in 1916, if the insured is alive at that time, and for the continuance of annuities during his life.

Aside from what is urged in respect to the fraudulent purpose of Dunning to secure this insurance, and pay for it by funds which were realized out of fraudulent transactions, and which, if used for such a purpose, would divert funds which equitably belonged to creditors, we see very little to be urged against insurance of the nature in question, and, indeed, that does not go to the merit of the insurance itself. It is not unnatural that one should act upon the idea that, in the days when he is handling money, it is the part of wisdom to safeguard the period of old age, in which business and earning capacity will have become a thing of the past. Under modern conditions in the various industries, as well as in business and in official life, men are influenced to enter upon a particular work by various old age safeguards, which become operative at the end of a specified period of service.

We see nothing, therefore, in the contract itself, disassociated from the general fraudulent purpose of Dunning, which offends public policy or any particular principle of law. The question whether the contract of insurance is one which should be repudiated upon principles of law, or as something offending public policy, is a very pertinent one, because, if the contract is a lawful and proper one in kind, the insurance company, acting in good faith, as it did, acquired certain rights and advantages upon which it is entitled to stand.

It is urged by the company that the nature of the contract, and the business acts in pursuance of it, by the insurance company, put it in a situation where it is not possible to place it in statu quo.

It is suggested that brokers' commissions were paid, that the costs of doing business are an element, that the fund had been classified and entered upon its books, and had assumed a certain status with respect to other contingencies, and that there is no offer in the bill to place the insurance company in statu quo in these respects. But, however that may be, we think the other ground, that it has acquired rights and advantages upon which it is entitled to stand, involves weightier considerations.

The business of a mutual insurance company is in a degree for profit as well as for security, and the enterprise involves large expenditures; and whether the margin is one way or the other depends upon whether the contingencies are well or ill advised; and if there is nothing in the contract itself which offends the law, there is no reason apparent why the company, if it has acquired advantages or rights under a particular transaction, should be deprived of its advantages obtained in good faith.

If there were no question of creditors, and if Dunning had died a week after the contract, and before bankruptcy, the contingency upon which the insurance was to become effective would have ceased to exist, or if he should die any time before 1916, such would be the case. That was the insurer's side of the contract, and the right being created in good faith and without any purpose to defraud, it is difficult to find any principle upon which the advantage can be wrested from the insurance company by Dunning's creditors. Whatever advantage Dunning is to receive under the contract would doubtless go to the creditors.

The plaintiff, as trustee in bankruptcy, in his bill, offers to surrender the contract to the insurance company; but the insurance company says it is entitled to stand upon the contract entered into on its part in good faith, and under which it has acquired certain rights, and that it is willing that the trustee shall succeed to all the rights of the insured, and take all the benefits which may result under the contingencies and terms of the contract.

The trustee's position in this respect is that a right which is only partially operative in 1916, and not wholly operative until 1926, is not an available and efficient beneficial right in the bankruptcy sense, because the law contemplates that matters concerning bankruptcy estates must be speedily adjusted and closed.

We do not perceive that to be a justifiable legal or equitable ground for dispossessing the insurance company of its legitimate contractual rights and advantages.

The contingent right of the insured, like the statutory right to seize and hold and sell remainder and contingent interests in real estate, is doubtless something that the trustee may seize and hold for the benefit of the creditors, or doubtless he may waive it altogether under circumstances which justify it.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and that court is directed to dismiss the bill without prejudice to any right the trustee may have to claim whatever beneficial interest the bankrupt has, or may hereafter have, under the insurance contracts described in the bill; and the respondent, now the appellant, recovers its costs of this court, and of the Circuit Court, so far as the same can be paid from the estate in bankruptcy.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

JOE HIGDON, Doing Business under the Name of Crescent Coal Company, Appt.,

v.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Carrier — railroad — duty to transfer within switching limits.

1. A railroad company which is a common carrier of passengers and freight, and maintains within a city a freight line and spur tracks to industrial plants, cannot refuse to transport freight from one part of the system to another, on the theory that they are within its switching limits, and that, as to such limits, it does not assume the duty of a common carrier.

Same — discrimination — material for reshipment and for consumption — refusal to haul.

2. The fact that a railroad company will receive a transportation charge on a finished product, the raw material for which it hauls from a warehouse to a mill within the limits of a city, while it will not secure such charge in case of coal hauled from a mine within the city to the mill, does not justify its refusing to haul the coal, and performing the service with respect to the raw material.

Same — refusal of service — establishment of right to continue refusal.

3. A railroad company cannot, by refusing to haul coal from a mine to industrial plants connected by belt lines, to spur tracks within the city, when it hauls other commodities to such points, establish the right to refuse to perform its duty as a common carrier, when such service is demanded.

Same — public rates — mistake in fixing — right to depart from.

4. That a railroad company, when publishing its rates for hauling cars from one point to another within the limits of a city, was under the mistaken impression that it was not bound to do a regular freight business between such points, does not entitle it to charge more than its published rates for handling such freight, and it cannot avoid this result by insisting that the rate was only for switching service, where it had done both switching and transportation service at such rate.

Damages — refusal of railroad to haul coal — inability to fill contracts.

5. One who contracts with a mine for a certain quantity of coal to fill orders already taken, and takes others in reliance thereon, and is prevented from filling his contract because of the refusal of a railroad company to haul the coal at its published rates, may hold it liable for the difference in cost of filling the orders under the conditions created by the refusal of the railroad to haul the coal, and what it would have cost him to fill them had the railroad company performed its duty, to the amount which the mine

Note. — Duty of carrier to accept freight originating and terminating within city limits.

The decision in HIGDON v. LOUISVILLE & N. R. Co., that a common carrier who maintains a freight line and spur tracks to industrial plants cannot refuse to transport freight from one part of the system to another, on the theory that they are within its switching limits, and that as to such limits it does not assume the duty of a common carrier, seems upon the facts of that case to be sound.

In Harp v. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. 118 Fed. 169, affirmed in 61 C. C. A. 405, 125 Fed. 445, where the duty of a carrier to furnish cars to a coal mine, to be loaded by wagons on its commercial tracks in its yards at a time when traffic was unusually heavy, was in question, the court said: "Under the principles announced, and under the common law, and even under the Cardwel act in England, which, as will appear, is much broader and goes much further than the statute law of this state, it is clear that it was within the power of the defendant company to determine for itself the means and methods of transportation which it would employ or hold out to the public, as well as the character and kind of goods it would carry, or profess or hold itself out to carry, and under what conditions it would accept and receive the same for transportation, and from and to what points it would transport articles received for transportation."

It would not seem in all cases and under all circumstances to be the duty of railroads to accept freight to be transported from one part of a city to another. Although there may be two industrial plants in a city, connected by spur tracks with the main line of the railroad, if there has been no assumption or holding out on the part of the railroad of transporting intraurban shipments, it would not seem that this duty should be forced upon it.

It has been held that a law requiring a carrier to receive at its connecting point with another road, and switch, transport, and deliver, all live stock consigned from the stock yards of such other road, located just outside the city limits, to anyone at the stock yards of the first carrier, located on the other side of the city, is unconstitutional, since it amounts to a taking of property without due process of law. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Central Stock Yards Co. 212 U. S. 132, 53 L. ed. 441, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 246. The court said: "If the principle is sound, every road into Louisville, by making a physical connection with the Louisville & Nashville, can get the use of its costly terminals and make it do the switching necessary to that end, upon simply paying for the service of carriage. The duty of a carrier to accept goods tendered at its station does not extend to the acceptance of cars offered to it at an arbitrary point near its terminus by a competing road, for the purpose of reaching and using its terminal station. To require such acceptance from a railroad is to take its property in a very effective sense, and cannot be justified, unless the railroad holds that property subject to greater liabilities than those incident to its calling alone."

In Dixon v. Central R. Co. 110 Ga. 173, 35 S. E. 369, it was held that the fact that the entire service in question was rendered on spur tracks of a railroad company, the transportation being from a wharf in a city to the city waterworks just outside the city limits, did not prevent it from being a transportation, as distinguished from transferring or switching, and it was therefore held that the rates for the latter service did not apply.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Henderson County dismissing his petition for damages for loss sustained because of defendant's refusal to furnish cars, thereby preventing plaintiff from filling orders for coal in compliance with his contract. Reversed.

The petition stated no cause of action against the defendant, nor did the evidence show that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Crescent Coal Company, is the business name assumed by Joe Higdon, who, in 1908, was engaged in buying and selling coal in the city of Henderson. The appellee, Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, was at the time, and is, a corporation organized under the laws of Kentucky and engaged in the business of a common carrier of passengers and freight. Its main line of road runs into and through the city, and in addition to its main line it operates and controls what is called a "belt line," running from its main line in two directions through the city. Leading from its main and belt line, there were a number of spur tracks that ran into various industrial plants in the city of Henderson, situated near its main and belt lines of road. These spur tracks were used for the purpose of transporting freight to and from these industrial plants, and were operated by the company as a part of its line of road. The Keystone Mining & Manufacturing Company was engaged in the operation of a coal mine in the city of Henderson, and was connected with the main or belt line by a spur controlled and operated by the appellee company.

In April 1908, Higdon, in the name of the Crescent Coal Company, conceived the plan of supplying the industrial plants in the city of Henderson that had spur connections with the main or belt line of the appellee company, with coal mined from the Keystone mine. His purpose was to have cars furnished by the appellee company loaded with coal at the mine, and then transferred by the appellee company to the industrial plants in Henderson that had spur connections. With this object in view, he entered into a contract with the Keystone Company, by the terms of which he was to be furnished by it during the year beginning July 1, 1908, 20,000 tons of coal, which it was stipulated in the contract should be delivered to him on the spur track at its mine. Another contract made in May, 1908, gave him the right with certain conditions to sell the output of the mine in excess of 20,000 tons. After making these contracts with the Keystone Company, he contracted with various industrial plants having spur connections with the line of the appellee company, to deliver to them at their plants in carload lots, at a stipulated price, a large quantity of coal. On July 1, 1908, he applied to the appellee company to furnish him cars at the Keystone Company's mine to be loaded with coal and hauled by it to the industrial plants, and proposed to pay for the services $4 per car, which would be about 10 cents per ton. The appellee company refused to furnish any cars for this service until July 13, 1908, when it notified Higdon that it would furnish cars, but would charge for the service 50 cents per ton. This offer, which was kept open until August 13, 1908, Higdon refused to accept, and on August 13th the appellee company informed him that it would not furnish cars for this service at any price. Thereupon Higdon brought this suit against the appellee company, setting up his contracts, and the action of the appellee in preventing him from fulfilling them, and sought to recover damages to compensate him for the loss he had sustained. This action was brought on the ordinary, or common-law, side of the docket, but, on motion of the appellee company, was transferred over the objection of the appellant to equity, and, upon hearing, the petition was dismissed.

A number of legal questions are presented by the record, and we will endeavor to dispose of such of them as seem essential to a solution of the matters in controversy. The first, and perhaps the most important, question is: Was the appellee company under a duty as a common carrier of passengers and freight to render this service?

The evidence for appellee conduces to show that the coal mine and the industrial plants located in Henderson to which Higdon desired to deliver coal were all located within what are called the "switching limits" of the appellee company. It is therefore said that it should not be treated as a common carrier, or charged with the duty of transporting freight as a common carrier from one point within these limits to another point within them. A common carrier, such as the appellee company was, may undoubtedly have what may be called yard facilities, including switches, spurs, and side tracks, for its convenience in the handling, storing, and distribution of its cars and freight, and it would not be obliged as a common carrier to transport from one point to another in these yards, or on these spurs or switches, freight for the convenience of shippers who might desire to have freight hauled from one point on a switch or spur in the yard to another point in the yard. In the use of tracks laid in its yards for its own convenience in handling, storing, and distributing cars and freight, a common carrier cannot fairly be said to be engaged in the business of a common carrier, in the sense that it must receive and deliver as at other points on its line of road freight or passengers. A rule like this would impose an unreasonable duty upon a common carrier, and unnecessarily hinder and interfere with the conduct of its business. It is essential in the operation of railroads that they should have at terminals, and other places where the business requires it, yards and facilities that they may use in the conduct of their business in such a way as not to be inconvenienced by the necessity of receiving and unloading goods for shippers. But we are not inclined to treat what the appellee company terms its "switching limits" in the city of Henderson, as coming within the meaning of yards and terminals such as we have described. The spur tracks to the coal mine and the industrial plants were not constructed, nor were they operated, for the convenience of the appellee company in handling, storing, and distributing its cars, engines, and other property. As we will presently show, they were constructed and were being used as a part of its railroad system, in carrying freight for compensation to and from the plants connected with its main line of road by these spur tracks. It is true these spur tracks were within what it called its "switching limits," and extended to factories and mills situated close to its line of road; but we regard as wholly immaterial, in the consideration of the question before us, the length of the spur track, or the kind of business establishments it connects the line of road with. Nor do we consider it a matter of any consequence how close together spur tracks such as these are located, or whether they are upon one part of its line or another. Whether they run to factories or mines in cities or towns, or to industrial plants in country districts, whether they are long or short, or close together or widely separated, they are to be considered a part and parcel of the system constructed and operated in its business as a common carrier, and the public have an interest in their conduct and operation that the carrier must respect. A railroad company owes to establishments connected with its line of road by these spur tracks the same duty that it does to establishments situated immediately upon its main line of road. It is under the same obligation to furnish facilities for transportation to one as it is to the other. It must serve all alike. Nor can a railroad company arbitrarily, and without any relation to the use to which it is put, designate a part of its track or system as "yards or switching limits," and then say that it owes no duty as a common carrier in this district except such as it may choose to assume, or say that it will or not, as suits its pleasure or convenience, perform service as a common carrier in this territory. A railroad company engaged in the general business of a common carrier cannot, without regard to the convenience of the public, classify or divide its trackage into divisions or parts, and say that on one part it is a carrier and on another it is not. In the discharge of its duties to the public as a common carrier, a railroad company may establish reasonable depots or places at which it will receive and deliver freight, and cannot be required to receive or handle it at other places; but it must use for the public convenience all the tracks set apart by it for the transportation of freight, and treat without favor or discrimination all persons offering to it freight for carriage. The spur tracks to these various plants in Henderson were no more a part of its "yards or switching limits" than would be a spur track that connected its main line in a country district with a mill or factory.

It is shown by the evidence that the appellee company in 1908, and for a number of years prior thereto, had been in the habit of transporting carloads of freight from industrial plants in Henderson with spur connections, to other industrial plants in Henderson with spur connections, but that it had never performed this service for the Keystone Company. For example, it would haul a carload of corn from an elevator connected with its belt or main line by a spur track, to a mill connected with its main or belt line by a spur track; but it would not haul a carload of coal from the mine to either the elevator or the mill. In explanation of this practice, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) and for the purpose of showing that it involved a different character of service from that sought by Higdon, it attempted to show, and did so do by its traffic agents, that the service it performed in hauling products from one industrial plant to another, such as from the corn elevator to the mill, was merely auxiliary or incidental to a transportation service that preceded or followed this local movement. Or, in other words, when it hauled for a nominal charge a carload of corn from the elevator to the mill to be converted into food stuff of some kind, this food stuff would necessarily be sold to parties outside of Henderson, and therefore it would get what it calls a transportation charge for hauling the food product from the mill at Henderson to the place it was shipped. And so it would be compensated in the transportation haul for the service it rendered in switching the cars from the elevator to the mill at a nominal price. It is said, however, that if coal was hauled from the Keystone mine to a factory to be there consumed, the carrier could not get another haul out of this coal or the substance to which it was reduced, and therefore it had the right to decline to render in the transportation of coal the character of service that it rendered in the transportation of corn. Looking at this question from the standpoint of the traffic manager of the appellee company, it doubtless presented to his mind sufficient reasons why the discrimination should be made. But when considered in relation to the duties a common carrier owes to the public, it was wholly unjustifiable. A common carrier may under certain conditions hold itself out to the public as being a common carrier of certain articles of freight, and, if it was only engaged in the carriage of specified articles, it would not be under any obligation to carry other things. If it carried for every person who offered it, the articles and things that it held itself out to the public as a carrier of, it could not well be said to be guilty of discrimination. 1 Hutchinson, Carr. §§ 59, 90, 144. But, as the appellee company was engaged in the business of carrying coal, as well as all other articles of merchandise and freight offered to it, it had no right to make any discrimination between shippers, and was obliged to carry for all persons all classes and character of freight offered to it. Bassett & Stone v. Aberdeen Coal & Min. Co. 120 Ky. 728, 88 S. W. 318. The argument is further made that it had persistently and uniformly declined to haul coal from this mine to places in Henderson, and this was well known to Higdon when he made the contracts referred to; but this custom did not confer upon it the right to continue the discrimination. That it had never engaged in the business of carrying coal in the manner desired by Higdon did not under the circumstances of this case authorize it to refuse to render the service when demanded. No length of time, or manner of treatment, or habit of dealing, will discharge a common carrier from the obligation to furnish to the public the service it is engaged in performing. The appellee company could not transfer between mills and factories corn, wheat, and other articles, and refuse to transfer under the same conditions coal.

It follows from these conclusions that the appellee company was not justified in refusing to render the service requested by Higdon.

The next question is: What rate did it have authority to charge for his service? In April, 1908, the appellee company published and issued a book containing its tariff rates. In this book we find the following: "The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company does not engage in the business of local switching between switches, tracks, warehouses, or industries in the Henderson, Kentucky, terminals, but where any such service is performed as an accommodation, a charge of $2 per car, plus $2 for car rental, shall be assessed." This tariff rate was in force from May 4, 1908, until after July, 1909. It was this rate that Higdon demanded that the appellee company should charge for the service he requested. The railroad company, however, insists that this tariff rate was not intended to and did not embrace the character of service Higdon desired. Its general traffic manager testifies that this provision in its tariff sheet was made for the sole purpose of fixing a rate at which it would transfer cars between warehouses or industries, that it had hauled from other points to Henderson, or that were loaded at Henderson for shipment to other places. For example, if a carload of freight was shipped from Memphis, Tennessee, to the Henderson mills at Henderson, it would charge the regular transportation price from Memphis to its depot in Henderson, and in addition $4 for delivering the car from the depot to the Henderson mills, on the spur track that ran into its establishment. Or, if a carload of food product was delivered to it by the Henderson mills on the spur in a car furnished for that purpose, it would charge $4 for carrying this car from the mills to its station in Henderson, and in addition charge the regular traffic rate for hauling it from there to the point of destination. In other words, the rate did not cover or contemplate a service in which a long haul did not follow or precede the movement of transferring 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the car to or from an industry in Henderson to its depot. Based on this theory, it is argued that the appellee company had not established or put in force any rate for the service demanded by Higdon at the time he requested it, and so it had the right to afterwards fix the rate at 50 cents per ton, which it did on July 13th. It is further said that this rate was reasonable, and, as Higdon declined to accept the service at this price, the company was thereby relieved from liability to him, unless he first brought the matter to the attention of the railroad commission, and obtained from that body a ruling that the rate was not reasonable. If it were true that the appellee company had no fixed or established rate that covered this service at the time it was requested, we have no doubt of its right to fix a reasonable rate. We are further of the opinion that if the rate so fixed was reasonable, and Higdon declined to accept it, he would not have any cause of action against the company growing out of the state of facts set up in his petition. Whether it is a condition precedent to the bringing of an action for damages on the ground that a rate fixed for a particular service is unreasonable, that the shipper must first obtain a ruling from the railroad commission, it does not seem necessary to decide, in the view we have of the case. It will be observed that the tariff rate previously quoted recites that the railroad company does not engage in the business of local switching between switches, tracks, warehouses, and industries in Henderson. But we have already determined that this declaration of what service it would perform did not authorize it to refuse to carry coal from the mine to the warehouses and industries in Henderson having spur connections. Therefore, so much of the provision as asserts that it will not perform this service need not be further noticed.

If the rate fixed was only for service rendered incidental to and in connection with a transportation service from which the company derived a benefit, and it was only a reasonable rate when considered in connection with the additional rate charged for transportation service, there would be much force in the argument that it was not a reasonable rate for the carriage of coal from the Keystone mine to industries in Henderson, as the company would get no other compensation from this service. But, conceding this, we are unable to relieve the company from the condition in which it voluntarily placed itself under the mistaken assumption that it was not required to render at all such service as Higdon requested. Undoubtedly the appellee company had the right to classify freight and make a reasonable difference in its charges for different kinds of freight transferred to or from one industry to another in Henderson. Its authority to make this classification and to fix different rates was as extensive as its authority to classify and charge different rates for different kinds of freight transported from one point to another outside of Henderson. But, in publishing its tariff rates for the information and use of the public, it did not stipulate for different rates or make any classification. It said in substance that, when it transferred cars from one industry to another in Henderson, it would charge for the service $4. Having thus established and promulgated the rate it would charge, without any attempt to designate the character of freight it would transport for this charge, we do not feel authorized to interpret this rate as meaning that it would be charged for corn or flour or meal, and not coal, or to limit its application to any particular article. The appellee company is bound not only by its published rate, but by its course of conduct under this published rate. It is shown by the evidence that for many years and whenever requested it transferred from one mill or industry to another mill or industry in Henderson, connected by spur tracks with its main or belt line, carloads of freight of different kinds, and charged for this service the established rate. So if there was doubt about the meaning of this published rate, or the character of service it applied to, we find that the appellee company in its course of business construed it to mean that it was under a duty to, or at least would for the charge named, transfer loaded cars of freight from one factory or mill to another.

Under these facts it was plainly a discrimination against Higdon to refuse to perform the service for him at the price charged to others for a like service. Union P. R. Co. v. Goodridge, 149 U. S. 680, 37 L. ed. 896, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 970; Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Mississippi R. Commission, 203 U. S. 496, 51 L. ed. 289, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 163. If the appellee company had confined the transfer service to such service as was incidental to transferring cars of freight to and from its depot to mills and industries, there would be much force in the contention of counsel; but, as it did not pursue this course of conduct, we must treat the case as we find it, and as it was made by the appellee company. The rate as published covered all service, and did not specify what character of freight it applied to, or make any distinction between corn and coal. If, under this rate, it was obliged to or did in its course of dealing transfer wheat, corn, or other produce for certain persons from one point in Henderson to another, then it was obliged to perform this service upon the same terms and conditions for all persons demanding it, without reference to the class of freight hauled. Const. §§ 214, 215. In the absence of a tariff or rate classification by the appellee company, we cannot say that a higher rate should be charged for hauling coal than should be charged for hauling corn or wheat. Further insisting on its right to make a distinction between these articles, and to support the contention that the published rate was not intended to and did not apply to coal, it is said that, when it hauled a car of freight from a mill or industry or from one industry to another in Henderson, it did so with the expectation that the freight so transferred would be converted into some article by the mill or industry receiving it, and then shipped to points out of Henderson over its line, thus giving it what it calls a transportation haul, or a haul out of which it would be compensated for the transfer service from factory to mill. This contention is entirely lacking in merit. It might be argued with as much force and relevancy to the issue that, as the mills could not be operated without coal, therefore it should haul coal from the mine to the mill so that produce might be manufactured that the appellee company could haul to points outside of Henderson.

We have examined the case of Dixon v. Central R. Co. 110 Ga. 173, 35 S. E. 369, but do not find it applicable to the state of facts presented by the record before us. In that case the question before the court was whether or not the service was "transportation service" or "switching service," and under the facts of that case it was held to be "transportation service," and therefore the charge established for "switching service" was not applicable. In the case we have, our conclusion that the rate of $4 per car was applicable to the service demanded, although it is described in the tariff sheet as "switching service," is largely rested upon the ground that the company charged this rate to other shippers for a like service. In the Dixon Case it does not appear that the question that influenced our decision upon this point was before the court. If the question of the applicability of the tariff rate we have quoted was submitted to us freed from the construction given to it by the appellee company in its dealings with reference to the transfer of freight between other industries, we would say that it did not apply to the service sought by Higdon. It seems to us that the service Higdon desired was not "switching," but "transportation," service. It was the same kind of service that the appellee company would have performed if a car was loaded with coal at a mine at any point on its road, and then hauled to the customer to whom it was consigned. But the appellee company in its course of conduct treated what might properly be called "transportation service" as "switching service," and applied to it the rate it now claims is only applicable to "switching service." This being so, we again repeat that it cannot be allowed to make any discrimination between Higdon and others similarly situated.

Coming now to the amount of damages Higdon is entitled to recover: He had two contracts with the Keystone Company. In one contract, dated April 5, 1908, it agreed to furnish to him during the year not more than 20,000 tons, and it was in reliance upon this contract and the $4 rate he anticipated the appellee company would charge, that he contracted to furnish to various industries about 14,000 tons. He also had other contracts to furnish coal to industries having spur connections, made before the contract with the coal mine, that it appears he could have filled with its coal. By the terms of the other contract, made in May, 1908, the Keystone Company appointed Higdon its sole agent in the city of Henderson to sell for it in the city coal in carload lots. But this contract stipulated that "the first party (Keystone Company) does not obligate itself to furnish for or on account of the second party (Higdon), under this contract, any given quantity of coal, nor shall it be required to furnish any coal which shall interfere with the supply of coal on the local market in less than carload lots or by wagon loads. It being the mutual understanding that the first party shall supply its local trade by wagon delivery, shall fill the contract made with the Crescent Coal Company, signed by said Joe Higdon, and if then it has any coal on hand the said Joe Higdon shall have the refusal, and the first party shall not have any right to ship it elsewhere, if the second party should desire to use it under this contract in carload lots."

It will be observed that it was virtually optional with the Keystone Company whether it furnished Higdon any coal under the May, 1908, contract, and upon the record before us we do not think he is entitled to any damages under this contract, as it does not appear that on the faith of it he made any contracts that caused him to suffer any loss. On the contract made in April, he is entitled to recover the difference between what it cost him to fill the contracts he had made, whether before or after July 1, 1908, with industries having spur connections, and that he could have filled with coal from the Keystone mine between July 1, 1908, and July 1, 1909, and what it would have cost him to fill these contracts if he had obtained coal from this mine. As it appears that this mine ceased operations before July 1, 1909, the damage should be confined to the quantity of coal that the Keystone mine could have supplied under the contract before it ceased operations, and that he could have furnished in fulfillment of the contracts made with customers before that time. Upon these issues the appellant was entitled to a jury trial.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, for a new trial in conformity with this opinion.

Petition for rehearing denied.

JULIUS HOPPE, Admr., etc., of Ernest Lampe, Deceased, Resp't.,
v.

CITY OF WINONA et al., Appts.

Electricity — wires strung on city bridge — liability.

The city of Winona, under authority of Congress and of the legislatures of Wisconsin and Minnesota, constructed a bridge across the Mississippi river, from the Minnesota to the Wisconsin side thereof, and thereafter operated it as a toll bridge. By an ordinance duly enacted, the city authorized defendant power company to string its electric wires over and attach the same to the framework of the bridge, for the transmission of electricity from its plant in Wisconsin to, and the distribution thereof in, the city of Winona. The city reserved the right to control the manner in which the wires were so strung, and directions in that respect were given by the ordinance. The wires so placed upon the bridge carry for 25,000 to 45,000 voltage of electricity, and at times throw off a "brush" or "disruptive discharge" sufficient to cause the death of a person in close proximity therewith, without actual contact with the wire. The city thereafter let a contract for painting the bridge, and decedent was in the employ of the contractor in doing the work. He was killed while so at work by a

In Augusta v. Hudson, 88 Ga. 599, 15 S. E. 638, s. c. 94 Ga. 135, 21 S. E. 289, it was held that a city operating a toll bridge over a river, the abutment of which, on one end thereof, was in another state, was, as to the "brush" or "disruptive discharge" of electricity from the wires. It is held:

(1) That if the wires were negligently strung upon the bridge, by reason of the fact that they were uninsulated, and not sufficiently elevated upon supports above the structure to avoid persons coming in contact therewith while at work upon the bridge, both the city and the power company are liable.

(2) Whether there was negligence in this respect was, on the evidence, a question of fact, and the verdict of the jury is sustained.

(3) That the relation of the city to the bridge was that of private owner of a quasi public highway, and its grant of authority to the power company to string its wires thereon was an exercise of its municipal, and not of its governmental, functions.

(4) The dangers from a "brush discharge" of electricity from the wire were unknown to the contractor or decedent, and both were entitled to warning thereof from the city.

(5) The doctrine of independent contract or has no application to the case.

(6) The question of decedent's contributory negligence was a question of fact for the jury.

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court for Winona County denying their independent motions for judgment notwithstanding a verdict for plaintiff, or for a new trial, in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which was alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. A. Randall and Brown, Abbott, & Somsen, for appellant city:

The act of the city touching the placing and keeping of the wires upon any part of the bridge is wholly without the scope of its corporate power, viz, ultra vires.

J. A. C.

Laws Wis. 1880, chap. 274), and chap. 113, Sp. Laws Minn. 1891, the city of Winona was authorized to construct and maintain a wagon bridge across the Mississippi river from the city to the Wisconsin side of the stream. Pursuant to this authority the bridge was constructed and since maintained by the city. Defendant La Crosse Water Power Company owns and operates a power plant on the Wisconsin side of the river, developing therefrom electricity, and conveying the same by means of electric wires to the city of Winona. In 1907, the city council, by ordinance duly enacted, granted authority to and permitted the power company to string its said wires over and attach the same to the bridge. The ordinance required that the wires should be attached to high voltage insulators, and be strung from the frames of angle iron to be attached to the topmost girders of the bridge. The wires were so strung about 50 feet above the traveled portion of the bridge, and in no way interfered with the use of the same. They were of copper, three eighths of an inch in diameter, and not insulated. At one point upon the Wisconsin side of the channel of the river the wires were so strung that, by reason of the long distance between the supports, they sagged and came within 3 feet of a cross bar of the bridge, and extending parallel with the same a distance of 15 inches of the top girder, so that it was 3 feet above and 15 inches from the side of the girder.

It became necessary in 1909 to make certain repairs upon the bridge, and a contract was let by the city to one Hoppe to paint the ironwork of the entire structure. Hoppe employed plaintiff's intestate, who, while upon the iron girder at the top of the bridge, and at the point where the electric wires sagged to within 3 feet of the same, received a "brush" or "disruptive discharge" of electricity therefrom, without coming in actual contact therewith, and was killed. Plaintiff thereafter brought this action, charging the power company with negligently placing the wire upon the bridge, uninsulated, and not at a sufficient height from the top thereof to avoid injury to workmen upon the bridge, the city with permitting the same, and defendant city with a failure to warn and instruct decedent of the dangers incident to a "brush discharge" of electricity. Defendants put in issue the negligence charged, and alleged that decedent came to his death by reason of his own contributory negligence. Plaintiff had a verdict, and defendants separately appealed from an order denying their independent motions for judgment notwithstanding the verdict 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

or a new trial. The assignments of error present questions peculiar to each defendant. We dispose of the question presented by the power company first.

1. It appears that the wires were strung upon the bridge pursuant to authority granted by the city in the form of an ordinance enacted for that purpose, which ordinance specified the manner and condition in which they should be strung. In fact, the ordinance required that the work be done under supervision of the city engineer. The trial court instructed the jury that if there was negligence in the manner in which the wires were attached to the bridge, directing the particular attention to the place where decedent met his death, both defendants were liable. It is the contention of the power company that the evidence wholly fails to make a case of negligence in this respect, and therefore, that a verdict should have been directed for both defendants. In this we do not concur. The question was, on the evidence, one of fact for the jury.

There is and can be no controversy concerning the principles of law applicable to the case. The power company was unquestionably under legal obligations, in placing the wires upon the bridge, to exercise care commensurate with the dangerous character of the instrumentality, and to adopt such methods as were reasonably practicable to avoid endangering those who might be employed upon or otherwise making legitimate use of the structure as a thoroughfare. Gilbert v. Duluth General Electric Co. 93 Minn. 99, 106 Am. St. Rep. 430, 100 N. W. 653; Musolf v. Duluth Edison Electric Co. 108 Minn. 369, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 451, 122 N. W. 499. The wires in question carried from 25,000 to 45,000 voltage of electricity, and were not insulated or otherwise protected from contact by persons working upon the bridge. It appears that uninsulated wires so heavily charged throw off at times a "brush" or "disruptive discharge" of electricity sufficient to cause the death of a person in close proximity thereto, without actual contact with the wire. This fact is well known to electricians and those familiar with this generally unknown, powerful, and destructive agency. The power company was bound to take knowledge of the fact that it would become necessary from time to time to make repairs upon the bridge, particularly in painting the same, to prevent deterioration and decay from exposure to the elements, and in placing the wires thereon precaution should have been taken for the safety of those thus engaged. Byerly v. Consolidated Light, Power, & Ice Co. 130 Mo. App. 593, 109 S. W. 1065. If the placing of the wires upon the bridge in the manner stated was an act of negligence, and likely to result in injury in some form, it is immaterial that defendant could not reasonably have anticipated injury in the manner disclosed in the case at bar. Christianson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 67 Minn. 94, 69 N. W. 640. But, as stated, the law of the case is not disputed. Defendants' contention is that its full duty in the premises has been discharged.

It is claimed that the evidence is conclusive that it was impracticable to insulate the wires; that, if insulated, the elements would destroy the same and render the wires of greater danger; and, further, that they could not have been elevated higher at the point in question without imposing an additional strain upon the bridge and imperiling its strength; hence, that the court should have directed a verdict in defendants' favor. This argument is not of substantial force. It must be conceded, since the jury so found, that in the condition in which the wires were strung they were dangerous to the life and safety of those at work upon the bridge. There was no imperative necessity that they should be strung at this place, and the reason for doing so would seem to have been one of economy in the distribution of electricity developed by defendant at its plant. Defendant had no vested right in the use of the bridge for that purpose, and, though granted by the city council, the right should have been exercised with due regard to the safety of those engaged in the vicinity of the wires, and, if their safety could not be provided for, and probable injury guarded against by reasonable precautions, the right should not have been exercised at all, and other methods of transmitting the electricity to Winona adopted and resorted to.

Defendants offered considerable evidence tending to show that the manner of stringing the wires over the bridge involved a consideration of many technical facts and conditions, cognizable only by experts, and of which laymen could not intelligently judge, from which it is urged that the opinion of the experts that the wires were properly placed is conclusive. This contention is not sound. The experts, in giving their testimony to the effect that the wires were strung in the only practicable manner, had in mind, not the protection of third persons from possible injury, but the safety of the bridge, and the fact that additional supports would increase the strain upon that structure, and therefore were impracticable. For reasons already suggested, this furnishes no sufficient excuse. If the bridge was of insufficient strength to support the wires with proper supports, it should not have been adopted as a means of reaching Winona with the wires.

2. The assignments of error challenging rulings of the court in the admission and exclusion of evidence, and in its charge to the jury, require no extended discussion. We have examined them all, and discover no reversible error. The complaint alleged that wires in the condition of those in question would throw off a "brush discharge" of electricity. This was supported by evidence at the trial in connection with other evidence of a "disruptive discharge," and complaint is made because the court permitted the jury to determine whether decedent's death was caused by either. In this there was no prejudicial error. It would seem of no particular importance by what name the escaping electricity was known. Defendant was informed by the complaint of the fact that a discharge of electricity from the wire caused decedent's death, and this was sufficient to admit of the evidence characterizing it either as a brush or disruptive discharge. The complaint also alleged that the wires were not insulated, and, as remarked by the trial court, the allegations thereof, fairly construed, charged negligence in stringing them over the bridge in that condition.

There were no errors in the instructions of the court to the jury. The charge was full and complete, and gave to the jury the correct rules of law applicable to the case. The points made support in the main the contention that issues not presented by a strict construction of the complaint were submitted to the jury. The complaint was entitled to a liberal construction, and there was no such departure therefrom as to justify a reversal. The question whether decedent was entitled to instructions concerning the dangers incident to a brush or other discharge of electricity was properly submitted to the jury, as well as the question of his contributory negligence. No evidence was presented that decedent was familiar with the action of electricity under conditions like those here disclosed, and in view of the fact that his work took him near the wires, he was entitled to proper warning of the dangers incurred. The evidence made the question whether decedent was at the particular point upon the bridge contrary to instructions, and whether he was in the exercise of due care for his safety while there, questions of fact for the jury, and we discover no reason for disturbing their conclusion.

The appeal by the city presents questions respecting its liability which do not involve the power company. These questions will be disposed of in the order presented in the brief of counsel for the city.

The bridge was constructed across the river under authority granted to the city by the Federal Congress and the legislatures of the states of Wisconsin and Minnesota. Both legislative acts provided that the bridge, when so constructed, might, at the election of the city council, be operated and maintained without cost to the traveling public, or as a toll bridge. The Wisconsin act prescribed a maximum charge, if the city council determined to operate it for hire. No question is made respecting the authority of the city to construct and maintain the bridge, and no controversy arises as to its ownership of the structure, and its power and duty to keep and maintain it in suitable repair for the uses intended by its construction. Nor is it questioned that authority was granted the power company by the city council to string its electric wires over and attach the same to the framework of the bridge. The city council determined to operate the structure as a toll bridge, and it has exacted a charge from persons making use thereof. It is also undisputed that the city entered into a contract with one Hoppe for painting the bridge, and that decedent was in the employ of the contractor, and engaged in the performance of this contract, at the time of his death. The contentions of the city are that:

(1) In passing the ordinance in question, and thereby permitting the wires to be strung and maintained upon the bridge, the city was (if not acting wholly ultra vires, so as to be in any way liable) in the exercise of a public or political, and not a private or corporate, function, and as a legislative body, in a semijudicial capacity, and in a matter involving governmental policy and discretion; (2) that Hoppe, the employer of deceased, was the city's independent contractor, and the rule of respondent superior had no application as between the city and the contractor's servants; and (3) that, if the city owed the contractor's servants any duty respecting notice and warning of dangers from coming in proximity with the wires, that duty was fully discharged.

1. The determination of the first question depends largely upon the relation of the city to the bridge and its maintenance. If the construction and control thereof was an exercise of its governmental powers, as distinguished from its municipal or proprietary affairs, then it is quite probable that its management, including the act granting permission to string the wires thereon, would also be governmental or legislative, for an exercise of which no action lies. But, if its relation to the bridge involves its business or proprietary capacity, the ordinance granting the privilege to the power company would partake of the same character.

It is clear that the bridge was the private property of the city, and held, owned, and maintained in its proprietary capacity. It was not constructed with reference to a street or highway laid out or established by public authority, and was not open to the free and unrestricted use of the public. Travel thereon was limited to those who paid the prescribed toll, receipts from which went into the city treasury. The city was under legal obligation to keep and maintain the bridge in suitable repair for the use of those paying for the privilege, precisely as municipalities owning and maintaining public wharves, landings, and docks for hire are required to maintain them in safe condition for use. 28 Cyc. 1309, and cases cited. And there can be no serious question but that it would be liable, for damages sustained for a failure to exercise reasonable care in this respect, to the same extent as though the bridge was owned and operated by an individual. Augusta v. Hudson, 94 Ga. 135, 21 S. E. 289; 1 Thomp. Neg. 317.

The case of Becker v. La Crosse, 99 Wis. 414, 40 L.R.A. 829, 67 Am. St. Rep. 874, 75 N. W. 84, involving liability for neglect in the maintenance of a similar bridge at La Crosse, is not in point to the contrary. The defect involved in that case was an improper construction of the approaches to the bridge, extending a distance of 2 miles over and across the river bottoms on the Minnesota side of the stream. The Wisconsin court held that, while the bridge was constructed under proper authority, the city of La Crosse had no power to extend its jurisdiction into Minnesota, and make itself responsible for the highway over the bottom land adjacent to the river in that state. The act of the legislature of Minnesota, granting authority to the city of La Crosse to construct and maintain that bridge, provided that the city should be responsible for accidents and injuries resulting from its failure to maintain the structure in proper condition for use. Had the accident there complained of been caused by a defect in the bridge itself, though happening upon the Minnesota side of the river, the Wisconsin court would undoubtedly have held the city liable. In other words, the court would have held that, in accepting the grant from this state, it also, as a matter of law, accepted and assumed the conditions attached to it.

And again, though the bridge be treated as the private property of the city, it is in all essential respects a public thoroughfare, and the liability respecting its control and management must be measured and determined according to the principles of law applicable to the care and maintenance of public streets and other public grounds. The bridge answered every purpose of a public way. It was constructed to enable the public to pass to and from the state of Wisconsin, and in no essential respect differs from a public bridge along and upon a highway wholly within the boundaries of the city. It is well settled that, when a municipality authorizes a third person to place upon its public streets agencies of a character likely to endanger the traveling public, even though the privilege granted be beyond its authority, liability arises upon injury to a person lawfully upon the street, who is free from fault. Winona v. Botzet, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 204, 94 C. C. A. 563, 169 Fed. 321; Stanley v. Davenport, 54 Iowa, 463, 37 Am. Rep. 216, 2 N. W. 1004, 6 N. W. 706; Richmond v. Smith, 101 Va. 161, 43 S. E. 345; Landau v. New York, 105 Am. St. Rep. 709, and cases cited in note (180 N. Y. 48, 72 N. E. 631); 28 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1354. The liability in this respect is limited by some of the courts to those cases where the municipality retains control over the time, place, and manner in which the agency is placed in the streets. It is founded on entirely different principles from cases involving negligent maintenance of property to which the public have no right to resort for business or other purposes, where no duty or obligation to exercise care for their protection is imposed by law.

We shall not attempt to mark the line between governmental and municipal functions. The former concern the administration of the law by an agency of the state government; the latter, the internal affairs of the municipality. And whether the bridge and its maintenance be construed as a private enterprise, entered upon by special legislative authority, or as a quasi public highway, it is clear that the governmental functions of the city are in no way involved therein, and that the control of the bridge springs from its municipal or proprietary powers. From which it logically follows that the right granted the power company to string its wires thereon was not an exercise of governmental functions. Snider v. St. Paul, 51 Minn. 472, 18 L.R.A. 151, 53 N. W. 763.

2. The contention that Hoppe, to whom the city let the contract to paint the bridge, was an independent contractor, does not seem to be involved in the action. The thing causing the death of decedent was not the result of any act or omission on the part of the contractor, but the joint act of the power company in stringing the wires upon the bridge and that of the city in permitting it. Had the contractor's negligence been the cause of the death of decedent, then the liability of the city could well be questioned. But such was not the case. The evidence is clear that the contractor failed in no duty to warn decedent of the likelihood of danger of a brush discharge of electricity from the wires, for he was in total ignorance of that fact. The danger from this source, though present, was concealed and beyond the knowledge of the contractor or his servants, and the duty of making it known was upon the city. Smith v. Twin City Rapid Transit Co. 102 Minn. 4, 112 N. W. 1001; Hagen v. Schleuter, 236 Ill. 467, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 856, 86 N. E. 112. The question whether defendant city was negligent in this respect was properly submitted to the jury. It is probable that, as to all dangers incident to the presence of the wires, known and understood by the contractor, the city could not be held responsible. In such case the contractor would perhaps alone be liable for injury to his servants. Engel v. Eureka Club, 137 N. Y. 104, 33 Am. St. Rep. 692, 32 N. E. 1052.

This covers all questions requiring special mention. The issues of fact involved in the action were properly sent to the jury, and the record presents no reversible errors.

Order affirmed as to both defendants.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

RE HUDSON RIVER POWER TRANSMISSION COMPANY.

(106 C. C. A. 139, 183 Fed. 701.)

Bankruptcy — public-service corporation.

Involuntary bankruptcy proceedings cannot be instituted against public-service corporations, under the act of 1898.

Note. — Bankruptcy: involuntary proceedings against public-service corporations.

The question indicated by the foregoing title was discussed at some length in Adams v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. 1 Holmes, 30, Fed. Cas. No. 47, 4 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 314, which construed § 37 of the bankruptcy act of 1867, declaring that "the provisions of this act shall apply to all moneyed business or commercial corporations and joint stock companies." The court, after referring to § 48 of that act, providing that the word "person" should also include corporations, declared that APPPEALS by petitioners from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York, dismissing petitions in involuntary bankruptcy filed against the Hudson River Power Transmission Company and others. Affirmed.

Statement by Lacombe, Circuit Judge:

These causes come here on appeals from decrees of the district court dismissing petitions in involuntary bankruptcy filed against the Hudson River Power Transmission Company, the Hudson River Electric Power Company, the Saratoga Gas, Electric Light, & Power Company, and the Hudson River Electric Company.

Argued before Lacombe, Coxe, and Ward, Circuit Judges.

public corporations created for municipal or political purposes, and such private corporations as are ecclesiastical or eleemosynary, or established for the advancement of learning, were clearly not made subject to the provisions of the act. It was held that railway corporations were not such public corporations as should be excluded from the operation of the act, and that they clearly came within the meaning of the act, the court apparently being of the opinion that such a corporation was embraced by the word "business" in § 37. In reaching this conclusion, the court said that private corporations are divided into ecclesiastical and lay; and that lay corporations are divided into civil and eleemosynary; and while not denying that a railroad corporation was a quasi public corporation, declared that, in the popular meaning of the term, nearly every corporation is public, inasmuch as they are created for the public benefit, but that if the whole interest does not belong to the government, or if the corporation is not created for the administration of political or municipal power, the corporation is private. It was contended in the case, that the Massachusetts legislature, in creating this corporation, had subjected it to certain duties and liabilities; that these liabilities were not transmissible; that the duties could not be delegated; and that the corporation could not divest itself of the power of performing those duties; and it was further contended that the inconvenience attending the alienation of the franchises and property of railroad corporations should move the courts to exclude such corporations from the operation of the bankruptcy act upon the ground of public policy. But the court, after pointing out that the Massachusetts legislature had authorized railroad corporations to alienate and to assign their franchises, and had authorized creditors to sell these franchises on execution, and permitted corporations to alienate them for the payment of debts or the security of creditors, declared that since the argument that the inconvenience

Lacombe, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Various points have been discussed upon the argument, but, under the view we take of the questions presented, this discussion may be confined to one subject only. It will be necessary first to state precisely what is the business of each company.

The Saratoga Gas, Electric Light, & Power Company was incorporated under the transportation corporations law of the attending the alienation of the franchises and property was sufficient reason for refusing to adjudicate a railroad corporation a bankrupt had not prevented the state from allowing these franchises to be sold and the proceeds of the sale applied in payment of debts of first attaching creditors, it certainly did not apply with greater force to a statute for the more equitable division of the proceeds among all the creditors,—meaning, of course, the bankruptcy statute. And the court further said that since the grantees of the franchises of a corporation to operate a railroad can acquire no greater right than the corporation had by the terms of its charter, and since the purchaser must take his title subject to all the conditions of the original grant, and subject to all the duties and liabilities to the state, the public, and individuals, none of whose rights can be impaired by the transfer, there were no such inherent difficulties in the way of sale and transfer of the property and franchises as would exclude the corporation from the operation of the bankruptcy statute.

And in other cases it was held that the act of 1867 embraced railroad corporations, and that they were not corporations of such a public nature as required their exclusion from the operation of the act. Sweatt v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. 3 Cliff. 339, Fed. Cas. No. 13,684; 5 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 234; Alabama & C. R. Co. v. Jones, Fed. Cas. No. 126, 5 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 97; Winter v. Iowa, M. & N. P. R. Co. 2 Dill. 487, Fed. Cas. No. 17,800, 7 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 289; Rankin v. Florida, A. & G. C. R. Co. Fed. Cas. No. 11,567, 1 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 647; Re Southern Minnesota R. Co. Fed. Cas. In New Orleans, S. F. & L. R. Co. v. Delamore, 114 U. S. 501, 29 L. ed. 244, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1009, the court declared that since the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts to adjudicate railroad companies state of New York, having authority under its charter and franchises to lay down, erect, or maintain wires, pipes, conduits, or other fixtures in, over, or under the streets, highways, and public places of the village of Saratoga Springs, for the purpose of furnishing or distributing gas, or furnishing or transmitting electricity for light, heat, or power, or maintaining underground conduits or ducts for electrical conductors. At the time petition was filed, it was engaged in making gas at a plant which it maintained in Saratoga Springs. It also purchased electricity from a corporation known as the Hudson River Water Power Company. This gas and electricity it distributed through mains and wires for lighting the streets, avenues, public parks, and public and private buildings in the village. It also had a supply store for the furnishing of gas and electric light fixtures and appliances. This, however, was a mere incidental activity, amounting to a very small part of its business. The pursuit in which it was principally engaged was the public and private lighting aforesaid, by means of the gas and electrical current which it made or bought.

The Hudson River Electric Company was incorporated under the transportation corporations law of the state of New York, having authority under its charter and franchises to lay down, erect, or maintain poles, wires, pipes, conduits, ducts, or other fixtures in, over, or under the streets, highways, and public places of the cities, villages, and towns in the counties of Warren, Saratoga, and the adjoining counties, for the purpose of furnishing or transmitting electricity for light, heat, or power, and of maintaining underground conduits or ducts for electrical con-bankrupts, and to administer their property under the bankrupt act, had been sustained by several circuit courts in the Adams, Sweatt, Jones, and Winter Cases, and since these courts were of last resort upon this question, and valuable rights might depend upon their judgment upon this point, the question should be considered as settled by such cases.

On the other hand, in an early decision under the act of 1867, in Re Opelousa & G. W. R. Co. Fed. Cas. No. 10,547, 3 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 31, the district court of Louisiana to all appearance took the contrary view.

Under § 4b of the act of 1898, before the amendment of 1910, it was provided that any corporation engaged principally in manufacturing, trading, printing, publishing, mining, or mercantile pursuits should be subject to adjudication in involuntary bankruptcy. It should be observed that the amendment of 1910 employs the words used in the act of 1867, although it also makes a few specific exceptions, the statute now reading: "Any incorporated company, and any moneyed business or commercial corporation, except a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation." Of course, so far as railroad corporations are concerned, the question involved in this note is answered by the express provision of the statute; but so far as other public-service corporations are concerned, it might well be argued that the application of the maxim, Expressio unius est exclusio alterius, would entail the result that all public-service corporations except railroads are now subject to be adjudicated involuntary bankrupts, and this notwithstanding the attitude of the subjoined cases, decided under the statute before the amendment.

It has been held that a corporation given power by its charter "to buy and sell water for power, manufacturing, and hydraulic purposes," which power, however, did not appear ever to have been used, the company having confined itself entirely to obtaining and furnishing water for municipalities, its customers, was not engaged principally either in trading or mercantile pursuits so as to render it subject to adjudication in involuntary bankruptcy. Re New York & W. Water Co. 98 Fed. 711, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 508, affirmed without opinion in 43 C. C. A. 91, 102 Fed. 1004. The court, although placing its decision unqualifiedly upon the ground that the language of § 4b was not sufficiently comprehensive to embrace companies of this kind, intimated, at least, that if they were comprehended within the plain language of the act, they should not be excluded from its operation merely because they might be said to be of a quasi public character, the court saying that while such companies do subserve a public use so as to justify the exercise of the right of eminent domain, and although the uses which they subserve are none the less public because procured through private enterprise, it did not attach much importance to any quasi public character, more or less, that water companies might have in consequence of the public use which they subserve, for, since the franchises of this particular company by its contract with local authorities were assignable, there was nothing to prevent the exercise of its functions by any transferee to whom its powers might pass through bankruptcy proceedings. In the foregoing case attention was called to, and some stress laid upon, the fact that the language of the act of 1898 is much narrower than that of 1867, and out of this was spelled an intention on the part of Congress to exclude from the act of 1898 some corporations which were subject to adjudication under the act of 1867. The same point is made in Re Philadelphia & L. Transp. Co. 114 Fed. 403, 7 Am. Bankr. Rep. 707, holding that a corporation engaged in the business of carriage by water of passengers and goods for hire could not be adjudicated an involuntary bankrupt under the act of 1898, the court saying that the specification ductors. It did not own a generating plant, buying electric current from the Hudson River Electric Power Company. It owned transmission lines, with various substations and switch houses, and was engaged in the distribution of electrical energy in the cities of Glen Falls, Watervliet, and Cohoes, not only to private consumers, but also to the municipalities, for the lighting of public streets, parks, and buildings.

The Hudson River Electric Power Company was also incorporated under the transportation corporations law of New York, its object being to conduct in the state of New York the business of generating and dealing in electricity; the use of electricity for light, heat, and power; the carrying on of the business of "lighting by electricity, and using it for heat and power in cities, towns, and villages within the state, and the streets, avenues, and public places thereof, and public and private buildings therein." It had an electric power plant at Utica, also transmission line from Utica to Clark's Mills, and tower transmission line from Ballston Spa to Amsterdam. It supplied electricity to other companies belonging to the group now under consideration, and to one or more electric railroads. Except for a small proportion which it got from Kane's Mills Company, it generated all the electricity it supplied. It held franchises in Johnstown, Little Falls, Ft. Plain, and Nelliston. It was engaged in furnishing public street lighting. It held the whole or a controlling interest in the stock of the other companies of the group, and conducted the whole as one business enterprise.

The Hudson River Power Transmission Company was also organized under the transportation corporations law for the development, use, sale, and transfer of elec-of the narrower classes of manufacturing, printing, and publishing corporations, and the addition of the words, "trading or mercantile corporations," indicated that the latter words were to have a restricted meaning, and that they were not to be so broadened as to cover the whole field of commerce or commercial pursuits. The only allusion to the public nature of the corporation was the remark of the court that a proposed construction was self-condemnatory which would embrace within the act all railroad and steamship lines in the country, the telephone and telegraph lines, the express transfer companies, and perhaps other corporations having anything to do with the movement of persons or commodities; and that it felt sure that if Congress had intended to subject such well-known and important classes of corporations to the operation of the bankrupt act, a clearer legislative declaration to that effect would have been made.

In Re Bay City Irrig. Co. 135 Fed. 850, 14 Am. Bankr. Rep. 370, the court took up both phases of the question; that is, first, whether the language of the act was sufficiently broad to include a public-service corporation; and second, whether any consideration of public policy required the exclusion of a public-service corporation from its operation. Taking up the first phase, the court held that a corporation which buys nothing which it sells to others, but only charges a reasonable compensation for its labor, skill, and time in furnishing water to others for irrigation purposes, which compensation is paid in rice, the same afterwards being sold by the company and converted into money, is engaged in neither manufacturing nor in mercantile pursuits so as to be subject to adjudication under § 4b. On the second phase of the question, the court declared that it was against public policy to hold subject to adjudication as an involuntary bankrupt a quasi public corporation clothed with the powers of eminent domain, and subject to the same restrictions and penalties in their exercise as railway companies, and whose business, pursuant to its charter rights, was to furnish water for irrigating for remuneration.

In Re H. J. Quimby Freight Forwarding Co. 121 Fed. 139, 10 Am. Bankr. Rep. 424, affirmed in 61 C. C. A. 111, 126 Fed. 167, 11 Am. Bankr. Rep. 205, appeal dismissed in 196 U. S. 643, 49 L. ed. 632, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 785, the court, in holding that a corporation which was chartered as a common carrier of property or persons, but which also let teams for hire and took horses to board, was not engaged in trading or mercantile pursuits so as to be subject to adjudication in involuntary bankruptcy under § 4b, said that while it might think it advisable that corporations of this kind should be brought within the scope of the act, it must be guided by what Congress had said, and not by its own view of public policy.

Attention is also directed to Re Georgia Mfg. & Public Service Co. 166 Fed. 964, 21 Am. Bankr. Rep. 878, holding that the fact that a corporation engaged in manufacturing paper and paper products also operated a waterworks and electric lighting plant did not, where the latter enterprises constituted a comparatively small portion of corporate business, prevent it from being adjudicated an involuntary bankrupt, as principally engaged in manufacturing.

And in Re Charles Town Light & P. Co. 183 Fed. 160, 25 Am. Bankr. Rep. 687, affirmed without opinion in 184 Fed. 986, it was held merely that a corporation which makes it its principal business to buy, sell, measure, and deliver electricity for compensation was engaged principally in trading, and was therefore subject to adjudication as an involuntary bankrupt under § 4b.

tric power, light, and heat. It had a generating plant at Mechanicsville and various transmission lines. It supplied power to the United Traction Company, which runs cars in Albany, Troy, Cohoes, and Watervliet, and through the Albany Electric Illuminating Company furnished light and power both to the public and to private individuals in the city of Albany.

The district judge held that these corporations were not such as could be made bankrupts under the act of 1898 (act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 545, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418) and its amendments.

Various arguments are advanced in support of this decision. It is contended that whether or not companies manufacture or trade in gas or electricity, the dominant and characteristic feature of their activity is the transportation of the light-producing substance which they obtain through their wires or ducts to the individual points of consumption; and it is pointed out that the state of New York by legislative action has expressly classified corporations for manufacturing and supplying gas, or for manufacturing and using electricity for producing light, heat, or power, and in lighting streets, avenues, public parks, and other places, and public and private building of cities, villages, and towns, within the state as "transportation corporations." Laws 1890, chap. 566. See also public-service commissions law, as amended by chapter 480, Laws 1910 (Consol. Laws, chap. 48.)

It is contended that the generating of electricity is not technically a manufacture, and that the buying and selling of illuminating gas and electricity is not properly a trading or mercantile pursuit, which terms, it is insisted, should be restricted to dealings in merchandise, goods, or chattels, the ordinary subjects of commerce.

Without considering these several arguments, we find sufficient reason to sustain the decrees in a peculiar character of these companies. If they do manufacture and do trade, they do much more. Under authority conferred by the state and by various local authorities they are "principally engaged" in supplying the means whereby streets, avenues, and public places in the state are lighted and the public safety and comfort thereby promoted. They are corporations of "public utility," and if they did not themselves light these localities, the public authorities would no doubt be constrained to do so themselves. By reason, moreover, of the circumstance that they are given this authority, with, to a certain extent, the right of exercising eminent domain, they are correlatively charged with a duty to the public, which is no part of the obligations of ordinary corporations engaged in "manufacturing, trading, printing, publishing, mining, or mercantile pursuits." And as a result, when financial adversity overtakes them, there are interests which have to be considered other than those which require attention when the ordinary corporation of the enumerated classes becomes insolvent.

In the case of an ordinary manufacturing or trading corporation, the matters presented for disposition are, in their last analysis, merely the disposition of dollars and cents. The assets are to be realized and their proceeds distributed among creditors of different classes, and the residue, if any, to owners. But in the case of a "public utility" corporation, such as these, the public itself, the community in which the corporation is rendering service, has a right superior even to creditors of every class, and which right cannot be extinguished by the payment of a dividend in money. With the power to terminate franchises for failure to discharge the obligations inherent in their grant, the state or local authorities can destroy what is usually the most valuable asset of the defaulting company, against the wishes of all creditors, and before the latter might succeed in finding an assignee of the franchise satisfactory to local authorities who would assume the burden and perhaps pay something for the transfer. Moreover, the public safety and comfort imperatively demand that, whatever else may happen, the corporation, devoid of ready cash though it be, shall not make default on its public obligations, with the result of plunging the community in darkness, or stopping the transportation of passengers, and that in some way or other the public service shall be rendered while the financial affairs of the company are being wound up. There are no indications in the bankrupt act that Congress intended to arrange any administrative machinery competent to accomplish these results. On this branch of the case the opinion of Judge Ray is especially illuminative, when it is remembered that he was chairman of the House judiciary committee when the bankrupt act was passed. He says: "There was a serious and wide difference of opinion in the committee on the judiciary and in the Congress itself whether corporations, any corporation, should be brought under the operation of the law. There was a feeling of the part of some that railroad corporations should be included, if any were. But when it was considered that railroads are the arteries of commerce and transportation, state and interstate, created by state laws in the main, and extending with their connecting lines from state to state and lakes to gulf under merger and consolidation agreements, it was seen that, to properly administer the property of such corporations in the bankruptcy courts and under a bankruptcy law, it would be necessary to make many special and extraordinary provisions for those cases, if the public service was to be considered and the interests of the public conserved." [173 Fed. 955.]

We have been referred to some dicta and to the expressions of some text writers (Re Bay City Irrig. Co. [D. C.] 135 Fed. 850; Re New York & W. Water Co. [D. C.] 98 Fed. 711; Collier, Bankr. 6th ed. 71; Remington, Bankr. § 89), but the point raised here has never been decided. So far as we can ascertain, no corporation engaged in rendering public service has been made an involuntary bankrupt, which may be some indication of the general understanding as to the scope of § 4 of the bankruptcy act. We are of the opinion that Congress had no intention to include corporations such as these now before us in the enumeration of that section, either as it originally stood or as it was amended in 1903.

The decrees are affirmed.

CONSTANCE R. BROWN

v.

HORACE J. FULLER et al., Appts

Grant — existing easements — termination.

A grant with full covenant of warranty of the rear of a lot, for the construction of a building, terminates the right of the grantor to drain a building standing on the front of the lot to the sewer in the alley at the rear, where the sewer connection had been underground, and the grantee had no actual knowledge thereof, and the roof drainage had been across a low building on the lot which the grantor knew was to be torn down, while it is not impossible to secure drainage in other directions, although it will be expensive to do so.

APPPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County in plaintiff's favor granting a mandatory injunction to compel defendants to restore severed sewer and storm connections. Reversed.

Note. — As to implication from necessity of easement other than right of way, see note to Miller v. Hoeschler, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 327.

Statement by Brooke, J.:

Complainant and defendants were, respectively, owners of adjoining lots facing Burdick street, in the city of Kalamazoo. Upon complainant's lot, which was 22 feet wide and about 230 feet deep, extending to Farmer's alley, there had stood for many years a three-story brick block, running east from Burdick street about 90 feet. To the east and in the rear of said brick building, a one-story building extended eastward to the alley, about 130 feet. The sewage from the brick block was conducted under the one-story building to a lateral sewer in Farmer's alley. The roof drainage of the block was carried onto the roof of the one-story building, and thence to the alley. Defendant desired to erect a theater, and, his own lot not affording sufficient area for his purpose, negotiated with complainant for the purchase of the rear or easterly 130 feet of her lot. On November 8, 1908, a warranty deed of said parcel, with full covenants against encumbrances, was executed by complainant to defendants for a consideration of $5,000. This deed contains the following agreement: "It is understood and agreed between the parties hereto, as a part of the consideration of this deed, that the second parties are to build a wall on the west side of the land hereby conveyed, about 16 inches thick and about 40 feet in height, and that the party of the first part is to own said wall jointly with said second parties, and it is to be used as a party wall. The center of the said wall to be on the west line of the land above conveyed." Defendants, after said purchase was completed, proceeded to tear down the one-story building which stood on the lot conveyed, and commenced excavation for the basement under the proposed theater. In excavating, the sewer from complainant's block was uncovered, and, as defendants desired to make a basement 9 feet deep, which was 3 or 4 feet deeper than the sewer, the sewer was cut, and the excavation proceeded. In the negotiations complainant did not advise defendants of the existence of the sewer, and the record does not show that they or either of them knew it was there. After the sewer was cut, complainant filed her bill of complaint, praying for a mandatory injunction compelling defendants to restore the sewer connection and roof drainpipe, and for a permanent injunction restraining defendants from breaking or interfering with the sewer and from interfering with the passage of the roof drainage over said lot. A preliminary mandatory injunction was granted ex parte, which the court refused on motion to vacate. This injunction was granted on January 15, 1909. The cause came on to be heard on the merits October 17, 1900. In the meantime defendants had completed the theater building, and, in obedience to the mandate of the court, had taken care of the complainant's sewage and roof drainage, at considerable expense. Upon final hearing, the preliminary injunction was made permanent. The decree further provides that the expense of maintenance and repairs of the sewerage connection and the storm pipe shall be borne equally by the parties. From this decree defendants appeal.

Mr. A. J. Mills, for appellants:

To entitle the complainant to a decree, the burden was upon him to establish that the servitude was apparent, continuous, and strictly necessary to the enjoyment of his land.

Brooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question for determination here is whether or not there is an implied reservation of an easement over the land sold by complainant to defendants. It is said that in reaching the conclusion he did, the learned circuit judge relied upon the case of Smith v. Dresselhouse, 152 Mich. 451, 116 N. W. 387. An examination of the facts in that case will at once demonstrate that it differs vitally and fundamentally 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

from the case here considered. There the owner of two adjoining tenements, located upon either side of a river, upon each of which stood a mill, sold one of the tenements to the complainant in that case, and, as appurtenant to the tenement conveyed, sold the water rights. The owner and his grantees continued to operate the mill on the other side of the river, using the water for that purpose. Complainant filed his bill to enjoin the use of the water. This court held that, as to the water, complainant was a tenant in common with the owner of the adjoining tenement on the opposite bank of the stream. Mr. Justice Ostrander, in stating the general rule, there said: "It is a general rule of the law of easements that, where the owner of two tenements sells one of them, the purchaser takes the portion sold with all the benefits and burdens which appear at the time of the sale to belong to it, as between it and the property which the vendor retains." The matter under consideration was a grant, not a reservation, and in discussing the effect of the grant, he further said: "We should not expect that a grant of the land on one side of the river only, the grantor retaining the land and mill on the other side, and using the water there appurtenant, conveyed an exclusive right to the entire water power. The terms of the grant to complainant are express and seem to be unambiguous. The land is described by metes and bounds. One boundary is the center of the main channel of the river. The mill tract and the mill are within the boundaries. It is the mill privilege and water power 'there situate,' i. e., appurtenant to the land conveyed, which is deeded, with the right to flow lands and to 'use and make use of the water power there situated.'"

Assuming, therefore, that the rule was correctly stated, the case was determined, not by any application of the rule, but by a construction of the terms of the grant. Nor is it applicable to the case under consideration. Here, the sewer was under ground. It was not apparent, and defendants are not shown to have had any knowledge of its existence under the land purchased by them. But, if they had such knowledge, that fact would not be controlling, because complainant knew that the use to which this property was to be devoted would uncover the sewer, and, as it existed, destroy it.

Even if it could be said that a grantor under any circumstances could by implication reserve the right to continue an underground sewer in the premises granted, which we do not determine, it would not aid complainant. Here, it is sought by implication to reserve the right to have the existing sewer destroyed, and rebuilt in the air through the basement of the tenement to be erected upon the demised lands. Simply to state such a proposition would seem to be a sufficient answer.

The rule applicable to implied reservations of easements is stated in Cyc. Law & Proc. vol. 14, p. 1171, as follows: "As regards implied reservations of easements, the matter stands on principle in a position very different from implied grants. If the grantor intends to reserve any right over the tenement granted, it is his duty to reserve it expressly in the grant. To say that a grantor reserves to himself in entirety that which may be beneficial to him, but which may be most injurious to his grantee, is quite contrary to the principle upon which an implied grant depends, which is that a grantor shall not derogate from or render less effectual his grant, or render that which he has granted less beneficial to his grantee. Accordingly, where there is a grant of land with full covenants of warranty, without express reservation of easements, the best considered cases hold that there can be no reservation by implication, unless the easement is strictly one of necessity."

Cases are cited from many jurisdictions in support of this statement of principle, and we think it is in accord with the weight of modern authority. The great weight of authority touching the question, with reference to subterranean drainage, is to the effect that, if the owner of the land under which there is such a drain conveys a part of it with full covenants of warranty, without reference to the drain, no easement is reserved.

The grantor and his privies, under such circumstances, are estopped to claim any interest in the premises so granted. To permit such a claim would be to allow the grantor to derogate from the terms of his grant, which, by every applicable principle, is forbidden. The authorities upon the subject are collected and discussed in Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. vol. 10, p. 420. See also 14 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1166, and cases there cited, and Farnham on Waters, vol. 3, pp. 2454, 2455.

In the recent case on Covell v. Bright, 157 Mich. 419, 122 N. W. 101, which upon principle much resembles the case at bar, we said: "To entitle the complainant to a decree, the burden was upon him to establish that the servitude was apparent, continuous, and strictly necessary to the enjoyment of his lands,"—citing cases.

In New Jersey, a different doctrine for a long time obtained, based upon the ruling in the celebrated case of Pyer v. Carter, 1 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Hurlst. & N. 916, 26 L. J. Exch. N. S. 258, 5 Week. Rep. 371, and those cases which followed the rule there laid down. Pyer v. Carter has frequently been severely criticized, and was finally distinctly overruled in England. The case of Tooth v. Bryce, 50 N. J. Eq. 589, 25 Atl. 182, contains a review of the English and American cases, questions the soundness of the doctrine announced by that court in its earlier decisions, and seems to recognize the distinction between an implied grant of an easement and an implied reservation.

While it is apparent from the record that it will be somewhat expensive to dispose of the sewage from complainant's building otherwise than over defendant's land, it by no means appears that it is impossible to do so. There is not made out, therefore, a case of strict necessity.

The case presents this alternative: Either complainant at some, perhaps considerable, expense to herself, must take care of her own sewage and storm waters, or the defendants, who purchased and paid for a tenement warranted to be free from all encumbrances, must take that tenement charged in perpetuity with an encumbrance of a very serious character, and one which is liable, through the breaking or stoppage of the drain, to cause serious annoyance and damage.

Why should defendants be compelled to accept this burden? Why should they be charged in perpetuity with the duty of defraying one half of the expense of maintaining complainant's sewer, as well as the cost of its original construction? So far as the record discloses, they have done no act which was not fully warranted by the terms of the grant to them. They have sought to make use of the granted tenement in a lawful manner, and in a manner and for a purpose known by complainant before the sale.

Touching the disposition of the storm waters, it is clear that, by the sale of the one-story building upon which it had theretofore been carried to the alley, with the knowledge that said building was to be immediately demolished, complainant must have known that such drainage would be interrupted. The very terms of her written contract show this, because she stipulated for the erection of a brick wall between the premises granted and those retained. This wall was to be 16 inches thick and about 40 feet in height. It is obvious that she could not have contemplated the carrying of her roof waters over that wall. At that moment it was apparent that some new arrangement must be made to care for this water. Defendants did not contract to build a new drain and carry it across their own property to the alley, nor did they agree to construct a new sewer, and we know of no principle of equity which would compel them to do so.

The decree of the court below is reversed, and the bill of complainant is dismissed, and, inasmuch as the record discloses that defendants have expended certain sums of money in obedience to the mandate of the court in caring for complainant's sewage and water, the record will be remanded for the purpose of ascertaining the exact amount of such expenditure, which, when ascertained, shall be decreed to be a debt due from complainant to defendants, for the collection of which execution may issue.

Ostrander, Ch. J., and Hooker, McAlvay, Blair, and Stone concurred with Brooke, J.

Bird, J., dissenting:

I am of the opinion that the trial court reached a right conclusion upon the law and facts in this case, and that it ought to be affirmed by this court.

In the case of Smith v. Dresselhouse, 152 Mich. 451, 116 N. W. 387, Mr. Justice Ostrander, discussing the doctrine of implied reservations quoted, with approval, the following general rule of easements: "It is a general rule of the law of easements that, where the owner of two tenements sells one of them, the purchaser takes the portion sold with all the benefits and burdens which appear at the time of the sale to belong to it, as between it and the property which the vendor retains. Seymour v. Lewis, 13 N. J. Eq. 439, 78 Am. Dec. 108. Every grant of a thing naturally imports a grant of it as it actually exists. United States v. Appleton, 1 Sumn. 502, Fed. Cas. No. 14,463."

Mr. Justice Selden, in speaking of this rule, said: "This is not a rule for the benefit of purchasers only, but is entirely reciprocal. Hence, if, instead of a benefit conferred, a burden has been imposed upon the portion sold, the purchaser, provided the marks of this burden are open and visible, takes the property with the servitude upon it." Lampman v. Milks, 21 N. Y. 505.

If we are to take the foregoing rule as our guide in determining this case, I am very firm in the conviction that defendants took the deed of the premises burdened with the sewer. In arriving at this conclusion, the distinction made by Mr. Justice Brooke, in his opinion, between implied grants and implied reservations, has not been overlooked. Although there is a difference of opinion in the cases as to the degree of necessity required to create them, the better rule seems to be, and the one supported by the weight of authority is, that a reasonable necessity is sufficient to raise an implied grant; whereas, a strict necessity is necessary to raise an implied reservation. This court has adopted the strict necessity rule in Covell v. Bright, 157 Mich. 419, 122 N. W. 101. The question therefore arises whether the circumstances of this case are such as to bring it within the rule of strict necessity. A study of the record has persuaded me that they do. To establish her case, it was necessary for complainant to show that the easement claimed was apparent, continuous, and strictly necessary.

Was the easement apparent? "Apparent easements" have been defined to be those the existence of which appears from the construction or condition of one of the tenements, so as to be capable of being seen or known on inspection. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 405. To this class of easements belongs the bed of a running stream, an overhanging roof, a pipe for carrying water, a drain, or a sewer. Fetters v. Humphreys, 18 N. J. Eq. 262. And the mere fact that a drain or aqueduct, as the case may be, is concealed from casual vision, does not prevent it from being "apparent" in the sense in which that word is used in that connection. Larsen v. Peterson, 53 N. J. Eq. 88, 30 Atl. 1094.

Defendant testified that he did not know that the sewer extended through the premises conveyed to him. If he had no actual knowledge, he did have constructive knowledge of that fact. He had owned for upwards of twenty-five years premises side by side with the premises in question, with like improvements. He knew there was a sewer which served complainant's premises, because he had the front portion of them under lease nearly two years before he purchased the rear portion, and at the time there were five water-closets in the portion he had under lease. He knew that the sewer from his own premises was discharged into the Farmer's alley sewer, and must have known that there was no other sewer into which it could be discharged, and, if he did, it would not be unreasonable to assume that he knew the same thing was true of complainant's premises. On one occasion, prior to his purchase, a portion of the floor in the rear part was taken up, which disclosed the sewer, and defendant was present at that time. Defendant had, before purchasing the property, talked and planned with complainant's husband about building a theater where he has since erected one, and, in doing so, undoubtedly considered the question of plumbing among other questions of construction and arrangements. A knowledge of these facts was sufficient in the law to put defendant upon inquiry, and to charge him with notice that the sewer traversed that portion of the premises purchased by him.

Is the easement continuous? The answer had been in existence for twenty years, was of a permanent nature, was in use at the time, and was susceptible of being used and enjoyed without making an entry on defendant's premises, except for the purpose of repair. These facts would clearly bring it within the definition of a "continuous easement." Ibid.

Is the easement strictly necessary to the enjoyment of complainant's premises? The sewer in Farmer's alley is the only one available for her use. The city engineer testified that one might be constructed to De Visser alley, but that it would be impracticable for the reason that, where it would discharge into that sewer, it would be only 18 inches underground. The topography of that part of the city is such that no other sewer can be constructed which will serve these premises without a prohibitive expense. A cesspool was suggested by complainant; but the city authorities would not permit it. She then made an effort to buy the right of her neighbor on the north to go through the partition wall and connect with his sewer, which also discharges into the Farmer's alley sewer; but to this her neighbor would not consent. We have then a situation where complainant must be permitted to use the sewer which has served her premises for twenty years, if her building is to have any sewer service. If this situation, which nature has so fashioned that the sewage can be directed only in the direction of Farmer's alley, does not bring it within the rule of strict necessity, it would, indeed, be difficult to suggest one. If greater exigency than here exists is required before the strict necessity rule can apply, there would be little use for the existence of the rule, as its use would be so infrequent as to render it useless.

In my opinion, the trial court found his way to a very equitable adjustment of the entire matter, and I think his decree should be affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WISCONSIN

v.

DEMPSTER SMITH, Plff. in Err.

Bastardy — right of prosecutrix to employ counsel.

Prosecutrix in a bastardy proceeding is not precluded from retaining private counsel, by a statute making it the duty of the district attorney to appear and prosecute in such actions, since the proceeding is not primarily to punish defendant, but to recover compensation for the person injured.

Note. — Bastardy: right of prosecutrix to private counsel.

By the weight of authority bastardy proceedings are treated as civil proceedings. In jurisdictions where this rule prevails, there can be little question as to the right of the prosecutrix to be represented by special counsel.

In the only other case which has been disclosed, where the question under consideration has been decided, it was held that bastardy proceedings are quasi criminal, and that the complainant was entitled to be represented by private counsel, under a statute providing that prosecuting attorneys should in their respective counties appear for the state or county, and prosecute or defend in all the courts of the county all prosecutions, suits, applications, and motions, either civil or criminal, in which the state or county was a party or interested, and that they should not receive fees from private individuals, and further that they should be allowed an assistant only in cases of felony. Harley v. Ionia Circuit Judge, 140 Mich. 642, 104 N. W. 21. The court said: "The many decisions of this court clearly recognize that these are not strictly criminal proceedings. The rules of evidence applying to criminal cases as to the proof required to find against the defendant are not applied. This case was the complainant's case. She was the proper party to bring it. The interest of the public is not the only interest involved. The statute wisely provides against the contingency of such a child becoming a public charge, but it recognizes that the complainant is interested, and must also be protected. To properly protect the interests of a minor under such circumstances, by the employment of counsel, would appear not only to be a right, but the duty, of a parent or guardian. The prosecuting attorney representing the people and the attorney representing the complainant do not represent conflicting interests; nor is the complainant's attorney in any sense an assistant prosecutor." Messrs. Levi H. Bancroft, Attorney General, and Sheridan, Evans, & Merrill, for the State:

The duty imposed by the statute is for the benefit of the prosecutrix.

Meyer v. Meyer, 123 Wis. 538, 102 N. W. 52.

Vinje, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question presented by this appeal is: Can private counsel lawfully prosecute in a bastardy proceeding? It is conceded by counsel for plaintiff in error that, previous to the enactment of § 1533m (chapter 648, Laws 1907), they could do so, but it is claimed that since its enactment only the district attorney has such right. The section reads: "It shall be the duty of the district attorney to appear and prosecute in all bastardy proceedings in the trial court. . . ." And it is argued that this law, placing the duty upon the district attorney to prosecute, by implication excludes the right of a private attorney from performing the duty, and that neither the complaining witness or the defendant may insist upon the statute being complied with. It is further urged that, while a bastardy proceeding is not a criminal action, yet it subjects the defendant to great humiliation and disgrace, and sound public policy dictates that the prosecution should be placed in the hands of a disinterested prosecutor, and not in the hands of private counsel, who may be indirectly pecuniarily interested in the result; and that the statute was passed to accomplish such a purpose.

The answer to the question presented for determination will depend upon the nature and object of a bastardy proceeding, and who is primarily interested in the result of the action. If the proceeding be one in which the defendant is sought to be punished for a wrong done to society or the state, then there is great force in the argument that the state alone should prosecute. Biemel v. State, 71 Wis. 444, 37 N. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

W. 244, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 556; State ex rel. Durner v. Huegin, 110 Wis. 221, 62 L.R.A. 700, 85 N. W. 1046, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 332. A bastardy proceeding has been held to be neither a civil nor a criminal action, but one depending wholly upon the terms of the statute authorizing it for the relief that may be afforded thereby. State v. Mushied, 12 Wis. 562; State v. Jager, 19 Wis. 235; Baker v. State, 56 Wis. 568, 14 N. W. 718; Meyer v. Meyer, 123 Wis. 538, 102 N. W. 52. The latter case held it was designed primarily to enable the injured female to recover compensation from the person who has in the eye of the law inflicted injury upon her with consequent damages. It has also been held that, when instituted by the mother, it is a proceeding for her benefit and protection, to enforce the father's natural obligations to support his child. Baker v. State, 56 Wis. 568, 14 N. W. 718; Barry v. Niessen, 114 Wis. 256, 90 N. W. 166. So, we see that whether the defendant's liability is founded upon a tort or upon a natural obligation, irrespective of blame, it is a liability primarily to the mother, and the remedy is given for her benefit. True, the state is remotely interested; for, if the father does not furnish support, it may be called upon to do so. But its contingent claim upon defendant is purely a pecuniary one, and has naught to do with the violation of any criminal statute. A defendant may be adjudged guilty in a bastardy proceeding and also in a prosecution for fornication, or whatever statutory offense he may have been guilty of when the child was begotten; but they are two separate and distinct actions, founded upon distinct grounds of liability. In the one the mother is primarily interested, the state only remotely, and both interests are wholly pecuniary. In the other the state alone is interested, but not in a pecuniary sense. It is enforcing its criminal laws on the ground of public policy.

In view of the considerations as to the nature and object of a bastardy proceeding, we reach the conclusion that § 1533m was designed to provide counsel at the expense of the state, for every mother who desired to avail herself of its provisions; but she is not limited to the services of the district attorney. If she prefers to engage counsel at her own expense, she may do so, as the action is primarily for her benefit, and essentially civil in the liability enforced and remedy sought. State ex rel. Durner v. Huegin, 110 Wis. 221, 62 L.R.A. 700, 85 N. W. 1046, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 332. The object of the statute was not to place the prosecution of such actions in the hands of a disinterested counsel for the benefit of defendant, or on grounds of public policy. There is no more reason why the prosecution of such an action, seeking merely a money judgment, should be solely in the hands of a district attorney than that of many other civil actions, such as assault and battery, libel, slander, seduction, and criminal conversation. In such actions an adverse judgment would in most instances subject the defendant to great disgrace and humiliation, at least, it ought to do so, and the pecuniary interest of plaintiff's attorney in such actions may well be coextensive with his interest in a bastardy proceeding. It follows that the trial court did not err in permitting private counsel to prosecute the case.

Judgment affirmed.

Scott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An information was filed in the district court of Uinta county on November 4, 1908, charging Charles Maki with the crime of the decisions which have passed upon the point since the date of that note.

The statements of defendant upon a murder trial are admissible where it appears that he was summoned as a witness at the inquest, and, without being sworn, testified as to his whereabouts at the time the crime was committed, the bill of exceptions not showing any suspicion that he thought he was under arrest. McMeans v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 69, 114 S. W. 837.

And voluntary confessions made at a coroner's inquest while the defendant was under arrest charged with murder are admissible upon his trial for murder, where he was told that he did not have to testify, and that, if he did, the evidence would be used against him. Reagan v. People, — Colo. —, 112 Pac. 785.

And statements of an accused who was murder in the first degree. He was duly arraigned, pleaded not guilty, and was subsequently tried and found guilty of manslaughter. He filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, judgment was pronounced against him upon the verdict, and he brings error.

1. The plaintiff in error was sworn and testified as a witness at the coroner's inquest. The coroner testified as a witness at the trial on behalf of the state, and inquiry was made as to statements made by the plaintiff in error in his evidence given at the inquest. The defendant was permitted to interrogate the witness as to the conditions under which he so testified. Upon the answers to such interrogatories, the defendant objected to the witness testifying to what he said under oath at the coroner's inquest, for the reason that his statements were not voluntarily made, but were made at a time when he was under arrest for the crime charged in the information, and had not been apprised by the coroner that he was under no obligation to testify, and that, if he did testify at such inquest, his statements might be used against him upon his trial. The objection was overruled, and an exception reserved.

The evidence of the coroner shows that the plaintiff in error was under arrest at the time he gave his evidence before the coroner for killing the deceased, whose dead body and the nature of the death was then the subject of the coroner's inquest. He was not informed that what he said might be used against him upon his trial, nor was he advised of his rights in the matter, nor does it appear that he had the benefit of counsel. Under such circumstances, it is contended by the defendant that evidence of what he then and there testified to under the surrounding conditions was inadmissible as evidence against him upon the trial. This evidence was material. It tended to show that he was present with the deceased at the time and place when the latter received his death blow. The evidence was largely circumstantial, and under arrest at the time of an inquest are admissible although he was not then informed of his legal rights, where he declined to answer a number of questions put to him and was not compelled to do so. Anderson v. State, 133 Wis. 601, 114 N. W. 112.

So, a confession made before a coroner, who, on being informed by the sheriff that the prisoner wished to confess, excluded all persons from the room except the county attorney, the sheriff, and the jury, is admissible, where the county attorney told him that he need not incriminate himself, and where, before he signed the confession, he was told that he did not have to sign it, and that it would be used against him in criminal proceedings, although when he hesitated in his answers the sheriff told him to tell the truth. State v. Westcott, 130 Iowa, 1, 104 N. W. 341.

And where the record does not show that a confession before a coroner was not voluntarily made, an objection that the defendant was in the custody of the officers under arrest at the time it was made, and while thus situated was compelled to give testimony against herself, is without merit. Green v. State, 124 Ga. 343, 52 S. E. 431.

And the statement of a defendant before the coroner's jury may be proved by parol evidence, notwithstanding the law requires the evidence before the coroner to be in writing, and it is claimed that such writing is the best evidence of such proceedings. Ibid.

But confessions or inculpatory statements obtained at the coroner's inquest from two persons arrested for the murder of a man found by the roadside are not admissible on their trial for murder, where, while in custody, they were taken to the inquest, and, without being informed that they were not compelled to testify, they were sworn and examined as witnesses, not on their own motion, but on that of the coroner or the jury. Adams v. State, 129 Ga. 248, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 468, 58 S. E. 822, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 158.

And statements made by defendants upon oath at the coroner's inquest, taken in writing and signed by them, they being at the time in the custody of the sheriff, having been taken from the jail handcuffed to the scene of the murder, where the inquest was held, are not admissible, since they are involuntary. State v. Brown, — Del. —, 80 Atl. 146.

And statements made by defendants at the coroner's inquest while in the custody of the sheriff are not admissible where they were examined before the coroner three times, and it appears that they were not advised of their rights each time they were examined, and it does not appear that the statements were made at the time they were advised of their rights as to testifying. Daniels v. State, 57 Fla. 1, 48 So. 747.

And the defendant in a murder trial cannot introduce his testimony taken at the examination before the coroner, either for the purpose of explaining the condition he was in when he gave it, or for the purpose of rebutting testimony of witnesses as to statements made by the defendant. People v. Heacock, 10 Cal. App. 450, 102 Pac. 543.

The provisions of a statute providing that the defendant shall be informed of his legal rights when brought before a magistrate do not apply to a preliminary investigation before a coroner, where the defendant had not been indicted or accused of the murder at the time. People v. Strollo, 191 N. Y. 42, 83 N. E. 573.

The right of the state to use this evidence turns upon the question as to whether it was voluntarily given by the plaintiff in error at the coroner's inquest. If it is not stamped with that essential requirement, then it was inadmissible and prejudicial, for it was one of the constitutional rights of the defendant that he should not be compelled to testify against himself. Section 11, art. 1, of the Constitution. It is the general rule that self-incriminating statements are not per se admissible over objection, when the evidence discloses that the defendant was in custody for the crime charged at the time of making such statements, unless shown to have been voluntarily made. Under this rule, there is no presumption that such statements are voluntarily made, but, on the contrary, the presumption is the other way, and upon the trial of an accused the burden is upon the state seeking to prove such statements, to show their voluntary character. It is impossible to show this where the accused is under arrest for the crime under investigation by the coroner's jury, and upon such investigation the incriminating statements were made under oath, without also showing that he had the benefit of counsel or was fully informed of his rights. He was not here told that he need not make a statement or might make a statement or be sworn as a witness, and that if he made a statement, whether under oath or not, it might be used against him, if subsequently tried upon the charge for which he was then under arrest, and that he could do as he pleased about the matter. It is true that the coroner testified that the accused voluntarily gave his evidence, but he also said, in answer to an inquiry propounded by the court as to what he said to the accused before the latter testified, and as to what the accused said: "I just merely asked him if he wanted to testify, and my recollection is he stated he did. I believe that was all that was said." Upon the inquiry of the coroner, the accused, being then under arrest for the crime being investigated, was brought before the coroner's jury, and, without being informed of his rights or warned that his evidence might thereafter be used against him, was sworn as a witness, and gave the evidence which was introduced upon the trial, over the objection that it was not shown to be of that voluntary nature to entitle it to admission.

The word "voluntary," as applied to evidence given by one at a coroner's inquest, who is not under arrest, but who knew he was under suspicion of having perpetrated the homicide under investigation, and who was subpoenaed as a witness and afterward charged and tried for such homicide, is learnedly discussed in Tuttle v. People, 33 Colo. 243, 70 L.R.A. 33, 79 Pac. 1035, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 513. In that case the court adopts the definition of what constitutes a voluntary statement used in this sense as given in State v. Clifford, 86 Iowa, 550, 41 Am. St. Rep. 518, 53 N.W. 299, as follows: "A confession or statement, to have been voluntarily made, must proceed 'from the spontaneous suggestion of the party's own mind, free from the influence of any extraneous, disturbing cause.'" The court proceeds to discuss the way of determining whether such extraneous, disturbing cause exists in a given case, which would exclude such statement from the inhibition of the Constitution, and lays down the rule that the surrounding circumstances must govern in each particular case. It was there held that the refusal of the witness to testify, or had he claimed his constitutional right not to testify, would probably, owing to the surrounding conditions, have subjected the defendant to immediate arrest upon the charge of murdering the deceased, and that evidence given under such conditions must be held to have been, not voluntary, but under the influence of a disturbing cause. In 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, 225, it is said with reference to this subject: "The manner of the examination is therefore particularly regarded; and if it appears that the prisoner had not been left wholly free, and did not consider himself to be so in what he was called upon to say, or did not feel himself at liberty wholly to decline any explanation or declaration whatever, the examination is not held to have been voluntary." In the case before us, there was no expression of a desire or willingness on the part of the prisoner to testify, until it was drawn from him by a question from the coroner. The suggestion was not therefore spontaneous and springing out of the prisoner's mind, but came from and through the inquiry of the coroner, and under conditions that a refusal to testify would constitute a powerful incentive in the minds of the officers of the law to continue his incarceration.

The defendant in a criminal case, under our statute, is a competent witness in his own behalf. It is optional with him whether he will avail himself of the right. Under the common law he could not testify as a witness, though his confessions or incriminating statements, if voluntarily made, could be used as evidence against him. The rules surrounding such confessions or admissions, that developed under the common law, have been extended and applied in cases where the common-law disability has been removed by statute, to confessions or criminating statements made under oath by the accused, who is then under arrest, though the courts differ as to whether a criminating statement so made at a coroner's inquest, irrespective of its voluntary character, is admissible at all. The great weight of authority and the trend of the later decisions is to the effect that if he has been advised of his rights and duly cautioned, and he then testifies voluntarily, his evidence is admissible against him. People v. McMahon, 15 N. Y. 384; People v. Mondon, 103 N. Y. 211, 57 Am. Rep. 709, 8 N. E. 496; People v. Chapleau, 121 N. Y. 266, 24 N. E. 469; People v. Wright, 136 N. Y. 625, 32 N. E. 629; Lyons v. People, 137 Ill. 602, 27 N. E. 677; Wood v. State, 22 Tex. App. 431, 3 S. W. 336; State v. Garvey, 25 La. Ann. 191; Steele v. State, 76 Miss. 387, 24 So. 910. The object and purpose of warning the accused under such circumstances is twofold: First, that it may be brought home to his mind that what he says under oath may be used against him, and, being so informed, that he may be free to act as he pleases; and, second, that a legal proceeding may not be converted into an inquisition. It is true that everyone is presumed to know the law, and to assume the consequences of his own acts, and upon this theory it was held by the supreme court of Missouri that the evidence of one not under arrest, who admitted the killing, and voluntarily appears and testifies before a coroner's jury, may be used against him in the absence of a showing that the coroner informed him of his rights. State v. Mullins, 101 Mo. 514, 14 S. W. 625. This and other Missouri cases (State v. Young, 119 Mo. 495, 24 S. W. 1038; State v. David, 131 Mo. 380, 33 S. W. 28) are distinguishable upon the facts from the case before us, for in each of those cases the defendant was not under arrest at the time he gave his testimony at the coroner's inquest.

In State v. Young, supra, notwithstanding that he was not under arrest, the defendant, being an ignorant German boy, who at the time of the inquest was under suspicion of having committed the homicide, and without the aid or advice of counsel, and not having been informed of his rights by the coroner, gave his evidence. It was held that such evidence could not be subsequently used against him on his trial for the homicide. In Schoeffler v. State, 3 Wis. 823, the statement under oath of the defendant, in the form of a deposition, was taken before the coroner at the inquest, and reduced to writing at a time when the defendant was not under arrest, but under suspicion in the neighborhood of having committed the homicide for which he was subsequently tried and convicted. He was neither cautioned nor informed of his right to decline to answer any question. His evidence was held admissible, because the defendant was not at the time charged with the commission of the crime. In Clough v. State, 7 Neb. 320, 339, the record did not show that the defendant was under oath at the time he made the statements before the coroner's jury, and they were held to have been properly admitted. In State v. Young, 60 N. C. (1 Winst. L.) 126, the prisoner was arrested as a witness, brought before the coroner's jury, and subjected to a rigid examination. The evidence was held to be not voluntarily given, and for that reason inadmissible against the prisoner upon a trial for the homicide. The last three cases are distinguishable upon the facts from the case here presented, where the defendant was in the custody and charged with the crime at the time he gave his evidence before the coroner's jury. While the decisions are not in harmony as to the rights of one who is not under arrest for the crime under investigation at the time he gives his evidence before a coroner's jury as a witness, they are practically unanimous as to one who is under arrest, and charged with the commission of the homicide at the time he is sworn and gives evidence before such jury. The person so under arrest and charged with the commission of the homicide, and who is without counsel, is entitled to be informed of his right to decline to be a witness or to answer any question, and properly cautioned as essential elements in determining the voluntary character of his statements then and there made. He is physically restrained of his liberty. In that sense he is not free to do and act as he pleases, and there is a very natural presumption that this restraint extends to and affects his mind to the extent that he would not freely say or admit those things which might thereafter be used as evidence against him. This presumption is not, however, conclusive, but may be overcome, if it be made to appear from the evidence that, after being cautioned and informed as to his rights, the prisoner voluntarily submits himself to examination under oath. Until he is so informed and cautioned, the law does not recognize his mind to be sufficiently free from the impending peril of his situation so as to entitle his statements to admission as evidence against him. Not alone upon the question that they may be untrue, but that the mind must also be left free to act with knowledge of the possible consequences.

We are of the opinion that the court committed prejudicial error in admitting, over the objection of the plaintiff in error, the evidence of his statements made under oath before the coroner's jury, at a time when he was under arrest and charged with the commission of the homicide, and in the absence of any caution or information as to his rights.

2. It is assigned as error that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. It is unnecessary to review the evidence upon this assignment, and it would be improper for us to do so, as the judgment will have to be reversed, and a new trial awarded for the error previously discussed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

JULIUS H. KRUSE, Plff. in Err.,
v.

RUDOLPH F. RABE.

(— N. J. —, 79 Atl. 316.)

Slander — advice to client — unnecessary publicity.

Advice by an attorney to a client as to the business integrity of a third person with whom such client has been dealing is privileged. But when such advice is given in a public or semipublic place, in a loud voice, and in hearing of divers persons, and is addressed not to the client, but to the third person, is slanderous, and without need of either publicity or loud utterance, express malice is a jury question.

ERROR to the Hudson County Circuit of the Supreme Court to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged slander. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel A. Besson, for plaintiff in error:

The words concerning plaintiff were slanderous per se, inasmuch as they imputed to him fraud or want of integrity in his business.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit for slander. At the trial there was a verdict directed for the defendant, and this writ of error is based upon an exception to that direction. The evidence was sufficient to justify the jury in finding that the plaintiff was a real estate broker doing business in Hoboken, and was employed under a written contract by a Mrs. Vette to negotiate the sale of certain real estate belonging to her, in which contract she agreed to pay him for his services a commission of 3 per cent; that the plaintiff succeeded in making a sale, and, at the time the transaction was to be closed, the plaintiff and Mrs. Vette, accompanied by defendant as her attorney, attended at the office of the attorney for the purchaser, when the title was closed and Mrs. Vette was paid by a check, and she and the plaintiff and defendant went to a neighboring bank, of which defendant was the president, to cash the check and pay plaintiff his commission; that plaintiff had procured from Mrs. Vette a sort of certificate that he had negotiated the sale and had earned his commission, and stating its amount; and that he handed this, when in the bank, to Mrs. Vette, who handed it to defendant, who "went inside" (probably inside the partition) for the cash to pay plaintiff, and either on coming out, or before going in, looked at the paper, noticed that the amount was 3 per cent, and, addressing plaintiff, said in a loud tone of voice and in the presence of the bank clerks close by and of several persons transacting business in the bank, "I never heard of any such outrageous commission. I know a hundred real estate people in this county, and none of them charge over 2½ per cent." That plaintiff said, "Mr. Rabe, will you allow me to explain?" And he said: "No, it is simply this: You have taken advantage of this woman." There was no allegation of special damage in the declaration. Besides a plea of general issue, there were pleas of justification and privilege.

The motion for a direction of a verdict for defendant was based upon the grounds: First, that the words were not slanderous per se; secondly, that this was a case of a lawyer attempting to protect his client, and that whatever he said was in the course of a conversation addressed to the client, in which the plaintiff took part; and, third, that, if the words were slanderous, they were justified. The court directed a verdict for defendant without stating what grounds such direction was based on.

We think this action of the trial court was erroneous.

The defendant maintains: First, that the language used was not slanderous per se, and that no special damage was proved. If it was slanderous per se, proof of special damage was, of course, unnecessary, and we have no hesitation in saying that we think it was slanderous per se; the plaintiff being a real estate broker, his success in business depended in large measure upon a reputation for dealing fairly with his customers, and for not availing himself of their ignorance as a means of charging excessive and exorbitant commissions for his services. The language implied, if it did not plainly express, that there was a standard rate of commission for such services, and that plaintiff, knowing that rate, but having ascertained that Mrs. Vette did not know it, had taken an unfair advantage of her by reason of her ignorance. This is without question such an imputation upon the plaintiff's integrity in his business relations as to be slanderous per se. Freisinger v. Moore, 65 N. J. L. 286, 47 Atl. 432; Odgers, Libel & Slander, § 65; 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 326 et seq.

Defendant's next point is that the language in question is true and therefore justified; but the testimony on this point was not so conclusive as to justify the judge in finding as court questions: First, that 2½ per cent was the standard rate and never exceeded; and, secondly, that plaintiff had taken advantage of his client by inducing her to contract for a higher rate.

Thirdly, it is claimed for the defendant that the occasion was privileged.

There can be no doubt that if Mrs. Vette had asked Mr. Rabe as her attorney, in his office, what he thought of the amount of plaintiff's charge, and he had expressed himself to her, in response to that inquiry, to the same effect as he expressed himself to plaintiff, with an honest belief in the truth of what he was saying, his language would then have been privileged. King v. Patterson, 49 N. J. L. 438, 60 Am. Rep. 622, 9 Atl. 705; Fahr v. Hayes, 50 N. J. L. 275, 278, 13 Atl. 261. But this is not what happened. The evidence seems to be somewhat in conflict as to whether Mrs. Vette made any inquiry of Mr. Rabe about the rate or amount of the commission; but assuming that she did, and that Rabe believed what he was saying, the question still remains whether, in view of the circumstances under which, and the manner in which, plaintiff claims he said it, the jury would not have been entitled to find the presence of express malice. Defendant's counsel point to Fahr v. Hayes, supra, as authority to the contrary; and that decision, though in the supreme court, and not binding on us, is entitled to great weight. It goes very far in the protection of such communications as privileged and in the negation of express malice, but is not dispositive of this case. In Fahr v. Hayes the plaintiff was asking for credit, and gave Hayes as a reference; this, in the opinion of the supreme court, justifying a confrontation of plaintiff by defendant for the purpose of convincing the prospective auditor of the danger of trusting the plaintiff. In the case at bar the plaintiff did not refer Mrs. Vette to Rabe, and had no part in consulting him. It is true that she was entitled to consult him and he was entitled to advise her with entire freedom so long as he did so honestly. But it cannot be said that a lawyer may shout to his client in a public place advice that a party with whom the client has been dealing has taken advantage of him, and claim immunity under the plea of privilege. The rule is thus stated in Odgers on Libel & Slander, at page 245: "If the words be spoken in the presence of strangers wholly uninterested in the matter, the communication loses all privilege. The defendant in all these cases must be careful that his words reach only those who are concerned to hear them. Words of admonition or of confidential advice should be given privately, not shouted across the street, or written on post cards, or published in the newspapers. [Citing cases.] It is true that the accidental presence of some third person will not alone take the case out of the privilege, if it was unavoidable, or happened in the usual course of business affairs. But if the defendant purposely contrives that a stranger should be present, . . . and who, in the natural course of things, would not be present, all privilege is lost. [Cases.] And whenever a defendant deliberately adopts a method of communication which gives unnecessary publicity to statements defamatory of the plaintiff, the jury will be apt to suspect malice."

It is this last particular in which the case at bar is distinguishable from Fahr v. Hayes. The publicity of the words in that case was fairly attributable to the plaintiff's own act, and was considered by the court to be justified in consequence, and that malice was not inferable therefrom. In the case at bar, as already noted, the defendant, if plaintiff's evidence is believed, took occasion to impugn his business integrity by addressing him, and not defendant's client, in a semipublic place, in a loud voice, and without any invitation on his part. We think this brings the case within the last clause of the text just quoted, and that the question of express malice should have been left to the jury.

The judgment is, accordingly, reversed, to the end that a venire de novo issue.

ARTHUR McFALL et al., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

CITY OF ST. LOUIS et al.

('232 Mo. 716, 135 S. W. 51.)

Municipal corporation — license — special privilege — hack stands.

A municipal ordinance is not invalid as unconstitutionally granting special privileges, which allows the municipality to grant special permission to licensed hack drivers who can procure the consent of the abutting property owners, to stand their vehicles in the street in front of such property, when the same privilege is not granted to those who do not obtain such consent.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the City of St. Louis to review a judgment in defendants' favor dismissing a bill filed to enjoin them from enforcing an alleged void ordinance regarding the use of public streets for standing places of vehicles. Affirmed.

Statement by Woodson, P. J.:

This is a bill in equity seeking to enjoin the defendants, the city of St. Louis, the mayor and chief of police thereof, from enforcing § 1747 of the Municipal Code of the city of St. Louis, approved April 3, 1900, regarding the use of public streets in said city for standing places of hacks, carriages, and such other vehicles. The petition was held bad on demurrer, and, plaintiffs declining to plead further, final judgment was entered dismissing the bill. In due time the plaintiffs sued out of this court a writ of error.

The petition in the cause, as shown by plaintiffs' abstract of the record, which was adjudged insufficient by the circuit court, was as follows (formal parts omitted):

"Plaintiffs state: That each of them are separately and individually owners and licensed operators of carriages and hacks, and that their present existing occupation, by means of which they earn their livelihood, and which they are now, and have

Note. — Power of municipality to establish exclusive hack stands.

As to the power of a municipal corporation to grant exclusive right or create a monopoly for the removal of substances inimical to the health, see note to Landberg v. Chicago, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 830.

As to the power of a municipal corporation to grant or lease spaces on street or sidewalk for business purposes, see note to Chapman v. Lincoln, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 400.

But few cases other than McFALL v. St. Louis have considered the question as to the power of a municipal corporation to establish in a public street exclusive hack stands. These cases are in harmony with the doctrine of McFALL v. St. Louis, and sustain the power of a municipality to establish an exclusive hack stand in a public street where the abutting property owner consents thereto.

Thus, in New York v. Reesing, 77 App. Div. 417, 79 N. Y. Supp. 331, a charter provision giving to the municipal legislature of the city the power to regulate the use of the streets and sidewalks by foot passengers, animals, or vehicles, and to provide for licensing and otherwise regulating the business of hackmen and cabmen, was held to confer upon the city authority to provide for public hack stands and special hack stands, the public hack stands to be for the use of all persons duly licensed, the special stands to be for the exclusive use of a designated person specially licensed in been at all times herein mentioned, pursuing, is that of duly licensed carriers, that is to say, public and common carriers, by means of their said carriages and hacks, of passengers and their baggage, for hire, through and over the public streets of the city of St. Louis, state of Missouri. That in pursuit of their said business they have in all respects complied with all the ordinances of said city, which govern the licensing of public and common carriers in said city. That there are many other parties and persons similarly engaged in the business aforesaid, who are similarly situated and affected with the plaintiffs by this proceeding, and who have complied with all the ordinances aforesaid. That the said parties and persons are too numerous to be joined as parties plaintiff, and hence plaintiffs bring this suit in their own name, and on their own behalf, as well as on behalf of all others similarly situated and affected as aforesaid. That at all times herein stated, and there is now, in full force and effect in said defendant city of St. Louis, a certain Municipal Code of said city, which said Code is known as ordinance No. 19,991, and which ordinance was duly enacted by the municipal assembly of said city on the 3d day of April, 1900. That, under the provisions of § 1708 of said Code, plaintiffs, while severally plying their present existing occupation as aforesaid, are severally required to pay, and at all times herein stated have paid, to defendant city annually, as a license fee, the sum of $5 for each two-horse carriage hack, and the sum of $3 for each one-horse hack. That, for the purpose of enabling said plaintiffs as a class to successfully and lawfully solicit and secure custom and traffic in their said licensed public calling, plaintiffs require public stands for their said vehicles in said city, where they may stand for service at points convenient to transient and resident public in said city. That all public carriers of the same class with plaintiffs as aforesaid, who have been duly licensed as aforesaid, when they each and severally desire to stand for public service at public hack stands provided by said city, are each and severally, as members of said single class, entitled to reasonable access to all public stands lawfully created by defendant city. That under the provisions of § 1746 of said Code, plaintiffs, and all other carriers of the same class of public carriers as aforesaid, after having been duly licensed as aforesaid, are required, when standing for public service on the public streets of said city, to stand with their said vehicles at a certain public stand provided by § 1746 or said Code, located on the north, west, and south sides of the courthouse of and in defendant city. That each and all of the said licensed public carriers of the said class to which plaintiffs belong, as aforesaid, have equal and reasonable access to said public hack stand provided for in said § 1746 of said ordinance and Code. That § 1747 of said ordinance and Code provides for a special class of hack that respect, who had secured the consent of the abutting owner to the establishment of the stand in the street abutting his property. The court said that the right and power of the city to pass such ordinances cannot be questioned.

And in Kissinger v. Hay, 52 Tex. Civ. App. 295, 113 S. W. 1005, the validity of an ordinance was sustained against an attack that it was discriminatory and partial in that it gave to a board of commissioners the discretion to say who shall and who shall not have a permit to use certain hack stands therein established upon the streets of the city. The court remarked that the principle invoked against the ordinance was contrary to well-recognized authority, and added that the right of granting a license to one, and denying it to another, is given in the interest of the public, and an ordinance was not void on that ground. It is to be noted that the question raised in this case was somewhat different from that raised in McFALL v. St. Louis and in New York v. Reesing, supra, since in those cases the ordinances involved were alleged to be discriminatory in that they permitted the establishment in a public street of exclusive hack stands, which in Kissinger v. Hay the ordinance was claimed to be discriminatory 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) and partial not because it permitted the establishment of exclusive hack stands, but because it authorized the commissioners to exercise their discretion in granting licenses for the use of public hack stands.

Both the case of McFALL v. St. Louis and Kissinger v. Hay involved another question not herein discussed, being the right of a person to question the invalidity of the ordinance when not directly injured thereby.

In McFALL v. St. Louis the person seeking to raise the question had not obtained the consent of the abutting owner, which was a condition precedent, under the ordinance in question, to the right to a license to establish and use an exclusive hack stand in a public street; and in Kissinger v. Hay it did not appear that the persons complaining had been refused a license; in both cases it was held under these circumstances that the persons complaining were not in a position to question the validity of the ordinances on the ground that they were discriminatory as to them.

For a discussion of the general question as to who may question the validity of an ordinance or statute on the ground that it is discriminatory, see note to Pugh v. Pugh, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 954. A. G. S.

stands upon the public streets of said city, whereby only an uncertain and undetermined number of said licensed public carriers of the class to which plaintiffs belong, as aforesaid, are permitted to stand for public service, upon condition that such carriers have first secured the permission of a certain class of occupants of property of said city, when said permission is supplemented by the written approval of the mayor of said city; said § 1747 being in words and figures as follows: 'Sec. 1747. Stands in Front of Private Premises—How Regulated.—Occupants of premises in front of which it is desired to stand for employment cabs, cabriolets, carriages, coupés, or one-horse vehicles, may give permission in writing to the owner or driver so to do, which permission shall not be effective until it is approved by the mayor, and it may be revoked by the mayor at any time, whereupon all rights under it shall at once cease and be ended.'

"Plaintiffs state they have at no time, either jointly or severally, participated in any attempt to secure the establishment or maintenance of a public or private hack stand under the provisions of said § 1747 of said ordinance, and that plaintiffs have at no time attempted to stand for public service with their several vehicles upon the public streets of said city at or upon any vehicle stand provided for by said § 1747. Plaintiff's charge and aver that said § 1747 of said Code, entitled, 'Stands in Front of Private Premises—How Regulated,' in fact, authorizes the condemnation of the public streets to private uses; (2) that the said § 1747 confers upon occupants of premises adjoining public streets certain rights and privileges and control over public streets which are denied to others; (3) that said § 1747 discriminates between licensed carriers of the same class; (4) that said § 1747 permits that to be done by a special license, which if done by others of the same class not having a special license, constitutes a penal offense, under § 1747 of said Code; (5) that said § 1747 fosters a monopoly in the passenger traffic in said city; (6) that defendant city of St. Louis is without power, under the Constitution and laws of the state of Missouri, to authorize by ordinance the appropriation to private use of any street or any part of any public street or streets of said city, and is without power to discriminate in the distribution of licenses and favors between subjects of the same class to which plaintiffs belong as aforesaid. Wherefore plaintiffs charge that said § 1747 of said ordinance is void and of no effect.

of St. Louis, over the objections and remonstrances of plaintiffs, has at all times herein stated and now does maintain certain hack and carriage stands upon the public streets and highways of said city and state for the exclusive use and benefit of the special licensees hereinafter mentioned, and who are named as defendants herein, and that the mayor of the city of St. Louis, who is defendant Rolla Wells, has unlawfully issued over his official signature, to the certain licensed public carriers of the same class with plaintiffs as aforesaid, a written permission to stand with their said vehicles for public service, and to occupy at all times, both by day and by night, with their said vehicles, horses, and drivers, as hack stands, and at points from which said licenses are permitted under the terms of said § 1747 to solicit, receive, control, and monopolize public passenger traffic, many large areas of the public streets of the said city; and defendant Rolla Wells as aforesaid, and defendant Matthew Kiely as aforesaid, together assist defendant city in the unlawful maintenance of said carriage and hack stands. And plaintiffs further aver that said carriage and hack stands are and constitute public nuisances, as hereinafter set forth.

"Plaintiffs state that said hack stands, the dates of said permits, the names of said licensees, and the areas of said private and unlawful stands, are respectively as follows to wit: Permit 1. Dated January 13, 1903. Name of licensee, defendant Wand Livery & Undertaking Company. Location of stand, adjoining northeast corner of Broadway and Elm street. Area of said street so occupied, about 100 square feet." (Then follow some twelve or fifteen others, differing only in dates, names of licensees, and locations of stands.)

"Plaintiffs state and charge, upon information and belief, that said licensees, who are defendants herein, to wit, Wand Livery & Undertaking Company, Barney McGilligan, Phillip Deis, Missouri District Telegraph Company, and the Public Hack & Drivers' Association, are, except defendants Phillip Deis and Barney McGilligan, corporations under the laws of the state of Missouri; that the said defendants, Phillip Deis and Barney McGilligan, are individuals, and are acting as such. Plaintiffs state and charge that all of these aforesaid licensees are now, and by virtue of their said permits or licenses have at all times herein stated, unlawfully obstructed and are obstructing and occupying with their said passenger vehicles, horses, and drivers, both by day and by night, and using for their special use, and to the permanent hindrance and exclusion of plaintiffs as public carriers, said several areas of said public streets. And plaintiffs state that by virtue of the premises plaintiffs are denied the right to participate upon fair terms in the competition of passenger traffic in the territory controlled as aforesaid by the licensees of said carriage and hack stands, in the business which naturally flows from and to, and is naturally tributary to, the said locations. And plaintiffs state that said territory from which they are severally so excluded provides the most profitable field for the licensed public carriers of plaintiffs' said class, amounting in value annually in a sum of many thousand dollars. And plaintiffs state that by reason of the unlawful acts committed by the defendant, city of St. Louis and its municipal assembly, Matthew Kiely and defendant Rolla Wells, the defendant city's chief of police and mayor, respectively, plaintiffs have suffered and now suffer a legal wrong to their present existing occupation, and plaintiffs, while this proceeding is pending, are at all times injured by said unlawful acts, in that they are annoyed, delayed, and prevented from traveling over said portions of said streets, and are denied the use thereof, and their earning power and capacity has been greatly impaired and is now being greatly impaired, and they have suffered and are now suffering great loss in their incomes, and the actual damages so sustained, and now being sustained, aggregates a large sum, but is not susceptible of computation and apportionment between or by plaintiffs aforesaid, and is therefore irreparable.

"To the end therefore that plaintiffs may have that relief which they can obtain in a court of equity, and that the city of St. Louis, Rolla Wells, Matthew Kiely, and all the licensees hereinbefore mentioned, who are made defendants herein, may be required to answer plaintiff's bill of petition, but not under oath, answer under oath being hereby expressly waived, the plaintiffs pray that said section of said Code, to wit, § 1747, be declared illegal, null, and void, and that a perpetual injunction may be decreed by this honorable court, directed to the city of St. Louis, Rolla Wells, mayor of said city, and to his successors in said office, and to Matthew Kiely, the chief of police of said city, and to his successors in said office, perpetually restraining them from establishing and maintaining any private carriage and hack or vehicles stands on any portion of the public streets of said city, and perpetually restraining them and each of them from permitting any owner or driver of carriages or other vehicles to occupy said areas of said streets as private vehicle stands as aforesaid, unless the same be lawfully constituted public hack stands, free of access to all licensed carriage drivers and owners alike, and upon the same terms, and that plaintiffs may have such other orders, judgments, and reliefs as shall seem agreeable to equity and meet in the premises. And plaintiffs pray that summons be directed to the said city of St. Louis, Rolla Wells, mayor of said city, and Matthew Kiely, chief of police of said city, and defendants Wand Livery & Undertaking Company, Phillip Deis, Barney McGilligan, Missouri District Telegraph Company, and the Public Hack & Drivers' Association, commanding them and each of them, at a certain time and under a certain penalty, to be and appear before this honorable court, and then and there a full, true, and direct, and perfect answer make to all and singular the premises, and further to stand to, perform, and abide by such further orders, directions, and decree therein as to your Honor shall seem meet."

As previously stated, to this petition a demurrer was filed and sustained. Afterwards, at the December term, 1907, of said court, the plaintiffs dismissed the cause against all the defendants except the city of St. Louis, Rolla Wells, mayor, and Matthew Kiely, chief of police. The demurrer of the city was as follows: "Comes now the defendant, the city of St. Louis, and demurs to the amended petition of the plaintiffs herein, on the following grounds, to wit: (1) Because the said petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute any cause of action as against this defendant. (2) Because it does not contain or state any matter of equity wherein the court could base any decree or give to the plaintiffs any relief as against this defendant. Wherefore this defendant prays to be hence dismissed with its costs." The demurrers filed by the other defendants were similar in import to the one filed by the city.

Mr. Charles Summers for plaintiffs in error.

Woodson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The plaintiffs' contention is that § 1747 of ordinance 19,991 is void for the reason that it confers upon the mayor of the city of St. Louis, when based upon the written consent of certain property owners, the right to grant a special license to a certain class of licensed carriers, and refuses such license to others of the same class, who do not possess such written consent; that the defendants, while pretending to act under the provisions of said ordinance, before set out, have, by means of said special licenses, established and now maintain a large number of private hack stands upon the public streets of the city, and thereby control the major portion of the passenger carrying business of said city, by reason of the fact that said stands are easy of access to the densely populated districts and business centers of said city, thereby furnishing said special licensees the exclusive occupancy and right to solicit traffic from said special stands; and that plaintiffs, and many others of the same class holding a general license, are denied the equal right and privilege of participating in and enjoying the rights conferred by said special licenses issued under and in pursuance to said § 1747.

In support of this contention, we are cited to the following cases: Schopp v. St. Louis, 117 Mo. 131, 20 L.R.A. 783, 22 S. W. 898; Lockwood v. Wabash R. Co. 122 Mo. 89, loc. cit. 100, 24 L.R.A. 516, 43 Am. St. Rep. 547, 26 S. W. 698; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 660. In the first case cited, the plaintiffs instituted proceedings for the purpose of enjoining the city of St. Louis from maintaining and leasing stands in Third and Broadway streets, in front of their property, in pursuance to an ordinance duly enacted, setting apart that portion of said streets lying between Christy avenue and Howard street as a market "for farmers' and other wagons bringing produce to the market for sale." The evidence in that case showed that the stalls or stands in question were permanent in character, obstructed the street in front of plaintiffs' property, and materially interfered with and obstructed ingress and egress to and from their property, to their great damage. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In the case of Lockwood v. Wabash R. Co., the plaintiff sought to enjoin the defendant from laying and maintaining tracks and operating a steam railroad in front of his property on Collins street, being only 24 feet in width from curb to curb, and which already contained one track. In that case the evidence showed, and this court held, that the laying, maintaining, and operating of the second track in front of plaintiff's property upon said street, amounted practically to a total obstruction to the ingress and egress to and from his property, and "to a practical condemnation of this portion of Collins street to the private and almost exclusive use of the defendant." In each of those cases this court held, and properly so, that the erection and maintenance of the stalls in the one case and the railroad track in the other constituted both a public and a private nuisance in the streets of said city, and that because of the injury caused thereby to the plaintiffs' property injunction would lie. Judge Dillon, in his excellent work on Municipal Corporations, 4th ed. § 660, announces the same rule. However, those authorities are not in point here. The stands here in question are not permanent in character, but are simply spaces or areas in the streets, embraced by imaginary lines, upon which hacks, carriages, and similar vehicles stand while not in actual service. The licensees of such stands cannot occupy and use them to the exclusion of the plaintiffs or the public at large. The plaintiffs and all others, at will, may drive over said areas, and stand their horses and vehicles thereon a sufficient length of time to enable them to load and unload their freight and passengers, regardless of the special licenses.

If any one of the plaintiffs should at any time have a passenger to deliver or to receive at any of the places described in the petition, he would have, through the passenger, a right of access to that place. Donovan v. Pennsylvania Co. 61 L.R.A. 140, 144, 57 C. C. A. 362, 120 Fed. 215. The only difference that I can see between the general and the special license mentioned is: The latter can never be issued except where written consent is first obtained from the abutting property owners, agreeing that the space in front of their property may be used for such stands. This consent, of course, is required to be obtained in order that ingress and egress to and from their property may not be obstructed or interfered with, and thereby damage their property, without their consent. Clearly, it was the design of the city council, in requiring the consent of the property owners to be obtained, to avoid the effect of the rulings announced by this court in the cases of Schopp v. St. Louis, 117 Mo. 131, 20 L.R.A. 783, 22 S. W. 898, and Lockwood v. Wabash R. Co. 122 Mo. 89, loc. cit. 100, 24 L.R.A. 516, 43 Am. St. Rep. 547, 26 S. W. 698. Without that consent, according to the authorities cited, the city would have no power or authority to authorize hack and carriage drivers to stand their horses and vehicles upon the streets in front of abutting private properties, and thereby obstruct the ingress and egress. For this reason, the general license mentioned, if attempted to authorize or justify the maintenance of such hack stands in front of private property, would be held invalid for violating that provision of the Constitution which prohibits private property from being taken or damaged without just compensation; but no such objection could be interposed against the general ordinance mentioned, for the reason that by its terms it is restricted in its operation to stands located in streets in front of property owned by the city, and not by private parties.

Under this view of the law, even though this court should grant the relief prayed for, it would lead to nothing, for plaintiffs could not use any of the places designated in the special licenses any more than they can now. They would still be required to obtain the consent of the owners of the abutting property, which they state they have never attempted to do. Schopp v. St. Louis, supra.

By reading the petition it will be observed that the plaintiffs do not ask to have the so-called private hack stands, described therein, abolished because they interfere with public traffic on the streets of the city; but, upon the contrary, they ask that the defendants be enjoined from permitting hackmen to occupy the described areas as private stands, unless the same be lawfully constituted public hack stands, free of access to all licensed hack and carriage drivers alike, and upon the same terms. That cannot be lawfully done, for the reason that public stands can only be established and maintained by the city in front of property belonging to the city; and to grant the injunction under those circumstances would have only the effect of putting plaintiffs' rivals out of business, and that too without opening up the private stands to themselves, for the obvious reason that if the city should devote parts of the streets in front of private property to public hack stands, the property owners would immediately object thereto, and proceed to have them declared private nuisances, as was done in the cases previously cited. The private stands in question are not public nuisances, for the reason that they are expressly authorized by said § 1747, and do not interfere with travel upon public streets; nor are they private nuisances, for the reason that the abutting property owners have agreed in writing to their maintenance.

In Veneman v. Jones, 118 Ind. 41, 10 Am. St. Rep. 100, 20 N. E. 644, where a kindred question was presented, the supreme court of Indiana held valid an ordinance authorizing the police officers to prescribe the places where hacks and other vehicles should stand at a railway station. That case could have been maintained, and doubtless was maintained, upon the theory that railway depots are quasi public grounds, and, consequently, the streets in front thereof were subject to reasonable police regulations.

And in Pennsylvania Co. v. Chicago, 181 Ill. 299, 53 L.R.A. 223, 54 N. E. 825, the plaintiff, the abutting property owner, and not the cabman, sought to enjoin the maintenance of a hack stand created by an ordinance in front of its depot. The supreme court of Illinois held the ordinance valid on the ground that the railroad was a quasi public corporation, and its depot buildings were therefore public in character, and that the company could not refuse to permit the use of the street as authorized by ordinance for the benefit of the public.

Branahan v. Cincinnati Hotel Co. 39 Ohio St. 333, 48 Am. Rep. 457: Where the use and enjoyment of private property is interfered with by a cab stand and access rendered impossible, an ordinance granting the privilege of a cab stand is without authority of law, and constitutes no justification for obstructing the right of access to the street.

Lippincott v. Lasher, 44 N. J. Eq. 120, 14 Atl. 103: Where such use of the street results in foul odors, it will be enjoined at the suit of the owner of the property affected.

McCaffrey v. Smith, 41 Hun, 117: No use can be made of a highway other than to pass and repass, without the consent of the owner of the fee.

See also the Schopp Case, 117 Mo. 131, 20 L.R.A. 783, 22 S. W. 898.

In People ex rel. Thompson v. Brookfield, 6 App. Div. 398, 39 N. Y. Supp. 673, a licensed cabman sought by mandamus to compel the commissioner of public works to remove, or cause to be removed, all hackmen and others using or claiming to use as a hack stand portions of certain streets adjoining the Hotel Waldorf and the Holland House in New York city, and to remove all vehicles occupying said streets, on the ground they constituted obstructions and nuisances. The writ was refused, and the court said: "While the temporary occupation of a street is for certain purposes permitted, the law requires that the commissioner of public works shall not allow permanent obstructions amounting to a nuisance to be maintained in any public street, whether such occupancy is sought to be justified with or without a permit. But, relative to the question of temporary or permanent occupancy, we agree with the respondents that a certain use of the streets by carriages, either in front of private residences or in front of hotels, clubs, theaters, churches, and similar buildings, is a legitimate use of the streets as such, and, when they are occupied temporarily and reasonably by licensed cabmen or by private carriages, not only should the commissioner of public works not be compelled to interfere, but he has no legal right or power to do so, unless such occupancy becomes so clearly and unmistakably annoying and continuous as to constitute an occupation which the law would regard as a nuisance." 6 App. Div. loc. cit. 403. And on page 402 of 6 App. Div., the opinion uses this language: "We do not think it will be contended even by the relator that a liveryman who has the permission of the proprietors of the hotels to supply the calls of guests is not entitled to some reasonable use of the streets adjoining the hotels."

We are therefore of the opinion that said § 1747 of the ordinance is valid, and not subject to the criticisms lodged against it, and for that reason the demurrers to the petition were properly sustained.

There are several other minor questions presented and discussed by counsel for the plaintiffs in error; but the view we have taken of the case renders it unnecessary to pass upon any of them.

Finding no error in the record, we are of the opinion that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

TEXAS CRIMINAL COURT OF APPEALS.

JIM GROSS, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

(— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 135 S. W. 373.)

Evidence — incest — subsequent conduct.

1. Upon trial of a prosecution for incest in which the state relies upon a single act, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

evidence is not admissible of conduct at subsequent times tending to show a criminal intent.

Same — contradictory statements — impeachment.

2. Where, upon a trial for incest, the prosecuting witness denies a statement which has been introduced in evidence, to the effect that she had had illicit relations with other relatives, accused may introduce evidence to contradict her, for the purpose of showing the unreliability of her testimony and that her claim was fabricated.

Same — contradiction — immaterial matter.

3. The state, having introduced the testimony of the prosecuting witness on a trial for incest, which was defended on the theory that the charge was made to get even with defendant for accusing her of wrongdoing with a suitor, that she was never allowed to be in the company of men unchaperoned, cannot object to the introduction of evidence that she had been seen alone with such person, on the ground that it was an immaterial matter.

Admissions — character — impeachment.

4. Upon trial of a prosecution for incest which is defended on the theory that it was an attempt by the prosecuting witness to get even with defendant for accusing her of illicit relations with a suitor, where she had denied admitting such relations, evidence is admissible of such admission, for the purpose of impeaching her, and showing her relations to such person, and her character generally.

Same — statement in party's absence.

5. Upon trial of a man for incest who left home after the charge was made, evidence is not admissible of a conversation between his wife and her brother, in his absence, in which, because of an assumed separation, she was advised to return to her father.

Same — letter from husband to wife — knowledge by stranger — privilege.

6. One who has read a letter from a man to his wife, which was casually picked up where the wife had laid it, cannot testify to its contents in a criminal prosecution against the husband, where the statute forbids either spouse to testify in a criminal prosecution to communications from the other.

Note. — Is privileged character of written or oral communication lost when a third person has power of disclosure.

It is assumed for the purposes of this note that the subject-matter of the communications and the parties thereto were such as to render them privileged except for the possible effect of the fact that, if oral, they were overheard, or, if written, had fallen into the custody and control of a third person.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Ellis County convicting him of incest. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Will P. Hancock for appellant.

Mr. John A. Mobley for the State.

Davidson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was charged with and convicted of incest with his daughter Maud.

The evidence shows that appellant had been a resident of Ellis county something like thirty years, residing on a farm near Maypearl in that county. His daughter Maud was a girl about fifteen years of age, weighed about 200 pounds. The family consisted of appellant, his wife, three daughters, and two boys; Maud being the oldest child. Appellant and his wife were members of the church in that community, and the family up to this transaction seemed to have been highly respected. The relations between appellant and his wife until the disagreement arose over the alleged conduct of the prosecutrix and appellant were pleasant. During the year 1908 a young man by the name of Emory Burns, about twenty-eight years of age, began working for appellant as a farm hand, and lived in the house with the family. Shortly after his appearance upon the scene he and prosecutrix became sweethearts and wanted to marry, to which appellant interposed objection. The mother decided with the girl. It seems that Burns was a young man with-

The note does not include the cases where the party for whose protection the privilege exists voluntarily makes disclosure to a third person, nor those cases where a conversation between two persons takes place in the presence of a third, whose presence is known to the conversers. It also excludes cases where writings are claimed to be privileged simply as the private property of the owner, taken from him unlawfully under a search warrant.

Cases are also excluded in relation to the clerks of attorneys, of which examples are Taylor v. Foster, 2 Car. & P. 195, 31 Revised Rep. 659; Bowman v. Norton, 5 Car. & P. 177; Rex v. Upper Boddington, 8 Dowl. & R. 726; Sibley v. Waffle, 16 N. Y. 180. Also those in relation to interpreters between attorney and client (see Du Barre v. Livette, Peake, N. P. Cas. 78, 3 Revised Rep. 655).

The doctrine which some of the cases apply to the question under annotation, that the illegality of the methods used in obtaining evidence does not affect its admissibility, is illustrated in another phase by the notes to State v. Fuller, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 762, and People v. Campbell, — L. R.A. (N.S.) —, as to admissibility against defendant of articles taken from him, and the note to State v. Turner, 32 L.R.A. (N. S.) 772, as to evidence of acts performed by defendant in a criminal case under compulsion.

For cases on communications between attorney and client affecting their respective rights or interests, as privileged communications, see the note to Strickland v. Capital City Mills, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 426.

It will be seen that in the case of privileged writings, the authorities are divided in opinion as to whether they are admissible in evidence when produced by a third party. But that, in case of oral communications overheard accidentally or by design, the courts are agreed that they are admissible. The courts approach the matter of privileged communications as an exception to general rules. In Hatton v. Roberson, 14 Pick. 416, 25 Am. Dec. 415. Show Ch. J., said: "The privilege of exemption 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

from testifying to facts actually known to the witness is in contravention to the general rules of law; it is therefore to be watched with some strictness, and is not to be extended beyond the limits of that principle of policy upon which it is allowed."

Such communications are often referred to as preventing the full disclosure of the truth.

In Foster v. Hall, 12 Pick. 89, 22 Am. Dec. 400, Shaw, Ch. J., referred to the rule of privileged communications to an attorney as having a tendency to prevent the full disclosure of the truth, and so ought to be construed strictly. And this statement is made in many of the cases.

"It is the business of the party claiming the benefit of exemption from the general rule that compels all to disclose the truth, to show that the particular instance is privileged." Beeson v. Beeson, 9 Pa. 279.

The courts do not refer to the fact that in nearly all cases where oral confidential communications are sought to be put in evidence, they are prima facie inadmissible as hearsay, and only permitted at all as an exception to the general rule of hearsay, on the ground that they are declarations against interest or confessions.

So far as the view is concerned that the doctrine of privileged oral communications tends "to prevent the full disclosure of the truth," it may be well to refer to Rex v. Simons, 6 Car. & P. 540, where a witness was allowed to state what he overheard the prisoner say to his wife, as the prisoner was leaving the magistrate's room after his committal. Another witness was called to confirm this evidence, but his statement of what was said was decidedly different. Alderson, B., said: "One of these expressions is widely different from the other. It shows how little reliance ought to be placed on such evidence."

It is reasonable enough that a man should not be permitted to claim that a remark made loudly in a public street is privileged, but the doctrine of eavesdroppers seems to stand on the same ground with that of the thieves of private papers. The doctrine out means or ability to support a wife. The opposition of appellant to this marriage brought about trouble between appellant and his wife which finally resulted in this prosecution. Appellant told his wife of improper relations he had discovered between Burns and his daughter Maud, and he charged the girl with this course of conduct with Burns in the presence of and to his wife. Maud denounced this as "a lie," and said she "would get even with" appellant. Subsequently appellant was informed by his wife that Maud had told her that he, appellant, had had intercourse with her, the prosecutrix; thereupon appellant called her in and asked her "what in the name of God" she meant by charging him with such an offense. She made no reply, and appellant further stated, "I see now what you meant when you said you would get even with me," and further stated, "You know it is not so, for you have charged me with the same thing that you charged against your three uncles, John, Richard, and Earl Coleman,—with having intercourse with you." A reconciliation of the trouble in the family was partially brought about. Prosecutrix and Burns were married at home and began living near appellant and his family. Neighbors who were related to appellant's wife began interfering in their affairs. Appellant left home and was away for a short time and returned. He again went away, and during his absence the bill of indictment was found. There was quite a mass of testimony ad-that the law cares not where the evidence comes from does not seem to bear satisfactory results in actual practice.

Writings—theory of lost privilege.

The following cases have held that the privilege has been lost as to written communications, because they were in the custody and control of a third person who was not the representative or agent of either of the parties to the communication. In view of the distinction suggested in some of the cases between a case where the writing came into the custody of a third person through the consent or connivance of a party in whose hands it was privileged, and one where it was obtained surreptitiously, the circumstances bearing on that point are indicated in parenthesis following the citation.

Lloyd v. Pennie, 50 Fed. 4 (letters from husband to wife, in possession of latter's administrator, both spouses being dead); Hammons v. State, 73 Ark. 495, 68 L.R.A. 234, 108 Am. St. Rep. 66, 84 S. App. 192, 107 Pac. 134 (letter written by husband to his wife, and without being sealed or inclosed in envelop, given by him to an officer to deliver to the wife, who, after reading it, at the officer's request, returned it to him); State v. Hoyt, 47 Conn. 518, 36 Am. Rep. 89 (letters written by defendant to his wife; it does not appear how they were obtained, or whether they were ever in the wife's possession); State v. State, 6 Neb. 545 (contents of letter from husband to wife stated by witness who still had it; whether given to him by wife does not appear); People v. Hayes, 140 N. Y. 484, 23 L.R.A. 830, 37 Am. St. Rep. 572, 35 N. E. 951 (letters from wife to husband, given by him to his mistress, received as evidence against him); Lowther v. State, 2 Ohio C. D. 685, 4 Ohio C. C. 522 (letters addressed by husband to wife, there being no evidence that she received them or how the producer got them); Whalen v. State, 12 Ohio C. C. 584, 5 Ohio C. D. 488 (letters of an accused bigamist to his alleged first wife, delivered voluntarily by her to an officer); Connella v. Territory, 16 Okla. 365, 86 Pac. 72 (letter written by defendant to his wife, never in her possession, but passed into possession of sheriff); State v. Sysinger, — S. D. —, 125 N. W. 879 (letters written by defendant to his wife, and by her delivered to prosecuting officers); State v. Mathers, 64 Vt. 101, 15 L.R.A. 268, 33 Am. St. Rep. 921, 23 Atl. 590 (letter intended for defendant's wife, intrusted to a daughter for delivery, from whom it was surreptitiously taken by another daughter); State v. Nelson, 39 Wash. 221, 81 Pac. 721 (letters from wife to husband which the report suggests were given by him to the state, which offered them in impeachment of the writer's testimony).

It will be seen that in some of the foregoing cases the letters were voluntarily delivered to a third person by the spouse to whom they were written; in others, that their history does not appear; and in still others, that they were not produced by the voluntary act of the spouse to whom they were addressed. In the last class of cases, those from Michigan lay stress on the fact that the letter was not voluntarily given to a third party by the spouse to whom it was addressed. Thus, in O'Toole v. Ohio German F. Ins. Co. supra, the court said: "The privilege is in derogation of the general rule that all persons may be compelled to testify concerning facts inquired about mitted, most of it over objection of appellant, showing the course of conduct of appellant towards his daughter as detailed by her both before and after the alleged act of intercourse, which was relied upon by the state as having occurred on the 15th of December, 1908. Some of these acts and matters occurred subsequently to that date. This is, we think, a sufficient statement of the case.

1. We deem it unnecessary to discuss all the bills of exceptions. Bill No. 7 recites the following question asked by the county attorney: "I will ask you to state whether or not your father ever made or had your mother to leave the room, and call you and made you come over and get in bed with him?" She answered in the affirmative, in courts of justice. It should be made effective, but ought not to be extended by the courts to cases where there has been no injury to the relation of the parties by the betrayal of the confidence reposed. And so it has been held, and, we think, correctly, that where the communication, oral or written, has, without collusion or voluntary disclosure, escaped the custody and control of the parties communicating, or the custody or control of their agents or representatives, it is not privileged." (Quoted in part in People v. Dunnigan, supra.)

The other cases of this class do not seem to attach importance to the involuntary feature. Thus, in Connella v. Territory, supra, where the letter was not delivered, the court seems to rest its decision on the general rule of State v. Buffington; and in State v. Mathers, supra, also a case of an undelivered letter, the court asserts the rule that "when papers are offered in evidence, the court can take no notice of how they were obtained, whether legally or illegally, properly or improperly; nor will it form a collateral issue to try that question."

So, in Lloyd v. Pennie, supra, which was an action against the administrators of both husband and wife, to set aside a certain agreement, as made in fraud of his creditors, the decision rests on the principle that letters are admissible when in the hands of a third person (the court distinguishing Bowman v. Patrick, 32 Fed. 368, infra).

In Hammons v. State, supra, where the letter had never been delivered, the court held it admissible (in distinction from Ward v. State, infra, where a letter forcibly taken from the wife was excluded), and said: "The object of the rule is to prevent husband or wife from impairing the sacredness of confidential communications between themselves, and hence they are rendered incompetent as witnesses to such transactions and letters, and other communications between them are shielded by the privilege of the marital relation, so long as such letters are in the possession or con-and that this happened in January, 1909, subsequent to the alleged act of intercourse on the 15th of the previous December. The substance of the qualification, as we understand, to the bill, is that this matter was permitted to be shown, but the county attorney was not permitted to show the act of intercourse. This testimony was inadmissible. The authorities, we think, in this state, are all clear that acts of this kind in cases of this character, occurring after the act of intercourse relied upon for conviction, are inadmissible. And it is not changed by the fact that the witness was not permitted to testify to the actual intercourse. That fact was excluded. There are other bills of exception practically to the same effect. The acts between the par-trol of either, and their production cannot be compelled when held by husband or wife, or their agents or representatives. This is the extreme limit that public policy and the weight of authority extends the privilege. The letter in question was not taken from the custody of the wife, neither her person or privilege was violated by its production, and it was admissible evidence."

Of the cases where the history of the writing was not given, those in Connecticut and Nebraska seem also to pay little attention to the involuntary feature. Thus, in State v. Hoyt, 47 Conn. 518, 36 Am. Rep. 89, the court said: "The question was not whether the husband or wife could have been compelled to produce this evidence, but whether, when the letters fell into the hands of a third person, the sacred shield of privilege went with them. We think not. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 254a. The fact that the communications in this case were written places them on no higher ground than if they were merely oral." The court cites authorities as to overheard conversations, etc., but gives no other reason for its decision.

In Geiger v. State, supra, where a witness was permitted to state that after the arrest of the prisoner he "got from his house" a letter from the prisoner to his wife, which he still had, and although not producing it, he was allowed to state part of its contents, the court said: "The Criminal Code provides that neither husband nor wife shall be competent to testify concerning any communication made by one to the other during marriage. Where, however, papers or letters are offered in evidence on the trial of a cause, which are pertinent to the issue, they should be admitted, and the court will not take notice how they are obtained, nor will it form a collateral issue to determine that question. . . . But there is no admission of the plaintiff contained in the letter given in evidence, tending to show that he was guilty of the offense charged."

In Lowther v. State, a prosecution against a husband for adultery with his daughter, letters written by the accused ties occurring after that relied upon cannot be admitted in evidence when objection is urged. Smith v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 137, 100 Am. St. Rep. 849, 68 S. W. 995; Ball v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 489, 72 S. W. 384; Barnett v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 592, 100 Am. St. Rep. 873, 73 S. W. 399, overruling Hamilton v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 372, 37 S. W. 431; Manning v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 302, 96 Am. St. Rep. 873, 65 S. W. 920; and Cooksey v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 58 S. W. 103; Henard v. State, 46 Tex. Crim. Rep. 90, 79 S. W. 810; Hackney v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 74 S. W. 554; Wiggins v. State, 47 Tex. Crim. Rep. 538, 84 S. W. 821; Stripling v. State, 47 Tex. Crim. Rep. 117, 80 S. W. 376; Roberts v. State, 51

Tex. Crim. Rep. 27, 100 S. W. 150; Smith v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 80, 105 S. W. 501; Pridemore v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 858, 129 S. W. 1112; Skidmore v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 497, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 466, 123 S. W. 1129. We deem it unnecessary to pursue this thought further or review each separate exception reserved. Upon another trial this character of evidence will not be permitted to go to the jury.

2. There was a statement of the prosecutrix that her three uncles had been having intercourse with her introduced in evidence, and became interwoven with the trial of the case. While prosecutrix was upon the stand, she denied making these statements. Having denied this, witnesses were placed while in jail, and addressed to his wife, found in the possession of a third person, who produced them in court, were admitted in evidence, there being nothing to show but that the producer properly received them, and no evidence that the wife ever had them. The court said: "The only portion of the letters that could at all prejudice the defendant was addressed to his daughter Imo. We think these letters were properly admitted."

Perhaps the most cited case where the privilege was held to be lost is State v. Buffington, 20 Kan. 599, 27 Am. Rep. 193, where the court said: "It is certainly true that a communication between husband and wife is a privileged communication. But it is privileged only while it remains within their custody and control, or while it remains within the custody and control of their agents or representatives, and just so far as it remains within the custody and control of themselves or their agents or representatives."

In People v. Swaile, 12 Cal. App. 192, 107 Pac. 134, the court said: "If it be conceded that the letter was illegally obtained, this would not operate to exclude it from evidence on the ground that it was a privileged communication, or that the evidence was self-criminating. Though papers and other subjects of evidence may have been illegally taken from the possession of the party against whom they are offered, or otherwise unlawfully obtained, this is no valid objection to their admissibility if they are pertinent to the issue. Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 254a."

In Whalen v. State, 12 Ohio C. C. 584, 5 Ohio C. D. 488, a prosecution for bigamy, letters written by the defendant to the woman who, it was claimed, was his first wife, and which had been delivered by her voluntarily to a marshal, were brought into court by the marshal and given in evidence as tending to show a marriage. The court said the statute only prevents husbands and wives from going on the witness stand and divulging communications made by one to the other; "but if either of these parties divulge these things by giving the written communication to another, or if that communication is disclosed by a robbery of the mails or otherwise, and it gets into the hands of a third person, and the issue be raised, it is clear that that third person may, if he be a witness in the case, offer that communication."

In State v. Nelson, 39 Wash. 221, 81 Pac. 721, where the defendant was accused of adultery, and the alleged paramour testified in his behalf, denying the state's allegation, for the purpose of impeachment, the state offered in evidence a letter written by the witness to her husband. It was held that, as the letter was produced and offered in evidence by the officers of the state, it had therefore lost its character as a privileged communication. It would seem to be suggested that the husband gave the letter to the officers, but it is not so stated.

In People v. Hayes, 140 N. Y. 484, 23 L.R.A. 830, 37 Am. St. Rep. 572, 35 N. E. 951, a prosecution for perjury, it was held that the privilege had been waived as to letters from a wife to a husband, and offered against the husband, which were given by him to his mistress, the prosecutrix, who subsequently delivered them to the district attorney, by whom they were offered in evidence. The court said: "Comment upon baseness of this act of the defendant is unnecessary. It speaks for itself. The result, however, is to release the letters from the operation of the rule as to confidential communications between husband and wife, and to leave them open to use as evidence to the same extent as if no such rule had ever guarded them."

—theory that privilege remains.

In the following cases it was held that a privileged communication in the hands of a third person was not admissible in evidence:

Bowman v. Patrick, 32 Fed. 368 (husband and wife); Liggett v. Glenn, 2 C. C. A. 286, 4 U. S. App. 438, 51 Fed. 381 (attorney and client); Ward v. State, 70 Ark. 204, 66 S. W. 926 (husband and wife); Mercer v. State, 40 Fla. 216, 74 Am. St.

upon the stand to contradict her and show that she had made the statement. On objection of the county attorney this was excluded. Various reasons were offered why this testimony was admissible; among others, that it was impeachment; that her testimony was unreliable; that she was in the habit of charging her relatives with this course of conduct with her. Without discussing whether or not this testimony as an original proposition was inadmissible for the purpose of attacking her evidence, and showing her ill will and matters of that sort towards her father for interfering with her proposed marriage with Burns, yet, it having gotten into the case, the defendant had the right to probe it as far as he could for what it was worth in attacking her testimony, and in aiding his view of the case that her whole story was fabricated, and it was done because of the fact that he had interfered, in the first instance, with her proposed marriage, and to explain as best he could her threat to get even with him, and to show that her testimony was unreliable. If this matter should get into another trial, this testimony should be admitted.

3. The prosecutrix testified, among other things, that she had never been out in public with any young man unless her sister or someone else accompanied her, and especially that she had not been with Burns, whom she subsequently married, under such circumstances. To contradict and impeach her on this line, appellant

Rep. 135, 24 So. 154 (husband and wife); Fire Asso. of Philadelphia v. Fleming, 78 Ga. 733, 3 S. E. 420 (attorney and client); Wilkerson v. State, 91 Ga. 729, 44 Am. St. Rep. 63, 17 S. E. 990 (husband and wife); Southern R. Co. v. White, 108 Ga. 201, 33 S. E. 952 (attorney and client); Scott v. Com. 94 Ky. 511, 42 Am. St. Rep. 371, 23 S. W. 219 (husband and wife); Brown v. Brown, 53 Mo. App. 453 (husband and wife); Gross v. State (husband and wife); Selden v. State, 74 Wis. 271, 17 Am. St. Rep. 144, 42 N. W. 218 (husband and wife); Reg. v. Levenson, 11 Cox, C. C. 152 (attorney and client); Reg. v. Pamenter, 12 Cox, C. C. 177 (husband and wife).

Of these cases, in Wilkerson v. State, Brown v. Brown, and Selden v. State, the communication came voluntarily from a spouse to whom it was addressed.

Thus, in Wilkerson v. State, the defendant, who was accused of murdering the husband of a woman with whom his relations were illicit, offered in evidence a letter from the deceased to his wife, and by her given to the accused, and it was held that it was properly rejected.

So, in Brown v. Brown, in an action by a husband for a divorce, it was held that it was error to permit letters of the wife to the husband, which had been sent to their daughter for delivery, to be given in evidence by the husband. The court said that it did not appear that the letters were unsealed when inclosed to the daughter, "and if it did so appear, we would not assume that they were intended for her to read."

In Selden v. State, it appeared that upon the trial of a man for perjury, alleged to have been committed in an action for divorce from his life, the attorney for the wife in the divorce action, as a witness for the state, produced in evidence letters from the husband to the wife which she had given him, and it was held that their admission was reversible error, the court placing its decision not only on the ground that the wife had demanded the letters back from her attorney, but also on the ground that, as she could not disclose the letters, her attorney could not. It appears in a 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

note to the opinion that the wife did consent to the attorney retaining the letters. The court said the attorney "was not an 'eavesdropper,' or a person who merely overheard communications of conversations between husband and wife, and it made no difference in favor of their admissibility that he used the letters as his authority for making the original complaint against the plaintiff in error, or in instituting the prosecution against him."

In Mahner v. Linck, 70 Mo. App. 380, the court, in laying down the rule that a letter by a husband to his wife should not be admitted in evidence against the husband unless it is first shown that the plaintiff did not get possession of it through the agency or connivance of the wife, said: "It is universally held that oral communications between husband and wife, when heard by a third person, may be given in evidence, regardless of the circumstances under which the conversation was heard. . . . It has been held in some of the cases that the fact that the communication was written places it on no higher ground than if oral."

It seems to us that these cases lose sight of the policy of the law making communications between husband and wife privileged, to wit, to secure the peace of the twain, and to protect and keep inviolate that mutual confidence so essential to their happiness, and we are disposed to adopt the reasoning and ruling of Judge Miller of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Bowman v. Patrick, 32 Fed. 368.

We think the policy of the law will be best subserved by refusing to admit written communications of this character, whenever they have come to the possession of a third party by the agency of the husband or the wife, or where such third party has gained possession of them by reason of his representative character, his agency, or other fiduciary relation to the husband or wife."

In Bowman v. Patrick, supra, Justice Miller, of the United States Supreme Court, in holding inadmissible a letter by a husband to his wife which her administrator had, in pure hostility to the husband, offered testimony from several witnesses that they had seen her going to and in the town of Waxahachie with Burns when her sister was not with them. In fact, that she had been seen going to the town and with him in the town without anyone in company with them. She had also testified that her father was very rigid with her, and would not let her be with Burns anywhere alone, even on the premises where they lived. As before stated, appellant offered evidence to show that she and Burns were together in Waxahachie and were seen going there. This was excluded on objection by the county attorney. In view of the condition of this phase of the case, this testimony was admissible. Illustrative of this, one of the bills of exception recites turned over to the husband's opponent, said: 'I confess I was very much astonished to find that there are some authorities which hold that while the wife cannot be permitted to tell, and not only that, but will be forbidden to tell, what her husband says to her in any matter of marital or private relations . . . that there are some authorities holding that where this evidence can be got at, either by obtaining possession of a letter, or some method of overhearing communications by some third party between the husband and wife, that this evidence can be used. . . . Whatever exceptions there may be to the rule protecting communications between husband and wife which may exist, and in regard to which I do not propose to say anything further, I am quite clear that the wife has no right to publish these communications; that she would not be permitted to produce the letter if she were a witness on the stand; that she could be enjoined from producing the letter if she were supposed to be hostile to her husband; and that the executor, in a voluntary and hostile spirit to the husband, who has letters, has no more right to produce them and deliver them over, to the husband's prejudice, than the wife had.'

In Mercer v. State, 40 Fla. 216, 74 Am. St. Rep. 135, 24 So. 154, where a letter from a witness to his wife was sought to be used on his cross-examination, it not appearing how it was obtained, the court, in referring to authorities to the effect that confidential communications which reach the hands of third persons are admissible, however their custody may be obtained, said: "We cannot agree to the correctness of this rule thus broadly laid down by these and other authorities, but think the policy of the law that forms the foundation of the general rule is far more strongly upheld and subserved by those authorities that recognize and declare certain classes of communications to be privileged from the inherent character of the communication itself, and that in such cases the privilege attaches to the communication and protects it from exposure in evidence, where-soever or in whose-soever hands it may be." 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) that R. W. Hopkins was tendered as a witness, and by him it was offered to be proved that he had seen Emory Burns and prosecutrix on two separate occasions at a late hour of the night at Waxahachie at the Chautauqua in the summer of 1908. The court excluded this testimony upon the ground that it was an attempted impeachment upon an immaterial matter. The state seemed to think that it was of some value to show she was not alone with Burns at any time, and having introduced it, appellant certainly had the right to offset whatever effect it might have upon the jury by any available testimony which contradicted her statement. Her father had charged her, in the presence of his wife, mother of prosecutrix, with having had

In Scott v. Com. 94 Ky. 511, 42 Am. St. Rep. 371, 23 S. W. 219, where the defendant, while in jail on a charge of murder, wrote a letter to his wife which was procured from her by a brother of deceased, and read in evidence, the court, in reversing a judgment for manslaughter, said: "It seems to us, whether given up by her voluntarily or obtained against her will, it was a disclosure of what had been written by her husband in the privacy and confidence of the marital relation, and the use of it against the husband in this case was just as much against the policy of the law, because as fully within the reason for it, as would have been a disclosure of what he had said to her in confidence and privacy of the marriage relation."

Ward v. State, 70 Ark. 204, 66 S. W. 926, is explained in Hammons v. State, 73 Ark. 495, 68 L.R.A. 234, 108 Am. St. Rep. 66, 84 S. W. 718, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 912, to the effect that an unlawful and forcible taking could not destroy privilege. In the Ward Case it appears that a wife visiting her husband in jail was seen to receive something from him, which the jailer took from her, and which proved to be a letter from the husband, addressed to a third person, at the foot of which was a note addressed to his wife, with instructions in regard to the letter. It was held that the part addressed to the wife was privileged, but that the part addressed to the third person was admissible in evidence against the husband.

In Liggett v. Glenn, 2 C. C. A. 286, 4 U. S. App. 438, 51 Fed. 381, quoted in GROSS v. STATE, it was held that a contract between an attorney and several clients, which had been filed by the attorney in the probate court, in proving the attorney's claim for fees against the estate of one of such clients, who had died, was not admissible in evidence against another of such clients, in an action brought by a third person, as it was privileged.

In Fire Asso. of Philadelphia v. Fleming, 78 Ga. 733, 3 S. E. 420, it was held that a letter from the defendant's attorney to its intercourse with Burns, that he caught them in the act, and this brought from her the statement that she would get even with him. We are of opinion that this testimony, in the attitude in which it is presented in the record, was of considerable import.

4. It was also proposed to be shown by Hopkins that he remembered having a conversation with Maud Gross at the home of her father in the summer of 1908, in which he was teasing her, and in which she told him that he, witness, could do nothing with her, that she "only done business with Emory Burns, and that it was all his, and no one could do anything to her." Witness was playing the violin, and she and witness had been playing the violin and organ together; they played a few pieces, and the neck of her dress was open, and that left her breast exposed; that after playing a few pieces he took his violin bow and ran down the neck of her dress and touched one of her breasts, and she turned around on the organ stool and said "Nothing doing for you; that was promised to Mr. Burns; belonged to Mr. Burns, and no other." This was offered by appellant to show the relation between prosecutrix and Burns, whom she subsequently married, and to show her character generally, and also for the purpose of contradicting and impeaching her testimony in which she denied intimacy with Burns and all other persons, except the defendant. She denied this incident related by Hopkins. We think, in agent was privileged and erroneously admitted, although it had been admitted on a former trial. The court said: "If error was committed on the former trial, it should have been corrected rather than persisted in, on the present occasion."

In Southern R. Co. v. White, 108 Ga. 201, 33 S. E. 952, the court excluded the evidence of a witness who would have testified that, at the request of the plaintiff, she had written and signed, in the name of the plaintiff, a letter to the plaintiff's attorney which had been transmitted by such attorney to the defendant's counsel. The appellate court said: "There was no error in this ruling. The circumstances under which the defendant's counsel came into possession of the letter would not render it admissible. It was a confidential communication from client to attorney, and is protected by the terms of §§ 5198 and 5199 of the Civil Code."

In a criminal action for obtaining money by false pretenses, a letter written by the prosecutrix to her attorney which had come into the possession of the defendant's attorney at the police court, and bore the magistrate's signature, was not allowed to be read by the defendant's attorney. Reg. v. Levenson, 11 Cox, C. C. 152.

In Reg. v. Pamenter, 12 Cox, C. C. 177, a prisoner who had been informed that all letters written by him would be read before leaving the station, asked a constable to post a letter for him "unknown" to the superintendent, and gave him three letters,—one to a police officer, one to his attorney, and one to his wife; the constable made no promise, merely saying, "I will see;" the Crown offered in evidence the letters to the officer and to the prisoner's wife. The court, however, refused to allow the latter to be read in evidence.

Where a letter addressed to his wife was found upon a suicide's body, and was read by the coroner, and delivered to the wife, the court, while not deciding the question, said: "The letter was in the possession of the wife, to whom it was addressed, and it is at least doubtful whether it or the information it contained could have been used against the plaintiff upon a new trial without violating the statutory inhibition against the disclosure of communication between husband and wife." Bunker v. United Order, 97 Minn. 363, 107 N. W. 392. See also, in this connection, Lindahl v. Supreme Ct. I. O. F. 100 Minn. 87, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 916, 117 Am. St. Rep. 666, 110 N. W. 358.

—theory that secondary evidence is admissible.

In England the rule prevails that while the production of the original document may not be compelled, as it continues to be privileged, secondary evidence of its contents may be offered.

In Calcraft v. Guest [1898] 1 Q. B. 759, 67 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 505, 78 L. T. N. S. 283, 46 Week. Rep. 420, it appeared that a defendant in an action for trespass on the plaintiff's fishery came into possession of certain papers which had been used on behalf of the plaintiff's predecessor in an action relating to the same fishery over one hundred years before, and which were found among the papers of the solicitor in the former action for the plaintiff's predecessor, and that, on the plaintiff's demand, the defendant had delivered the papers over to him. It was held that the documents, being privileged in the first place, always remained so unless there had been a waiver; that the plaintiff could not be required to produce the documents, but that the defendant might offer secondary evidence of their contents from copies made while the papers were in his possession. The court distinguished Wheeler v. Le Marchant, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 675, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 793, 44 L. T. N. S. 632, 45 J. P. 728. The giving of secondary evidence in such a case was held allowable under the authority of Lloyd v. Mostyn, 10 Mees. & W. 478, 2 Dowl. P. C. N. S. 471, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 1.

In Wheeler v. Le Marchant, supra, it was held that letters between the defendant's solicitors and his surveyors were not privileged, unless written after the dispute with the plaintiff arose.

view of what has been stated in regard to the prosecutrix, and what had occurred between them, that this testimony was admissible.

5. Oli Bruce testified for the state in rebuttal, and while so testifying the following question was asked by counsel for the state: "Calling your attention to the conversation that you had, if any, with Mrs. Gross about her leaving her husband, I will ask you to just explain that conversation, what you stated to her; just tell the jury what you said to her; don't say what she said, but what you said." Witness answered: "After defendant left home, I told Mrs. Gross it looked to me like there was but one thing for her to do, and that was to go to her father. I said, 'You cannot stay here alone, and I have got all that I can do; I cannot stay with you.' That is the substance of what I told defendant's wife." Objection was urged to the question and answer, because the testimony is not admissible, upon the ground that such conversation between the wife of the defendant and the witness, or any explanation that was made by him to the wife when the defendant was not present, was inadmissible, and the testimony of the witness shows that the defendant was not present when he says he had the conversation with Mrs. Gross. At the time the objection was made, the court made the following statement: "The defendant's counsel, in cross-examination of other witnesses, sought to show conspiracy between this witness

In Lloyd v. Mostyn, supra, an action on a bond, a copy of the bond was admitted, it appearing to have been furnished by the defendant's attorney, who borrowed it from the custodian, who was the agent of the personal representative of the attorney for the obligors.

In Legatt v. Tollervey, 14 East, 302, and in Jordan v. Lewis, 14 East, 306, note, it was held that in actions for malicious prosecution, if the defendant had procured a copy of the indictment on the prosecution complained of, he might put it in evidence, although the copy was obtained without the order of the court, there being a general court order prohibiting the giving out copies of indictments for felony without a special order; the reason for the prohibition being that otherwise prosecutors might fear to come forward.

It may perhaps be questioned whether the principle of these last two cases has not been misinterpreted. If it was a citizen's right to take and offer in evidence a copy of such a court record, it would seem that the judges could not take away such right unless, indeed, there was a statute specially authorizing them to do so.

Perhaps it was the English rule which the court intended to follow in Com. v. Fisher, 221 Pa. 538, 70 Atl. 865, where it was held to be error to admit in evidence two letters written by fellow prisoners at the dictation and by the request of the defendant, to his wife, and by her delivered to the district attorney. The court said: "It is argued that this in effect was the giving of testimony by the wife against the husband, which, in our state, is forbidden by statute. We have concluded that this assignment must be sustained. The letters were produced at the trial by the district attorney. They could not be produced by the wife, and offered in evidence as coming from her. . . . We see no reason why the declarations contained in the letters, if they were made to other parties, competent to testify, should not be proven by them."

It is held that oral communications overheard by a third person by accident or design may be given in evidence by such third party.

This was held in Hoy v. Morris, 13 Gray, 519, 74 Am. Dec. 650, as to a conversation between attorney and client, where the court said that the hearer "was a mere bystander, and casually overheard conversation not addressed to him nor intended for his ear, but which the client and attorney meant to have respected as private and confidential." The attorney "could not lawfully have revealed it. But, in consequence of a want of proper precaution, the communications between him and his client were overheard by a mere stranger."

In Com. v. Griffin, 110 Mass. 181, on a trial for manslaughter the state proved, over the defendant's objection, a conversation as to the alleged homicide between the defendant and his wife, while confined in jail, from the testimony of two officers who concealed themselves in the jail for the purpose of listening to the conversation, without the defendant and his wife knowing that the witnesses or any other persons were within hearing of them. The opinion of the appellate court in overruling the defendant's exceptions was as follows: "There is no rule of law requiring that third persons who hear a private conversation between husband and wife shall be restrained from introducing it in their testimony."

In Knight v. State, 114 Ga. 48, 88 Am. St. Rep. 17, 39 S. E. 928, where the testimony of witnesses was admitted as to a conversation between the accused and his wife, the court said: "It is true that the Civil Code, § 5198, declares: 'There are certain admissions and communications excluded from public policy;' and, among them, 'communications between husband and wife.' But the meaning of this provision simply is that neither of the married pair will be permitted to testify as a witness concerning such communications, or to fur-and the wife of defendant and other members of the family,—to show that he advised separation after the charges made against the defendant; and this testimony was permitted to go to the jury as explanatory of this witness's connection with the matter." We are of opinion this testimony was not admissible. The state could meet, as a matter of course by legitimate testimony, any attempt on the part of the family of the wife of defendant and witness with other members of the family, if the defendant had introduced this character of testimony; but the state could not introduce matters occurring between Oll Bruce, the brother of Mrs. Gross, and defendant's wife. She was the wife of defendant, and this evidence would tend to show, after nish to another, for the purpose of being introduced in evidence, writings of any kind received under the seal of confidence during coverture. This section of our Code was not intended to forbid one who overhears a conversation between husband and wife from testifying with respect to the same. If they are unsuccessful in keeping secret that which they intend each other shall so regard, the mere fact that they did so intend will not render incompetent the testimony of an outsider."

In Com. v. Everson, 123 Ky. 330, 124 Am. St. Rep. 365, 96 S. W. 460, it was held by the state of an eavesdropper as to a conversation which he heard between the defendant and his wife. The court distinguished Scott v. Com. 94 Ky. 511, 42 Am. St. Rep. 371, 23 S. W. 219, and said: "While neither the husband nor wife may testify as to any communication between them, the authorities, so far as we can find, are unanimous in holding that third persons may testify to communications overheard by them between husband and wife. . . . The rule as to private communications between husband and wife is, by all the authorities, put on the same plane as private communications between attorney and client; and it has been said that if persons wish the communications they have with their attorneys to be kept a secret, they should be careful not to talk within the hearing of others. 4 Wigmore, Ev. § 2339; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 254."

In State v. Falsetta, 43 Wash. 159, 86 Pac. 168, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 177, where an officer of the court testified that he heard the defendant make a certain statement to his counsel in the court room, the appellate court said: "The rule that precludes the attorney from testifying has no application to a third person who, by accident or design, overhears the communication."

In People v. Durfee, 62 Mich. 487, 29 N. W. 109, a deputy sheriff was allowed to testify to a conversation he overheard between the prisoner in jail and his counsel, but 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a prolonged conversation between her brother and sister, his conclusion of these matters, and it authorized the giving of his opinion in the concrete that, on account of these matters, the separation had occurred. Appellant was not a party to it. It was in his absence, and could not affect the question legitimately which was before the jury, to wit, the intercourse between appellant and his daughter. This whole thing was the act of third parties among themselves, and was, we think, necessarily damaging. Upon another trial this testimony should not be permitted to go to the jury.

6. Another bill of exceptions recites that the state placed upon the stand Mrs. Maud Coleman, who stated that she lived at Miles, in Runnels county, was the mother the nature of the conversation does not appear.

The doctrine that it is the incompetency of the witness, and not of the evidence, was held in Wells v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. 187 Pa. 166, 40 Atl. 802, where a physician's deposition as to the cause of his patient's death was taken prior to the act providing "that no person authorized to practise physics or surgery shall be allowed, in any civil case, to disclose any information which is required in attending a patient in a professional capacity, and which was necessary to enable him to act in that capacity, which shall tend to blacken the character of the patient, without his consent." This act was passed before the trial, and the physician being then dead, the deposition was read, and it was held that there was no error, although, if living, he could not have testified. The court said: "It will be seen at once that the act establishes a personal incapacity only. It is the physician attending a patient who is prohibited from testifying to information acquired while rendering professional service. He is prohibited by the words, 'no person authorized,' etc., shall be allowed to disclose any information, etc. No other person who, being present at the time when the information was communicated, and heard the same, would be prevented by this act from testifying to the very matter in question. It is only the physician himself who is prohibited, and that is manifestly on account of the professional relation between himself and his patient."

Where, while his client was in jail, an attorney was shadowed by officers and found digging, and they joined him and assisted him, and some money being dug up, the attorney stated that it was his client's money, it was held that this declaration was admissible, the court stating that any overheard conversation between attorney and client would be admissible, and (apparently on this theory) held that acts of the attorney were admissible, and said: "Where testimony is prima facie competent and relevant, the burden of showing by competent evidence that it should not of Mrs. Jim, or Eva, Gross, the wife of defendant, and that Mrs. Jim Gross and her children had been living at her home since the defendant got into this trouble. She further testified that she was acquainted with the handwriting of defendant and knew it when she saw it; and, further, while defendant was at Putman, Texas, he wrote a letter to his wife, Mrs. Jim Gross, and that she, witness, read the letter; that she "was prowling in to see what was going on between them in the way of correspondence," and through curiosity she got hold of this letter and read it. She further testified that she just picked up this letter in the house; that it was her home; but did not know why Mrs. Jim Gross, wife of defendant, did not give this letter to her, nor did she do anything to direct her attention to this particular letter, and this letter that defendant sent to his wife from Putman, Texas, was burned up, as she saw her daughter, Mrs. Jim Gross, put this letter in the stove; and that she knew the contents of this letter from defendant to his wife, it being the same letter that she saw Mrs. Jim Gross burn; that she was not hunting evidence against defendant, as he had not at that time been arrested, and she hoped the matter would never get out. The state then proposed to prove by the witness, Mrs. Maud Coleman, the contents of the letter, to which the defendant objected for the following reasons: The letter was a privileged communication between defendant and his wife; that the

be admitted is upon the defendant." State v. Perry, 4 Idaho, 224, 38 Pac. 655.

There is a class of cases where it is not clear from the report whether the presence of a third person within hearing was or was not unknown to the conversers; such as State v. Sterrett, 68 Iowa, 76, 25 N. W. 936; Toole v. Toole, 109 N. C. 615, 14 S. E. 57; State v. Center, 35 Vt. 378; Rex v. Smithies, 5 Car. & P. 332; Rex v. Bartlett, 7 Car. & P. 832.

Miscellaneous.

Some of the following cases, while not, perhaps, strictly within the scope of this note, are closely allied to its subject.

Where a fellow prisoner who had been used as an interpreter between the defendant and his solicitor, later, in a conspiracy with secreted officers, told the prisoner that his solicitor had telephoned that he should tell such interpreter everything, evidence of the subsequent conversation was excluded. Phippen, J. A., in his concurring opinion, said that the case was argued "as that of an overheard conversation between solicitor and client. I do not think the same rule applies. As part of the trick, the listeners were placed where they could overhear what passed, whereupon the prisoner was led to believe he was discussing the matter in hand with one person alone, his solicitor's agent. As a matter of fact, he was talking with three persons,—the supposed agent and two others who were concealed. I think we must treat the whole as an interview with several persons who had fraudulently adopted the character of solicitor's representatives. If so, we should, on the admitted principle, apply the cloak of privilege to what was heard by the listeners without, as well as within, the cell." Rex v. Choney, 13 Can. Crim. Cas. 296.

Where the district attorney represented himself as the prisoner's counsel over the telephone (State v. Russell, 83 Wis. 330, 53 N. W. 441), the court said: "The rule is invariable that confidential communications made to one falsely pretending to be the counsel of the accused are privileged." 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Jacobs v. Hesler, 113 Mass. 157, it was held that evidence, apparently given by the wife, of confidential conversations between her and her husband, carried on in the presence of their five children, the eldest being eleven years old, none of the children being shown to have taken any part in the conversation or paid any attention to it, was not competent.

Jacobs v. Hesler, supra, was followed in Hopkins v. Grimshaw, 165 U. S. 342, 41 L. ed. 739, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 401, where it was held that conversations between husband and wife were improperly testified to by the wife when a widow, although held in presence of their young daughter, who did not appear to have taken any part in them. But it seems that, in the Hopkins Case, the daughter did testify, and the Supreme Court seemed to think that she may have been a competent witness to such a conversation; but the case was reversed in other grounds.

In Campbell v. Chace, 12 R. I. 333, it was held that, under the Rhode Island statute, a communication between husband and wife in the presence of her mother could not be testified to by the wife, but whether the mother could so testify is not considered.

It is pointed out by the court in Cahen v. Continental L. Ins. Co. 9 Jones & S. 296, in approval of the trial court, that a sick man is not to be judged as having waived his privilege when he makes a statement to his physician in the presence of third persons who are present in aid of the sick man. The court, however, reversed the judgment of the trial court, which judgment was in turn sustained by the court of appeals in 60 N. Y. 300.

In Bowers v. State, 29 Ohio St. 542, 2 Am. Crim. Rep. 592, it was held that, in a consultation between a young girl and her attorney respecting a civil action to be brought against her seducer, the presence of the girl's mother at the consultation will not waive the privilege.

Where a prisoner wrote to a friend to ask G. or any other solicitor a certain question, it not appearing that G. had ever testimony shows that the witness Mrs. Maud Coleman was looking for letters, and that she found this particular letter in her home; that she was searching for letters from defendant to his wife; and, further, the letter was not admissible, nor is it admissible for the witness to state the contents as to what was in said letter; that it is making and using the wife as a witness against the defendant, her husband, indirectly, by using a privileged communication between them as husband and wife. These objections were all overruled, and witness testified that in said letter, being the same letter that wife of appellant burned, he wrote his wife the following: "For God's sake, get Emory and Maud Burns out of the way, for they could put me to death; you ought to do that much for me."

The court says this testimony was admitted on the theory that if the communication had been verbally made by defendant to his wife, and had been overheard by Mrs. Coleman, she could have testified to it, and it being made in a letter which came into Mrs. Coleman's hands without any act on the wife's part in aid thereof, the contents thereof could likewise be shown by the witness. There is a broad distinction between the introduction of conversations overheard by third parties, occurring between husband and wife, and the introduction of letters written by one to the other, as shown by practically, if not all, the authorities. It is unnecessary to take up or discuss the question as to conversations going on between husband and wife which are overheard by other parties. That question is not in the case, and it is unnecessary to discuss it. We hold that the introduction of the contents of the letter through the witness Mrs. Maud Coleman was inadmissible. It was a privileged communication under the statute, and therefore interdicted. Code Crim. Proc. art. 774. That statute says: "Neither husband nor wife shall in any case testify as to communications made by one to the other while married; nor shall they, after the marriage relation ceases, be made witnesses as to any such communication made while the marriage relation subsisted, except in a case where one or the other is prosecuted for an offense, and a declaration or communication made by the wife to the husband, or by the husband to the wife, goes to extenuate or justify an offense for which either is on trial."

In the case of Hearne v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 431, 97 S. W. 1050, the court permitted the introduction in evidence of ten or twelve letters alleged to have been written subsequent to the marriage of appellant with C. Wilson, which letters were written by appellant to her. The letters were admitted without objection on the part of appellant. Subsequently appellant moved to exclude the same from the consideration of the jury on the ground that they were privileged communications by the husband to the wife. The state relied upon Crow v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 72 S. W. 392, to sustain the insistence that the letters were admissible. The court said, in substance, that the objection urged in the Crow Case was not that they were privileged communications, but that the testimony is remote. In the Hearne Case the letters were held inadmissible, and the court further said: "Letters of the wife to the husband or husband to the wife acted for him (nor did he do so in the case), it was held that the letter was admissible against the prisoner. Rex v. Brewer, 6 Car. & P. 363.

A written statement made by the defendant, found on him when arrested, which he says he had prepared to give his lawyers, is not privileged. Renfro v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 393, 58 S. W. 1013.

Under the Ohio statute of 1870, making husband and wife incompetent as to communications made by one to the other, and acts done by either in the presence of the other, and not in the known presence of a third person, and leaving them as to other matters competent witnesses, and where the bill of exceptions did not show that any third person was present at the time the communications or acts of the parties were made or took place, the court said: "Evidence to show the presence of such third person was for the court, and not for the jury, and must be presumed till the contrary is shown." Westerman v. Westerman, 25 Ohio St. 500. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

While the ground of decision would exclude Norris v. Lee, 136 App. Div. 685, 121 N. Y. Supp. 512, it may be referred to here. In that case a wife's mother sued her daughter and son-in-law upon a promissory note, and the defenses were the statute of limitations and that the note was given for the plaintiff's accommodation; and it was held that the plaintiff was properly permitted to read, on the husband's cross-examination, a letter from him to his wife, mostly about ordinary petty family matters, although it stated, "I will settle with your mother just as soon as I can get my hands on the money from the mortgage, which I hope to do next week," the court saying: "I think that this was not a confidential communication within the inhibition of the Code of Civil Procedure (§ 831)." But the case was reversed for refusal to permit the defendant to explain the letter on redirect examination. It does not appear how the plaintiff got the letter.

are not admissible evidence in a prosecution for bigamy. We will not mention these letters seriatim, but hold that upon another trial none of the letters should be introduced that come within this rule." The judgment in that case was reversed on account of the admission of the letters. The same rule has been laid down in Cole v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 447, 88 S. W. 341; Burke v. State, 15 Tex. App. 156, Davis v. State, 45 Tex. Crim. Rep. 202, 77 S. W. 451; Gant v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 284, 116 S. W. 801. In the latter case the court said: "The privilege extends beyond dissolution of marriage relation by death or divorce. 10 Enc. Ev. pp. 196, 197, note 43 for collation of authorities. It includes letters from one spouse to the other." Mitchell v. Mitchell, 80 Tex. 101, 15 S. W. 705; Mercer v. State, 40 Fla. 216, 24 So. 154; Connell v. Hudson, 53 Mo. App. 418; Com. v. Sapp, 90 Ky. 580, 29 Am. St. Rep. 414, 14 S. W. 834; Stein v. Bowman, 13 Pet. 209, 10 L. ed. 129; Saunders v. Hendrix, 5 Ala. 224; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 254, 337, and notes; Cook v. Grange, 18 Ohio, 526-531; Brown v. Wood, 121 Mass. 137; Maynard v. Vinton, 59 Mich. 139, 60 Am. Rep. 276, 28 N. W. 401; Jacobs v. Hesler, 113 Mass. 157; Hitchcock v. Moore, 70 Mich. 112, 14 Am. St. Rep. 474, 37 N. W. 914; Smith v. Poter, 27 Vt. 304, 65 Am. Dec. 198; Brock v. Brock, 116 Pa. 109, 9 Atl. 486. The above list of cases is cited in Gant's Case, supra.

In the Mercer Case, supra, which is also found reported in 74 Am. St. Rep. 135, it is shown that Mercer was charged jointly with Wesley Bush for wilfully driving an ox upon the railroad track, and they were jointly tried and convicted; each being sentenced to ten years in the penitentiary. The court in that case, passing upon the question of the admissibility of letters from husband and wife, uses this language: "Such confidential communications between husband and wife have always been regarded as privileged, and when attempted to be detailed or divulged by either of the parties to whom the communication has been intrusted, the law not only forbids, but will not permit, it to be done. . . . Society has a deeply rooted interest in the preservation of the peace of families and in the maintenance of the sacred institution of marriage, and its strongest safeguard is to preserve with jealous care any violation of those hallowed confidences inherent in, and inseparable from, the marital status. . . . As Mr. Greenleaf puts it: 'The great object of the world is to secure domestic happiness by placing the protecting seal of the law upon all confidential communications between husband and wife, and whatever has come to the knowledge of either by means of the hallowed confidence which that relation inspires cannot be afterwards developed in testimony, even though the other party be no longer living.'" 1 Greenl. Ev. 15th ed. §§ 254, 334, 337; 2 Taylor, Ev. §§ 908 and 910. The court further says that "the letter from the husband to the wife . . . was not sought to be introduced directly through the wife as a witness to whom it had been written, but in some manner, not disclosed by the record, had found its way to the possession of the attorneys for the defendants, and its offer in evidence was from their immediate custody. There is a considerable array of authorities to the effect that when confidential communication between husband and wife . . . get out of the possession and control of the parties to the confidence, and . . . find their way into the possession and control of third persons, regardless of the manner in which the possession thereof may be obtained by such third persons, that then communications lose their protected privileges of the law and become competent and admissible evidence. . . . We cannot agree to the correctness of this rule thus broadly laid down by these and other authorities, but think the policy of the law that forms the foundation of the general rule is far more strongly upheld and subserved by those authorities that recognize and declare certain class of communications to be privileged from the inherent character of the communication itself, and that in such cases the privilege attaches to the communication itself, and protects it from exposure in evidence whosoever or in whosoever's hands it may be."

In Scott v. Com. 94 Ky. 511, 42 Am. St. Rep. 371, 23 S. W. 219, Judge Lewis, rendering the opinion for the court of appeals of Kentucky, uses this language: "For it is essential to the happiness of social life that the confidence existing between husband and wife should be sacredly protected and cherished in its most unlimited extent; and to break down or impair the great principles which protect the sanctities of that relation would be to destroy the best solaces of human existence." "The evidence in this case shows the letter in question was procured from appellant's wife by a brother of the deceased, and thus came into possession of the commonwealth's attorney; but it seems to us, whether given up by her voluntarily or obtained against her will, it was a disclosure of what had been written by her husband in the privacy and confidence of the marital relation, and the use of it against the husband in this case was just as much against the policy of the law, because as fully within the reason for it, as would have been a disclosure of what he had said to her in the confidence and privacy of the marriage relation," citing Selden v. State, 74 Wis. 271, 17 Am. St. Rep. 144, 42 N. W. 218, which was a prosecution of a party for perjury, and in the proceedings against his wife for divorce, he made affidavit that he did not know her place of residence, and the question on the trial was whether letters written by him to her, pending proceedings for divorce, showing he did know her place of residence, and which she had placed in the possession of her attorneys, were competent evidence against him in a criminal trial. Applying the rule mentioned, it was here held that the letters being confidential communications, not even the address on the envelopes could be used as evidence against the husband.

These authorities, we think, are sufficient to show that the ruling of the trial court was error, and we deem it unnecessary to discuss this question further, or add any remarks to those already quoted. The reasons are sufficiently stated in fully appropriate language.

In the case of Liggett v. Glenn, 2 C. C. A. 286, 4 U. S. App. 438, 51 Fed. 381, the court was passing upon privileged communications between attorney and client, and uses very much the same reasoning as the cases cited do with reference to marital relation. Our statute, article 773 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, in regard to privileged communications between attorney and client, is as follows: "All other persons except those enumerated in articles 768 and 775, whatever may be the relationship between the defendant and witness, are competent to testify, except that an attorney at law shall not disclose a communication made to him by his client during the existence of that relationship, nor disclose any other fact which came to the knowledge of such attorney by reason of such relationship." This statute declares the law in our own state in regard to privileged communications between client and attorney. The two statutes are quite similar, and have been rigorously upheld.

In Liggett v. Glenn, supra, Judge Shiras, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The admissibility of the communications, in our judgment, is not dependent upon the manner in which control thereof is obtained from the counsel, but upon the inherent character of the communication itself. If the admission or statement sought to be put in evidence was made by reason of the confidential relation existing between client and counsel, it becomes a privileged communication, and as such it is not competent evidence against the client. Its competency is not dependent upon the mere manner in which knowledge thereof may be obtained from counsel. The principle forbidding its use is not adopted as a mere rule of professional conduct on the part of the attorney. It confers a right upon the client for his protection and advantage, and which he alone is authorized to waive. It will not do to hold that the communication loses its confidential and privileged character if knowledge thereof can be obtained by means which do not involve the counsel in a breach of professional duty. For illustration, a letter is written by a client to his attorney containing statements of a privileged nature. The counsel, having this letter on his person, meets with an accident, causing his death. Third parties in this way became possessed of the letter, and from them it passes to the possession of the adversary party. Has this letter lost its privileged character and become competent evidence against the writer, simply because it passed from the possession of his counsel, to whom it was written, without fault on part of the attorney? Suppose that, upon a trial of a cause, an attorney is sworn as a witness, and he is asked to produce a letter written him by his client. He refuses, on the ground that it is a confidential communication. The trial court overrules the objection, and compels the production of the letter, which is filed as part of the evidence in the cause. An appellate court reverses the ruling of the trial court on this question, holding that the letter was privileged, and sends the case back for a new trial. On the second hearing the attorney is not called as a witness, but the clerk, in whose custody the letter was placed on the first trial, is summoned by a subpoena duces tecum, and required to produce the letter in order that the same may be read in evidence. Is it possible that this letter, being a confidential communication between client and counsel, can be rightfully put in evidence upon the theory that the possession thereof was obtained without fault on the part of the attorney? The argument founded upon the assumption that the admissibility of confidential communications between client and counsel is dependent solely upon considerations of the duty of counsel not to make known that which was communicated to him professionally is, in our judgment, faulty, in that it ignores the main purpose of the rule, which is that the client shall be at liberty to freely communicate to his attorney knowledge of all matters connected with the business in hand, upon the assurance that confidential communications thus made are privileged and cannot be used in evidence against him, unless he deprives them of their privileged character."

It is unnecessary to quote further from the opinion of Judge Shiras. It does settle the question, and is in harmony with all the authorities, so far as we are aware, to the effect that privileged communications between counsel and client cannot be used as evidence directly, nor will its use be permitted in any indirect or surreptitious manner. The communication in any event is privileged. If this is true as to the relation of attorney and client, how much stronger the reasoning when privileged communications arise between husband and wife. Not minimizing the same relation of client and attorney, but we do say that the relation between husband and wife is far more sacred, and to be the more strongly guarded, than that of the relation between attorney and client. Our statute interdicts the use of testimony in both instances. It makes no difference in this case that Mrs. Maud Coleman obtained the possession of the letter in the manner that she did; that possession and her knowledge of the contents of the letter did not rob it of its confidential and privileged character. If obtaining the letter by Mrs. Coleman as she states, and her statement of its contents could be used, the wife could turn over the letter to state's counsel, and thereby constitute it admissible evidence. To hold this would be to in effect abrogate the statute and break down the purpose of the law, which was to shield and protect the privileged matters occurring between husband and wife. Not only does this privilege exist during the lifetime, but it passes beyond the life of either or both, and becomes a permanent and fixed fact for all time, whether this relation ceases to exist by divorce or death.

7. There is complaint made of the manner in which an additional charge was given to the jury after they had retired to consider their verdict. This will not occur upon another trial, and it is unnecessary to discuss it.

For the errors indicated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

Petition for rehearing denied March 15, 1911.

H. C. THORNTON, Appt.,
v.

JAMES FINDLEY et al.

Conditional sale — renewing credit — waiver of title.

1. A conditional vendor of chattels who reserves title until payment of the purchase money waives it in favor of an intervening mortgage from the vendee, who had paid enough to give him an interest to mortgage, by taking a renewal note for the unpaid purchase money without reserving title at the time he does so.

Mortgage — priority — failure to record.

2. The fact that a conditional vendor of a chattel takes a mortgage on the property at the time title vests in the vendee does not give his mortgage priority over that of a prior recorded mortgage given by the vendee on the chattel after he had paid enough on the purchase money to give him an interest to mortgage, if he neglected for a considerable time to place his mortgage on record, since such delay permits the prior mortgage to attach to the whole property.

(January 30, 1911.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Chancery Court for Craighead County awarding defendant Findley a superior lien on the property in an action to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Basil Baker, for appellant:

The reserved title was waived.

Note.— Effect of taking collateral security upon conditional sale.

The effect of taking collateral security as a waiver of the right of the seller of property upon conditional sale to rely upon a provision retaining title to the article sold until payment is the subject of a note appended to Monitor Drill Co. v. Mercer, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1065. No case considering the question subsequently to this note, other than THORNTON v. FINDLEY, has been found.

In this connection, however, it is worthy of note that in THORNTON v. FINDLEY, the conclusion of the court that the seller had waived his right to treat the sale as a conditional one, as against a subsequent mortgagee of the property, was based upon the fact that renewal notes were given in lieu of the original title-clause notes, and these renewal notes contained no reservation of title in the seller to secure the payment thereof, and were secured by a mortgage upon the property, which was held to be

Messrs. Lamb & Caraway, for appellees:

Even if there is a lapse of time, not too extended, between a sale and the execution of a mortgage by the vendee to the vendor, upon the property sold, and securing the purchase money, still no other lien can intervene in behalf of a third party, providing there exists between the vendor and the vendee the agreement at the date of the original transaction that the mortgage shall be given.

Frauenthal, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action instituted in the chancery court by H. C. Thornton, the plaintiff below, to foreclose a mortgage executed by A. D. Henry to him on one survey and one mare, to secure the payment of a note. The mare was, at the time of the institution of the suit, in the possession of J. H. Findley, who was also made a defendant. The defendant Henry subject to the mortgage mentioned. Several late cases have passed upon the question whether the mere taking of a note constitutes a waiver by the seller of property upon conditional sale, of his right to rely upon the provision retaining title in himself until payment of the purchase price, and it is held that subsequently taking a note for the purchase price is not a waiver. National Cash Register Co. v. Riley, — Del. —, 74 Atl. 362; Lane v. J. E. Roach's Banda Mexicana Co. — N. J. Eq. —, 79 Atl. 365; Beale v. Hudson County Water Co. 185 Fed. 179.

In Beale v. Hudson County Water Co. the theory adopted by the court in reaching this conclusion is thus stated: "The acceptance of a promissory note from a debtor for a pre-existing debt will not operate as a discharge or satisfaction of the debt, unless it is agreed that such shall be its effect; nor will it discharge a lien in favor of such debt unless it clearly appears that such discharge was intended. A promissory note, as its name implies, is but a made default, but the defendant Findley filed an answer in which he claimed a superior lien upon said mare for indebtedness due by said Henry to him. It appears from the testimony that Findley sold and delivered the mare to Henry on April 12, 1908, for $150, a part of which purchase money was paid in cash, and for the balance thereof he executed a note to Findley, with one J. S. St. Clair as surety thereon, due eight months after date. At the time of the sale there was a verbal agreement between the parties that the title to the mare should remain in Findley until the payment of the note. On April 18, 1908, Henry purchased a survey from the plaintiff, and, to secure the payment of a note given therefor and other indebtedness, he executed to him a mortgage on said survey and said mare. This mortgage was duly acknowledged and recorded on April 18, 1908. Thereafter, from time to time, Henry made payments to Findley upon the note executed by him to Findley for the mare, amounting in the aggregate to $43, and on December 31, 1908, executed a new note for the balance thereof, $107, due one year after date, with the said St. Clair as surety thereon, and at the same time executed a mortgage on said mare to secure the payment of this last note. This mortgage to Findley was not recorded until August 27, 1909. At the time of the execution of the second note to Findley, the first note executed by Henry to him for the mare was thus paid; but at that time there was no agreement, either written or verbal, that the title to the mare was thereafter reserved in the vendor. In October, 1909, Henry turned the possession of the mare over to Findley, upon the note promise to pay, and, ordinarily, is no payment if it is not itself paid; but it may amount to payment if the creditor so intended. Such intention, however, is not to be resolved against the creditor except by clear and convincing evidence. The burden of proof is upon him who claims the benefit of such discharge."

Reasoning along this line in National Cash Register Co. v. Riley, the court said that since a promissory note given by a debtor to his creditor does not operate as payment or discharge of a pre-existing indebtedness in the absence of an agreement between the parties that it shall so operate, the only effect the giving of a new note had upon a contract of conditional sale was to extend the time of payment, and defer or suspend the right of the seller to retake the property until default was made in the payment of the new note; but such extension of time did not deprive the seller of his right under the original contract to retake the article sold after default in the payment of the new note. A. G. S.

and mortgage executed by him to Findley. The chancellor entered a decree foreclosing both mortgages, but declared that Findley was entitled to a superior lien upon the mare under the mortgage executed by Henry to him. From that portion of the decree giving to Findley a superior lien upon the mare, the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

The plaintiff had the right to institute suit in the chancery court for the foreclosure of his chattel mortgage. This was one of the remedies which he had a right to pursue, and a court of equity possesses the jurisdiction to foreclose a chattel mortgage. A mortgagee of chattels may pursue any of the remedies to which he is entitled; he may sue at law for the recovery of the chattel or for its conversion, or he may sue in equity for the foreclosure of the lien which he has thereon by virtue of the mortgage.

In Jones on Chattel Mortgages, 5th ed. § 758, it is said: "He has the same right that a mortgagee of real property has to pursue all his remedies at the same time. He may maintain a suit at law to recover the mortgage debt, and also a suit at law to recover possession of the mortgaged property, and at the same time proceedings under a statute or in equity to foreclose the mortgage. In the absence of any controlling statute, the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage is inherently a matter of equity jurisdiction.

The sole question, then, involved in this case, relates to the priority of the rights and liens of the plaintiff and the defendant Findley upon the mare. On April 12, 1908, Findley sold the mare to Henry, but at the time reserved the title thereto in the vendor. This was a conditional sale, whereby the full title did not pass to the vendee, but upon the maturity of the first note given therefor the vendor had the right to determine whether the sale should be conditional or absolute, and, until he did so elect to determine, the title still remained in him, in event the purchase money for the mare was not paid at or before the maturity thereof. But by the contract of sale, although conditional, Henry obtained an interest in the mare. He had paid a part of the purchase money at the time he bought the mare, and he had an interest therein which he could mortgage. Sunny South Lumber Co. v. Neimeyer Lumber Co. 63 Ark. 268, 38 S. W. 902; Snyder v. Slatton, 92 Ark. 530, 123 S. W. 649.

Henry had therefore a right to execute a mortgage upon the mare to the plaintiff on April 18, 1908, before which time he had purchased, though conditionally, the mare and had the possession thereof; and by virtue of such mortgage the plaintiff became entitled to a lien on all the interest which Henry then owned in the mare, or which he might thereafter acquire. When the indebtedness due to Findley, the vendor, for the purchase money of the mare, matured, and was not paid, he had the right to elect whether he would treat the contract for the sale at an end and thus cancel the debt, or whether he would insist on the existence and payment of said indebtedness, and thus affirm the sale and make it absolute. At the time when Findley took the second note from Henry for the mare, the indebtedness for the original purchase money had matured, and part thereof had been paid. At that time two courses were open to him to pursue: Either to treat the sale at an end and to reclaim the property, or to consider the condition waived and to seek payment of the price, either in cash or by note, or other property. And, as a general rule, if the vendor takes a mortgage or other security for the price without then reserving title, such act will be regarded as a waiver of the condition of the original sale, and an election to consider the sale as absolute. In the case of Edgewood Distilling Co. v. Shannon, 60 Ark. 133, 29 S. W. 147, it was held that where a vendor of personal property, sold conditionally, sued to recover its possession, and there was evidence tending to prove that, after the sale, the purchase money was paid partly in cash and by the execution of a new note, the vendee's title became absolute, unless there was an agreement for a reservation of title in the vendor at the time of the execution of the second note therefor. Dudley E. Jones Co. v. Daniel, 67 Ark. 206, 53 S. W. 890; Butler v. Dodson, 78 Ark. 569, 94 S. W. 703; Baker v. Brown Shoe Co. 78 Ark. 501, 95 S. W. 808; 35 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 675.

In the case at bar, when Findley took the second note on December 31, 1908, for the balance due upon the purchase money of the mare, there was no agreement that he reserved title thereto until the payment of that note. On the contrary, he took a mortgage upon the mare in order to secure the payment of the note, and we think that he then waived any condition reserving title, and elected to consider the sale absolute. The absolute title to the mare then vested in Henry, and Findley had then and thereafter only a lien thereon by virtue of the mortgage executed to him. That mortgage was not recorded until August, 1909. Under our mortgage act (Kirby's Dig. § 5396) the filing or recording of a chattel mortgage is as essential to its validity as against third persons as any other element entering into the execution and making of a valid chattel mortgage. It is not a valid lien against other mortgagees, purchasers, or creditors acquiring liens thereon until it is filed in the recorder's office, as provided by statutory law. Fry v. Martin, 33 Ark. 203; Dodd v. Parker, 40 Ark. 536; Turman v. Bell, 54 Ark. 273, 26 Am. St. Rep. 35, 15 S. W. 886; Ringo v. Wing, 49 Ark. 457, 5 S. W. 787; Smead v. Chandler, 71 Ark. 505, 65 L.R.A. 353, 76 S. W. 1066. "As between conflicting mortgages, the one first filed for record will have priority." Mitchell v. Badgett, 33 Ark. 387.

But it is urged that the mortgage given to Findley was executed at the same time when the sale became absolute, and should therefore have precedence over a mortgage executed prior to that time. It is held that a mortgage given to a vendor of land for the purchase money thereof is superior to a lien acquired prior to the execution of the deed therefor, where the mortgage for the purchase money is given and recorded on the land at the same time that the deed is executed therefor. But this is held upon the principle that the execution of the deed and mortgage to the vendor and the record of such mortgage are simultaneous acts, and the title to the land does not, for a single moment, rest in the purchaser, but merely passes through his hands and vests in the mortgagee without stopping at all in the purchaser; and that, during such instantaneous passage, a lien acquired before such time by another cannot attach to the title. But in such case the passing of the title to the vendee, the mortgage back of the property by the vendee to the vendor, and the record of such mortgage, must all be done simultaneously. For if the title rests even for a short time in the vendee, with no valid lien thereon in favor of the vendor, then a prior lien secured by another on such property will have precedence over a mortgage subsequently secured by the vendor. It is upon this principle that the cases of Blevins v. Rogers, 32 Ark. 258, and Cohn v. Hoffman, 50 Ark. 108, 6 S. W. 511, were decided. But in the case at bar the unconditional title to the property vested in the vendee, Henry, on December 31, 1908, and the mortgage executed for the purchase money was not filed for record until the following August. During all that time the title rested in Henry, and the mortgage given by him to Findley was not, during that time, valid as against third persons who secured or had secured liens thereon. It follows that, as between the mortgagees, Thornton and Findley, the priority of their liens is determined by the priority in the time of the filing of their mortgages; and the mortgage of Thornton being filed first in time, it is first and prior in law.

The decree is reversed, and this cause is remanded, with directions to enter a decree in favor of the plaintiff.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, Resp.,
v.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE, & ST. PAUL RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(— Minn. —, 130 N. W. 545.)

Municipal ordinance — statutory authorization — validity.

1. The validity of a provision in a city ordinance expressly authorized by the legislature does not depend upon the expediency or public policy of its enactment, but upon its being within the legislative power of the state.

Same — prohibiting use of soft coal.

2: The emission of dense smoke by yard and switch engines being caused by the use of soft coal therein, a prohibition of such use within a populous city is substantially related to and directly tends to the prevention of a nuisance, the emission of dense smoke, and is an exercise of the police power of the state within constitutional limits.

Constitutional law — class legislation — validity.

3. Where there is a substantial difference in the condition or situation of individuals or objects with reference to the subject embraced in a law, an appropriate limitation based on such difference, in the application of the law, does not make such legislation partial.

Same — use of soft coal — stationary and locomotive engines.

4. The fact that a prohibition of the use of soft coal in locomotives does not apply to stationary engines does not make such prohibition partial legislation; there being obvious differences between the two classes of engines in respect to the tendency that burning soft coal has to cause a smoke nuisance, and other appropriate legislation having been enacted by the city to prevent the emission of dense smoke by stationary plants.

Co. 44 App. Div. 462, 61 N. Y. Supp. 33.

Simpson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the municipal court of the city of Minneapolis, the defendant was adjudged guilty of violating an ordinance prohibiting the use of soft coal, except smokeless coal, in certain engines within said city, and a fine of $25 was imposed. The defendant appeals from the said judgment.

It was shown and conceded upon the trial that the specified switch engine of the defendant company was, on the day charged, engaged in switching in defendant's yards in the city of Minneapolis, and that the officers and servants of defendant having charge and control of such engine were, at the time, using soft coal therein, which was not smokeless coal, and that the engine was then emitting dense black smoke.

By a demurrer interposed to the complaint, and overruled, the defendant questioned, and now questions, by various assignments of error on this appeal, the validity of the ordinance, and urges in support of its position four objections to said ordinance: First, that the city did not have authority to declare the use of soft coal in the specified engines a nuisance, nor to prohibit such use as constituting a nuisance; second, that, if the city had power to regulate the use of soft coal, it did not have power to prohibit its use; third, that the ordinance is partial in its application and is class legislation; fourth, that the ordinance is unreasonable, and would deprive the defendant of its property without due process of law, because (a) the ordinance went into effect twenty-seven days after its publication, and not sufficient time was given the defendant company to comply with its terms and continue carrying on its business of transportation; (b) the supply of hard coal is limited.

A consideration of the questions so raised involves not only the terms of the ordinance the defendant was charged with violating, but as well the legislative or charter power under which it was passed, and the general plan and scope of all the ordinances passed in the exercise of these powers. These different provisions, so far as here material, are before the court on this 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

appeal; the charter of the city of Minneapolis being a public act, and the municipal court, from which this appeal is taken, having judicial notice of all ordinances of the city of Minneapolis.

The charter of the city of Minneapolis gives the city council general power and authority to pass ordinances for the government and good order of the city, and to enforce the same, and for these purposes it is given, among many other express powers, power: "Seventh. To regulate the movement and speed of railroad locomotives and cars; . . . to regulate and prohibit the unnecessary discharging of steam therefrom; . . . and may direct what kind of coal any yard or switch engine shall use while being run or operated for any yard or upon any railroad within the limits of said city. Thirty-second. To do any and all acts and make all regulations which may be necessary and expedient for the preservation of health. Forty-seventh. . . . It shall have authority to prohibit and prevent the erection or maintenance of any insecure or unsafe buildings, stacks, walls, or chimneys, and the emission of dense smoke in said city, and to declare them to be nuisances and to provide for their abatement."

In the exercise of its charter powers, the city council at different times passed ordinances now in force, declaring the emission of dense smoke in the city a nuisance, prohibiting it, and providing a penalty therefor; prescribing the method of construction of chimneys and flues in buildings; requiring the submission to and approval by the smoke inspector of plans of furnaces and boilers in stationary heating and power plants in buildings to be constructed; creating the position of smoke inspector, and providing for the appointment of such officer; and in November, 1909, the ordinance which the defendant was charged with violating. The material part of this ordinance is as follows:

"Section 1. The use of soft coal in traction engines, switching engines, and locomotive engines in the city of Minneapolis is hereby declared to be a nuisance, and such use of soft coal other than smokeless coal, in the city of Minneapolis, is hereby prohibited; and no person, company, or corporation shall hereafter use or permit or cause to be used any soft coal, other than smokeless coal, in any traction engine, switching engine, or locomotive engine in the city of Minneapolis, Minnesota."

It is apparent that this ordinance, and the others referred to, are the outcome of a general plan on the part of the city of Minneapolis to abate the smoke nuisance, as authorized by the legislature. The legislature, having authorized the city council to declare the emission of dense smoke a nuisance, and to provide for its abatement, gave the council specific authority to direct, as one means to that end, the kind of coal that may be used in switch engines. Was this authorization, and an ordinance passed thereunder, if within the limits of the authority, a valid exercise of legislative power?

It is elementary that the legislature cannot prevent a lawful use of property by declaring a certain use to be a nuisance, which is not in fact a nuisance, and prohibiting such use. Lake View v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 191, 22 Am. Rep. 71; Hutton v. Camden, 39 N. J. L. 122, 23 Am. Rep. 203; People v. Rosenberg, 138 N. Y. 410, 34 N. E. 285. On the other hand, it is equally clear that acts or conditions which are detrimental to the comfort and health of the community may be effectively declared nuisances by the legislature, and, in the exercise of that power, specified acts or conditions may be declared a nuisance, although not so determined at common law. And the fact that the use or value of property as existing under the common law is thereby injuriously affected does not necessarily bring such legislative action within any constitutional prohibition. St. Paul v. Gilfillan, 36 Minn. 298, 31 N. W. 49; Com. v. Parks, 155 Mass. 531, 30 N. E. 174; Lawton v. Steele, 119 N. Y. 226, 7 L.R.A. 134, 16 Am. St. Rep. 813, 23 N. E. 878; State v. Tower, 185 Mo. 79, 68 L.R.A. 402, 84 S. W. 10. Whether the designation of a particular subject as a nuisance is within the legislative power is a question for judicial determination. State v. Gerhardt, 145 Ind. 439, 33 L.R.A. 313, 44 N. E. 469; Lake View v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 191, 22 Am. Rep. 71. But the scope of legislative action, when invoked to promote the general welfare, is very great. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 656, 31 L. ed. 208, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 992, 1257.

The emission of dense smoke into the atmosphere in populous cities may be declared, by the legislative department, a public nuisance, and prohibited. It is an annoyance, an interference with comfort, is destructive of property, and under some conditions is injurious to health. The right of the legislature to prohibit it is not an open question in this state, or apparently elsewhere. In St. Paul v. Gilfillan, 36 Minn. 298, 31 N. W. 49, it is said: "It will not be assumed that the legislature may authorize that to be declared a nuisance which, from the nature of the case, is not and cannot become such. But the matter prohibited by this ordinance [dense smoke] may become a nuisance, and may therefore be the proper subject for regulation or restraint by the city council, under legislative sanction." And in St. Paul v. Haugbro, 93 Minn. 59, 66 L.R.A. 441, 106 Am. St. Rep. 427, 100 N. W. 470, 2 A. & F. Ann. Cas. 580, it is said: "Nor can it be questioned that the legislature could confer upon a municipality the right to prohibit whatever is injurious or detrimental to public health or comfort, and that whatever deprives the residents of urban communities of pure, uncontaminated, inoffensive air is a nuisance." Moses v. United States, 16 App. D. C. 428, 50 L.R.A. 532; Marshall Field & Co. v. Chicago, 44 Ill. App. 410; Harmon v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 400, 51 Am. Rep. 698; State v. Tower, 185 Mo. 79, 68 L.R.A. 402, 84 S. W. 10; Hyatt v. Myers, 71 N. C. 271; Ross v. Butler, 19 N. J. Eq. 294, 97 Am. Dec. 654; State v. Noyes, 30 N. H. 279.

That the smoke nuisance is directly contributed to and almost wholly caused by burning soft or bituminous coal is a matter of general knowledge, and is made to appear as a fact in this case. Ordinarily soft coal contains from 32 to 40 per cent of volatile matter. Dense smoke is caused by the volatile matter in the coal being distilled without being burned, and the tendency of coal to produce dense smoke depends on the amount of volatile matter in the coal. "Smokeless coal" is a trade or commercial term applied to a grade of soft coal in which the volatile matter runs from 16 to 21 per cent. The volatile matter in hard coal is a much smaller percentage. The only direction as to the kind of coal that locomotives might burn that would be at all effective in abating the smoke nuisance would be a direction to use coals other than those having the highest percentage of volatile matter. A legislative requirement that locomotives shall burn coal other than the kind that produces the smoke nuisance is directly and substantially related to the prevention of annoyance and discomfort incident to dense smoke. The public policy or wisdom of such a prohibition is for the legislature to determine.

The courts cannot undertake to decide whether the means adopted by the legislature are the only means, or even the best means, possible to attain the end sought. Such course would vest the exercise of the police power of the state in the judicial department. "The power which the legislature has to promote the general welfare is very great, and the discretion which that department of the government has, in the employment of means to that end, is very large." Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 992, 1257. In Nelson v. Minneapolis, — Minn. —, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 260, 127 N. W. 445, it is said: "The methods, regulations, and restrictions to be imposed to attain, so far as may be, results consistent with the public welfare, are purely of legislative cognizance. The courts have no power to determine the merits of conflicting theories, nor to declare that a particular method of advancing and protecting the public is superior or likely to insure greater safety or better protection than others. The legislative determination of the methods, restrictions, and regulations is final, except when so arbitrary as to be violative of the constitutional rights of the citizens."

Counsel for defendant urges that careful firing in locomotives will prevent the nuisance. Existing conditions suggest strongly either that such is not the fact, or that careful firing cannot, in general practice, be obtained. Evidence was submitted by the defendant and by the state on this point, and the trial judge found adversely to defendant thereon. This, then, taking the view most favorable to the defendant, is a mooted question as to the best way of preventing a nuisance. Such question clearly is not for the courts to determine. Under such circumstances the legislature, upon consideration of existing conditions, may decide as to the means best adapted to prevent such nuisance, and carry such decision into appropriate legislation. The wisdom or public policy of the decision so made, or of the law passed to carry it out, will not be reviewed by the court. "We regard it as a general rule that the determination by a legislative tribunal of open or debatable questions concerning what is expedient is not subject to review on questions of fact, provided the question is one within the competency of the legislative tribunal to determine." Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hartford City, 170 Ind. 674, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 461, 82 N. E. 787, 85 N. E. 362.

The requirement of the ordinance under consideration directly tends to prevent a nuisance, and is clearly within the legislative discretion, and is valid as an exercise of the police power. "The courts will never set up their judgment against that of the legislature, and hold a police law invalid, unless it is clearly so, as having no reasonable tendency to accomplish the desired end." State v. Mrozinski, 59 Minn. 465, 27 L.R.A. 76, 61 N. W. 560. "Where a business is a proper subject of police regulation, doubtless, the legislature may, in the exercise of that power, adopt any measures they see fit, provided only they adopt such as have some relation to, and have some tendency to accomplish, the desired end; and if the measures adopted have such relation or tendency, the courts will never assume to determine whether they are wise, or the best that might have been adopted." Rippe v. Becker, 56 Minn. 100, 22 L.R.A. 857, 57 N. W. 331; State v. Corbett, 57 Minn. 345, 24 L.R.A. 498, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 694, 59 N. W. 317.

The ordinance is not an interference with the property rights of the defendant, or an abridgment of its privileges protected by the Federal and state Constitutions. If the use of soft coal tends directly to cause a nuisance, a prohibition of such use by the legislature is not forbidden by the constitutional provisions referred to. Such being the case, the ordinance is a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state for the promotion of the comfort and welfare of the people, and the defendant cannot complain of the resulting restrictions in the use of its property. Property rights and privileges are subject to reasonable regulations to promote the general welfare, and the defendant holds its property under the implied obligation that its use of it shall not be injurious to the community. The regulation and abatement of nuisances is one of the ordinary functions of the police power of the state. Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 24 L. ed. 1036; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 656, 31 L. ed. 208, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 992, 1257.

It appearing that the legislature had power or authority to pass the enactment contained in this ordinance, there remain for consideration the questions raised by the defendant as to the due exercise of that power in the present ordinance. The ordinance declares the use of soft coal in certain engines a nuisance. This provision of the ordinance does not affect its validity. If the ordinance is a valid exercise of the legislative authority to prohibit the use of soft coal as a means of preventing the nuisance of dense smoke, its validity or purpose is not affected by the declaration that the use of soft coal in such locomotives is a nuisance.

An ordinance passed under general authority to regulate or control a subject may be held unreasonable as not within the purview of the charter authority. This ordinance was passed under express authority from the legislature, and therefore depends, for its validity, on the power of the legislature. The charter empowers the council to direct, by ordinance, the kind of coal which may be used, and to punish violations of such ordinance. A designation of one kind of coal which may not be used, leaving other kinds open to use, is a designation of the kinds which may be used. The question of whether the passage of this ordinance, with the requirement therein contained as to fuel to be used in certain engines, is a reasonable exercise of the power granted the council, is therefore not involved. Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 135-328; St. Paul v. Gilfillan, 36 Minn. 298, 31 N. W. 49; State v. Tower, 185 Mo. 79, 68 L.R.A. 402, 84 S. W. 10; Landberg v. Chicago, 237 Ill. 112, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 830, 127 Am. St. Rep. 319, 86 N. E. 638; Walker v. Jameson, 140 Ind. 591, 28 L.R.A. 679, 683, 49 Am. St. Rep. 222, 37 N. E. 402, 39 N. E. 869. Much of the testimony submitted on the trial, and a number of the authorities cited in the briefs herein, while applicable to the determination of the question whether an ordinance like the one under consideration would be reasonable if enacted under general charter powers, have no application to the question of the authority of the council to enact this ordinance under express power from the legislature.

Dense smoke is not a nuisance per se. It only becomes a nuisance when it permeates the air surrounding people, and invades their residences and places of occupation. It is stipulated in this case that the yards of the defendant company and tracks therein extend through a densely populated portion of the city of Minneapolis. The emission of dense smoke by switch and yard engines in such yards in the city of Minneapolis is therefore a nuisance per se. The legislature and the council alike are presumed to have acted with full knowledge of existing conditions, and the validity of the ordinance must be tested upon the assumption that yard and switch engines emitting dense smoke do thereby permeate with such smoke the atmosphere in the densely populated portions of the city.

The ordinance, including in its terms locomotives not operating in yards, is to that extent broader than the express provision of the act permitting the council to direct what kind of fuel shall be used in switch and yard engines. If locomotives generally were in the same situation with reference to the smoke nuisance that switch and yard engines are, the prohibition of the ordinance would be effective and valid as to all locomotives, because reasonably and necessarily included in the exercise of the express power conferred by the charter; but such is not the fact. The road locomotive comes from without the city with fire made, or, if fired up within the city, ordinarily soon goes beyond the city limits. It is at work in the city but a comparatively short time, and on a continuous run. Clearly many considerations of necessity, expediency, and policy are involved in the regulation of the fuel of such locomotives, not involved in such regulation as to switch and yard engines. The legislature evidently distinguished between the two classes of engines, and the recognition of a basis for that distinction by the court leads to the conclusion that the prohibition of the ordinance is invalid as to locomotives other than yard or switch engines, because not within the purview of the general authority granted the council. Locomotives other than switch and yard engines being excluded from the operation of the express power conferred, they should not be held to be within the scope of an implied power. The engine in which soft coal was used resulting in the charged violation of the ordinance was a switch engine, and as to such engine the ordinance is valid and effective. "If a statute or ordinance contains provisions that are invalid, the other portions thereof are valid if they are not dependent on the part which is void." State v. Stone, 96 Minn. 482, 105 N. W. 187.

The second objection of appellant, that the city could not prohibit the use of soft coal, even though it had the power to regulate it, is involved in the first objection considered. The means adopted to prevent a nuisance are primarily for the legislature. Nor is it difficult to account for or justify the choice of means in this case. In the effective exercise of the police power, the aim is, not to punish the maintenance of nuisances, but to prevent their creation. Legislation, in the exercise of the police power of the state, contains many prohibitions as to locations of plants, manufacture and sale of articles, and carrying on of industries, justified not because the resulting conditions without such prohibitions would always or necessarily in each instance affect injuriously public welfare. The difficulty of enforcing a direct prohibition against the emission of dense smoke by switch engines is apparent. Moving about, as they do, it would be often impossible to determine to what company an engine which was excessively smoking belonged, or what individual was in charge of it.

It is further urged that the ordinance is invalid because it is class legislation, and this because it is invalid as to, and hence does not include, road engines, and it does not apply to stationary engines. It has already been suggested that if there were in fact no basis for a distinction in respect to smoke prevention between road engines and switch engines, then the ordinance would be valid as to road engines; but there is a distinction between such engines, both as to the condition sought to be corrected, and as to the necessity, expediency, and policy of the application of a particular means for correcting such condition.

There would seem to be, also, ample grounds for a distinction between locomotives and stationary plants as to the means best adapted to prevent the smoke nuisance. As stated, the ordinance of the city dealing with stationary plants regulates the construction of chimneys and flues, and through the approval of plans the location, arrangement, and construction of furnaces and boilers, and prohibits the emission of dense smoke. In the case of switch engines, supervision of the construction is not attempted; but the protection of the community from dense smoke is sought by direction as to the kind of fuel to be used. The necessary limitations in the construction of locomotives, the fire box with a water jacket, the frequent hand firing, the forced draft and quickly varying conditions of work, the fact that steam is mingled with the smoke, and that unconsumed gases are discharged near the ground, instead of at considerable elevation, the fact that the engines are moving, and cannot be subjected to effective supervision, are in marked contrast with the conditions related to the making of dense smoke present in stationary plants. In stationary plants the most favorable conditions for complete combustion can be obtained. The fire box may be completely lined with brick, room is available for automatic firing mechanism, the down draft may be used, in fact all the adverse conditions referred to, necessarily present in a locomotive because of the work it is called upon to do, may be and are wholly eliminated in the case of stationary plants; and because the operator of a stationary plant can always be located and identified, as to him the prohibition of the emission of dense smoke may be made a sufficient and effective regulation. The ordinances of Minneapolis do not permit the emission of dense smoke by either stationary or yard engines, but for obvious reasons they prescribe different means for preventing, in the different plants, the creation of the nuisance. It is perhaps unnecessary to suggest that proof that some stationary plants cause dense smoke does not establish a basis for a necessary common classification of stationary plants with locomotives causing smoke; neither does it disprove that stationary plants can, and that many in actual operation do, continuously burn soft coal without causing any appreciable smoke.

The application of a smoke prevention statute to one of these classes of engines, and not to the other, even where the law wholly exempts one class from the prohibition as to causing dense smoke, has been frequently passed upon and sustained by other courts. In Moses v. United States, 16 App. D. C. 428, 50 L.R.A. 532, an act of Congress was considered which prohibited the emission of dense smoke from smokestacks and chimneys other than those connected with private houses and locomotives. The classification was held not to be arbitrary. In State v. Tower, 185 Mo. 79, 68 L.R.A. 402, 84 S. W. 10, an act of the legislature making the emission of dense smoke a nuisance, which omitted from its operation locomotive engines and steamboats, and applied only to cities having a population of over 100,000, was held not objectionable as class legislation. In People v. Lewis, 86 Mich. 273, 49 N. W. 140, a similar ordinance, exempting dwellings and steamboats from its operation, was held not to make an arbitrary classification, but one resting upon reasons of public policy, growing out of the conditions surrounding the business of the different classes. In Brooklyn v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 44 App. Div. 462, 61 N. Y. Supp. 33, an ordinance providing that "no factory, engine room, or electrical station shall use what is known as soft coal for fuel in the furnaces of such factory, engine room, or electrical stations, within a radius of 4 miles of the city hall in the city of Brooklyn, except for the purpose of heating or welding iron or steel," was held valid against the objection that it was partial legislation.

Where there is a substantial difference in the condition or situation of individuals or objects with reference to the subject embraced in the law, an appropriate limitation based on such difference in the application of the law is not partial legislation. Legislation designed to prevent a smoke nuisance, to be equal and uniform, need not apply alike to "all soft coal users," without regard to the widely different conditions, related to the resulting smoke, surrounding such use by different users. The proper basis of the classification adopted by the legislature is the relationship of burning soft coal in the different kinds of plants, to the smoke nuisance. In State ex rel. McCue v. Ramsey County, 48 Minn. 236, 31 Am. St. Rep. 650, 51 N. W. 112, an ordinance relating to the smoke nuisance was held invalid, because it based a classification on the different uses made of the power generated, without regard to the situation or conditions of the furnaces, with reference to smoke, generating such power, and the rule is stated that a law, to be general and uniform, must operate equally upon all the subjects within the class for which the rule is adopted, and the limits of such class must not be determined arbitrarily, but the classification must be based on some reason suggested by such a difference in the situation and circumstances of the subjects placed in the different classes as to disclose the necessity or propriety of different legislation in respect to them. In State ex rel. Richards v. Hammer, 42 N. J. L. 435, it is stated: "The characteristics which thus serve as the basis of classification must be of such a nature as to mark the objects so designated as peculiarly requiring exclusive legislation. There must be substantial distinction, having a reference to the subject-matter of the proposed legislation, between the objects or places embraced in such legislation and the objects or places excluded. The marks of distinction on which the classification is founded must be such, in the nature of things, as will, in some reasonable degree at least, account for or justify the restriction of the legislation."

The classification in the present case falls clearly within the rule thus well stated. Where there is a distinction related to the subject-matter of the law justifying a classification, the court cannot substitute its judgment for that of the legislature as to the wisdom or policy of the application to certain objects or individuals of the particular law based on such distinction. In the case of State ex rel. Douglas v. Westfall, 85 Minn. 437, 57 L.R.A. 297, 89 Am. St. Rep. 571, 89 N. W. 175, Chief Justice Start gave expression to this principle as follows: "Courts ought never to be unmindful of the fact that the lawmaking power is vested in the legislature. Therefore, if there be any facts fairly calling for the exercise of legislative discretion in the classification of particular subdivisions of the state for the purposes of legislation, courts cannot review such discretion, and declare statutes making such classifications invalid, simply because they differ with the legislature as to the propriety of the classification. It is only when the classification is so manifestly arbitrary as to evince a legislative purpose of evading the provisions of the Constitution that the courts may and must declare the classification unconstitutional. In considering the constitutionality of a statute, courts will take judicial notice of all facts relevant to the question."

The final objection urged against this ordinance, that it is unreasonable and would deprive the defendant of his property without due process of law, because sufficient time was not given before the ordinance went into effect to enable the defendant to comply with it, does not seem sustained by anything appearing in the record of the case. So far as the record discloses, the only change the defendant company would be required to make in order to comply with the ordinance would be to use in its engines the grade of coal known as "smokeless coal." It does appear that some reconstruction of the fire boxes of engines would be necessary before hard coal could be burned therein successfully. By the ordinance the fuel directed to be used in switch engines is not limited to hard coal. It may very well be that an ordinance which did, in fact, require changes to be made in the appliances necessarily used by a transportation company, without giving a reasonable time to make such changes before the ordinance went into effect, would be an unlawful interference with property rights, but such case is not presented by the facts here.

The further ground assigned for the unreasonableness of the ordinance, that the supply of hard coal is nearly exhausted, likewise finds no support in fact, either as disclosed by the record in this case or within common knowledge.

The ordinance, and the judgment against the defendant for violation of the same, appearing to be valid, the judgment is affirmed.

I. General rule.

It has frequently been stated as a general rule, that an express warranty in a contract for the sale of an article excludes the idea of an implied warranty. Thomas v. Thomas, 146 Ala. 533, 41 So. 141; White v. Gresham, 52 Ill. App. 399; Thieler v. Hopkins, 85 Ill. App. 207; Nave v. Gross, 148 Ill. App. 104; Conant v. National State Bank, 121 Ind. 323, 22 N. E. 250; Reeves & Co. v. Byers, 155 Ind. 535, 58 N. E. 713; Sullivan Machinery Co. v. Breeden, 40 Ind. App. 631, 82 N. E. 107; *Guhy v. Nichols & S. W. 785; Budd v. Fairman, 8 Bing. 48, 1 Moore & S. 74, 5 Car. & P. 78, 1 L. J. C. P. N. S. 16.

Of the foregoing cases it may be said that, with the exception of Lanier v. Auld, which holds that an express warranty of soundness excludes an implied warranty of title, the doctrine was not applied as broadly as stated. While the doctrine was asserted in general terms, it was not specifically applied, or, if applied, it was where the implied warranty sought to be relied upon related to the same matter as the express warranty, and would ordinarily merge therein. While these cases do not admit any exception to the general rule therein stated, they do not, on the other hand, deny that there are exceptions thereto.

In Kullman, S. & Co. v. Sugar Apparatus Mfg. Co. 153 Cal. 725, 96 Pac. 369, the general doctrine is asserted that implied warranties merge in a contract when reduced to writing. The doctrine, however, was stated with reference to implied warranties relative to the working qualities of machinery, where the contract for the sale of the machinery was reduced to writing, and it contained warranties with reference to the working qualities of the machinery.

The doctrine is also asserted in Gaar, S. & Co. v. Hodges, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 889, 90 S. W. 580, that there can be no implied warranty if there is an express one. In this case, however, there was an express warranty in the sale of a separator and stacker, to the effect that each article of machinery furnished is warranted to be made of good material, well constructed, and with proper use and management will do as good work as any other of the same size and capacity, followed by the proviso that if any part of the machinery cannot be made to fill the warranty, that part which fails shall be immediately returned by the undersigned to the place where it was received, and written notice of such return given to the company at its home office, with the option of the company either to furnish another machine or parts in place of the machine or parts so returned, or return the money, etc.

In other jurisdictions it has apparently been recognized that an implied warranty may exist although the contract of sale contains an express warranty, if the express warranty refers to a different subject, or is of a different nature than the implied warranty, although the rule is also asserted that an express warranty excludes an implied warranty relating to the same subject, or of the same general nature. DeWitt v. Berry, 134 U. S. 306, 33 L. ed. 806, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 536; Reynolds v. General Electric Co. 73 C. C. In Budd v. Fairman, 8 Bing. 48, 1 Moore & S. 74, 5 Car. & P. 78, 1 L. J. C. P. N. S. 16, the rule is stated that where there is an express warranty as to any single point, the law does not beyond that raise an implied warranty that the commodity sold shall be also merchantable.

II. Application of rule.

a. In general.

Even if it is conceded that there are exceptions to the general rule that an express warranty will exclude an implied warranty relating to the same general subject, it is frequently a matter of some

Where the facts are conceded, or the statement is in writing, the question whether or not it constitutes a warranty is for the court.

2 Mecham, Sales, 1901 ed. § 1244

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the date of the transaction under inquiry, the plaintiff was a retail dealer in farm implements at Carroll, Iowa, and the defendant a wholesale dealer at Omaha, Nebraska, in like merchandise, including the Kemp manure spreader, manufactured by a concern known as the Richardson Manufacturing Company at Worcester, Massachusetts. Plaintiff gave defendant a written or printed order for a Kemp spreader, in which the only reference to a warranty or representation of quality is in the following words: "We agree to receive the following mentioned below and settle for the same on arrival by notes due as per terms marked below. . . . All goods subject to the warranties published in factory's catalogue and circulars." There is evidence to the effect that the Richardson Manufacturing Company in its advertising literature described the virtues and the triumphs of the Kemp spreader in the following terms: "The Worcester Kemp manure spreader has had nearly thirty years of this field experience. Every part has been demonstrated in actual field work; it is strong, simple, and mechanically right. It does its work with a cer-difficulty to determine whether, in a given case, the express warranty is of such a character as will raise the conclusive presumption that it was the only warranty intended to be assumed by the seller, and the only one relied upon by the buyer. The following cases, arranged according to the character of the article to which the warranty relates, may be found of some value as illustrative of the application of the general rule already considered.

In this connection, however, it may be said that the weight to be attached to decisions holding that an express warranty excludes implied warranties relating to the same matter depends to a great extent upon the nature of the warranty, its application to the article to which it relates, and the use to which it is intended to put such article, if known to the seller. Thus, a case holding that an express warranty of the quality of an article excludes all implied warranties on the same subject, when the facts present a case calling for the application of this general rule, is entitled to but little, if any, weight in determining the question when presented with reference to a case in which an implied warranty was relied upon which related to an entirely distinct matter of quality than did the express warranty. As, for instance, an express warranty that grain was of good quality might ordinarily exclude an implied warranty of quality, yet such a warranty, if made with reference to grain for seed, would not exclude an implied warranty that such grain was free from noxious seeds. (See Bell v. Mills, infra, II. d.) So, while an express warranty of the quality of fruit would ordinarily exclude implied warranties as to quality, yet an express warranty of the quality of fruit sold for shipment to a distant point would not exclude an implied warranty that the fruit was fit for such shipment (see Alvin Fruit & Truck Asso. v. Hartman, infra).

Likewise, if it be conceded that general express warranties of the quality of a machine or of machinery will exclude implied warranties of quality, it does not follow that this rule would be applicable where the machine or machinery was sold for a particular purpose or manufactured for a particular purpose. So, the application of the general rule to a case involving specific express warranties as to the size, power, or ease of operation of a machine or machinery, to the effect that such special warranties excluded implied warranties of quality or fitness or suitability for the use intended, would not be inconsistent with a denial of the operation of the general rule where the warranties relating to the quality of a machine or machinery were general in character, and the implied warranties relied upon were special, as, for instance, the suitability or fitness of the article for a particular purpose, or the manner of operation. In such a case it is doubtful if any court would apply the general rule and hold that general express warranties of quality excluded such special implied warranties. See infra, II. f, III. a, b, c.

b. Warranty of slaves.

A warranty that a negro is sound in body and mind precludes the implication that anything else is intended to be warranted. Stucky v. Clyburn, Cheves, L. 186, 34 Am. Dec. 590.

In M'Laughlin v. Horton, 1 Hill, L. 383, in holding that a special warranty that a negro is sound and healthy excludes the general implied warranty of soundness said that the general rule is that, when arising from the price paid, the court contract is reduced to writing, parol evidence is inadmissible to show that anything else is intended than what is expressed; and Wells v. Spears, 1 M'Cord, L. 421, which held that a bill of sale warranting property in a negro did not exclude an implied warranty of soundness, was distinguished on the ground that there the soundness of the negro did not enter into the written contract at all, but here the soundness of the negro was the subject of express warranty.

c. Warranty of animals.

An express warranty as to the character

tainty that is not disturbed by any possible local conditions. The Worcester Kemp is well built in every detail. Every particle of material has its office to perform, and forms its part of the magnificent whole." The machine was shipped to plaintiff, who, after having it in store for a time, made a tentative sale thereof to one Schwaller for use on a farm. On being tested by Schwaller, it proved to be incapable of doing good work, and was returned to the plaintiff, who, after unsuccessful appeals, first to the defendant and later to the Richardson Company, to remedy the defects, brought this action for damages, declaring both upon a breach of a written warranty and a breach of an implied warranty of fitness. The defendant answered, admitting the sale of the machine to plaintiff, but denying that it gave the plaintiff any warranty, express or implied, concerning said machine, and alleging that "whatever warranties, express or implied, were made, if any were made, were not those of the defendant, but of the makers of the machine in controversy;" and it further avers that, if any implied warranty did or could have arisen from the sale to plaintiff, yet, as it is conceded that such sale was made to him for the purpose of resale, and as he had the machine in his possession for a period reasonably sufficient to enable him to inspect it and ascertain its quality before selling to Schwaller, the office of such warranty had been accomplished, and no ac-

and qualities of oxen will preclude an implied warranty as to their fitness for the purpose for which they were purchased. Deming v. Foster, 42 N. H. 165.

An express warranty as to the pedigree and procreative qualities of a stallion excludes implied warranties on the same subject. Pidcock v. Crouch, 7 Ga. App. 299, 6 S. E. 971; Pidcock v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 7 Ga. App. 303, 66 S. E. 973.

An express warranty in the sale of a jack, that, if the animal proves barren, the purchaser may return him, and the seller will furnish him with another good jack, is an express warranty which will exclude an implied warranty as to the same qualities of the jack. Thisler v. Hopkins, 85 Ill. App. 207.

To the same effect as to warranties in the sale of a stallion is Nave v. Gross, 146 Ill. App. 104.

d. Grain, provisions, etc.,

The court will not insert in a contract an implied warranty that corn is fit for a foreign voyage, where the contract contains an express warranty that the corn is in good, merchantable condition. Dickson v. Zisnia, 10 C. B. 602, 20 L. J. C. P. N. S. 72.

An express guaranty that stores and provisions for a foreign voyage shall in quality be such as to pass survey of the officers of the East India Company does not exclude the warranty implied by law in such a contract, that the provisions and stores shall reasonably be fit for the purpose of being used in the way in which the provisions are meant to be used. Biggs v. Parkinson, 8 Jur. N. S. 1014, 7 Hurlst. & N. 955, 31 L. J. Exch. N. S. 301, 7 L. T. N. S. 92, 10 Week. Rep. 349. The foregoing case is based upon the doctrine that an express warranty does not exclude an implied warranty where it is superadded for the benefit of the buyer. See this subject infra.

An express warranty as to the quality of beer excludes an implied warranty with reference thereto. Springer v. Indianapolis Brewing Co. 126 Ga. 321, 55 S. E. 53.

An express warranty that certain merchandise called "flocks" contained no cotton excludes the supposition of an implied warranty that such merchandise was reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was intended to be used. Prentice v. Dike, 6 Duer, 220.

Although a contract for the sale of seed oats contains an express warranty that the oats are in good condition, choice stock, and well cleaned, nevertheless such warranty does not exclude an implied warranty that the oats are free from noxious seeds, such as mustard seed. Bell v. Mills, 78 App. Div. 42, 80 N. Y. Supp. 34.

e. Fertilizer.

An express guaranty that fertilizer contains certain ingredients excludes an implied warranty that it is fit for the purpose for which it was purchased. G. Ober & Sons Co. v. Blalock, 40 S. C. 31, 18 S. E. 264.

Jackson v. Langston, 61 Ga. 392, holds in the sale of fertilizer that the implied warranty of the Code does not operate where the parties by their contract have expressly agreed upon a different warranty, whether it be more or less extensive. It is said, however, that while an express warranty of quality will exclude implied warranties of quality, yet an express warranty of quality will not exclude the implied warranty of title.

This case is distinguished in Wilcox v. Owens, 64 Ga. 601, which holds that a guaranty in the sale of fertilizer that the article comes up to a certain analysis does not expressly include, and hence does not exclude, the statutory warranty that it is merchantable and reasonably suited to the use intended, to wit, manuring land and increasing the crop, and it is said that this case differs from Jackson v. Langston, supra, because, in the latter case, by the terms of the warranty the fertilizer was guaranteed only as to the analysis of the state inspector, as evidenced by his brand on each and every package. The court said that this warranty was utterly inconsistent tion would thereafter lie against defendant for its breach.

At the close of the testimony, the trial court withdrew from the jury the issue upon the alleged express warranty, but submitted the case for a verdict upon the alleged breach of an implied warranty. On this question it instructed the jury in substance that if the machine was ordered for the purpose of resale, and at the time of such order plaintiff had no opportunity to inspect and ascertain the quality of such spreader, the law would imply a warranty that it was reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was designed, and was in a merchantable condition; and that if, on a reasonable trial, it proved to be materially defective in the respects named, plaintiff was entitled to recover his damages so sustained. The jury found for the plaintiff.

Stated in brief terms, the position of appellant is that, under the circumstances of this case, there was no implied warranty in the sale of the machine; or, if such implication did arise, it was fully satisfied and discharged when plaintiff had held it in possession a sufficient time for inspection of its quality and character before making a resale. Was there an implied warranty? We do not understand counsel to deny the proposition that, generally speaking, in an executory contract for sale of personal property when the thing sold is not present for inspection and delivery, or where a dealer undertakes to furnish an article to fill the order of one who buys for resale with any other warranty of its commercial value of fitness for the use intended.

f. Machinery, etc.

1. Implied warranty of fitness or suitability.

In Cuhy v. Nichols & S. Co. 33 Ky. L. Rep. 237, 109 S. W. 1190, the rule is stated generally that where there is an express warranty in the sale of machinery (engine and separator), there is no implied warranty. In this case, the contract contained a provision that the machinery was sold subject "to the following express warranty and agreement, and none other." The effect of this provision, however, was apparently not considered.

In McGraw v. Fletcher, 35 Mich. 104, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 98, the rule is stated that if there is an express warranty as to the working qualities of machinery, there is no implication that the machinery is fit for the purpose for which it was purchased.

In Reeves & Co. v. Byers, 155 Ind. 535, 58 N. E. 713, the court said that while it is true that when a machine or other article is sold for a particular purpose there is an implied warranty that it is reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was made and sold, yet this rule does not apply where there is an express warranty in writing, since, in such case, implied warranties are excluded.

For language to similar effect, see also Shirk v. Mitchell, 137 Ind. 185, 36 N. E. 850; Sullivan Machinery Co. v. Breeden, 40 Ind. App. 631, 82 N. E. 107.

In Conant v. National State Bank, 121 Ind. 323, 22 N. E. 250, the doctrine is asserted that a manufacturer of machinery, selling it to a person who he knows buys it for a special purpose, with the intention of putting it to a particular use, as a general rule, and in the absence of an express warranty, impliedly warrants that the machinery is reasonably fit for that purpose, and reasonably suited to that use; but the doctrine is also asserted that where the writing contains an express warranty, implied ones are excluded. It is 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) not clear, however, that the court, in asserting this latter doctrine, intended it as a limitation upon the doctrine subsequently asserted as to articles manufactured for a particular purpose.

In Georgia the doctrine is asserted that it is only in the absence of an express warranty as to the working qualities of a machine that resort can be had to an implied warranty that the machine is reasonably suited to the use intended. Johnson v. Latimer, 71 Ga. 470; Malsby v. Young, 104 Ga. 205, 30 S. E. 854; Moultrie Repair Co. v. Hill, 120 Ga. 730, 48 S. E. 143. Compare with Hawley Down Draft Furnace Co. v. Van Winkle Gin & Mach. Works, 4 Ga. App. 85, 60 S. E. 1008 (analyzed infra, III. c.).

Where a manufacturer furnishes a heating apparatus designed for heating a specific building, he impliedly warrants the sufficiency of the apparatus for the purpose intended. This implied warranty, however, cannot be availed of if the apparatus is sold upon an express warranty as to the temperature to which it will heat the rooms which it is designed to heat. White v. Gresham, 52 Ill. App. 399.

The existence of an implied warranty that an automatic governor should be suitable for the purposes of the buyer's plant is negated by the fact that the contract of purchase contained an express warranty of quality and also as to speed, and the governors were such as the seller in the ordinary course of his business manufactured for the general market, the general rule being that where an express warranty is made upon a sale, no other will be implied. Lombard Water-wheel Governor Co. v. Great Northern Paper Co. 101 Me. 114, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 180, 63 Atl. 555.

An express warranty that a concrete mixing machine could be operated by hand by two men, that it would discharge concrete in half-yard batches, and that it would work to the entire satisfaction of the purchaser, precludes an implied warranty that the machine was reasonably fit and suitable for the purpose for which it was or for any other known or specified use, a warranty is implied that it is of merchantable quality; and this is ordinarily held to mean or include an assurance that such article (if a product or manufacture) is well made, of good material, and reasonably well fitted for the uses for which it is constructed or furnished. Davis v. Sweeney, 75 Iowa, 45, 39 N. W. 1174; Russell v. Critchfield, 75 Iowa, 69, 39 N. W. 186; Blackmore v. Fairbanks, M. & Co. 79 Iowa, 282, 44 N. W. 548; Alpha Checkrower Co. v. Bradley, 105 Iowa, 537, 75 N. W. 369; Parsons Band Cutter & Self Feeder Co. v. Mallinger, 122 Iowa, 703, 98 N. W. 580; First Nat. Bank v. Dutcher, 128 Iowa, 413, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 142, 104 N. W. 497. In some states the rule may be somewhat narrower than is here stated, but it is too well settled in our own jurisdiction to admit of question. It is argued, however, that the terms of the written order are such as to exclude any implication of warranty. This position is grounded on the clause, "all goods subject to the warranties contained in the factory's catalogues and circulars." It is said, in substance, that here is an express written warranty which includes all the terms and liabilities which in any case could arise from an implied warranty, and therefore, under the rule of Bucy v. Pitts Agri. Works, 89 Iowa, 464, 56 N. W. 541, the implied warranty must be considered as merged in the writing, and the latter be taken as expressing the entire agreement. At the same time it is stren-intended and was purchased. John Turl's Sons v. Williams Engineering & Contracting Co. 136 App. Div. 710, 121 N. Y. Supp. 478.

So, an express warranty of workmanship and material of cream separators excludes an implied warranty of fitness. La Crosse Plow Co. v. Helgeson, 127 Wis. 622, 106 N. W. 1094.

Compare the doctrine of the foregoing cases with Aultman v. Hunter, 82 Mo. App. 632, which holds that an agreement to make a harvester and binder bind and do good work generally does not exclude an implied warranty that the binder is reasonably fit for the purpose intended. As to the theory of this decision, see infra, III. c. "where implied warranty relates to distinct and independent matter."

See also, to same effect, under the same heading, Bucy v. Pitts Agri. Works, 89 Iowa, 464, 56 N. W. 541, and Hawley Down Draft Furnace Co. v. Van Winkle Gin & Mach. Works, 4 Ga. App. 85, 60 S. E. 1008.

In International Pav. Co. v. Smith, B. & R. Mach. Co. 17 Mo. App. 264, the court conceded that there might be an implied warranty wholly independent of anything contemplated in the express warranty, if sustained by virtue of its own distinctive force. This exception, however, was held not to apply to an implied warranty which in itself formed an integral element of the express warranty, into which it merged and by which its effect was circumscribed. The express warranty in this case was that a boiler should stand a certain hydrostatic pressure to the square inch; the implied warranty insisted upon was that the article should be reasonably fit for the purpose intended, it being claimed that the boilers were so thin that it was impossible to use them.

2. Power, size, speed, quality, etc.

There is no implied warranty that engines and boilers will generate sufficient power successfully to work a plant in all its departments, and also furnish the necessary amount of steam to cook paper manufactured therein, where the contract of sale describes the kind, amount, and size of machinery to be furnished, and contains certain express warranties with respect to the capacity of the machinery. Buckstaff v. Russell, 25 C. C. A. 129, 49 U. S. App. 253, 79 Fed. 611, rehearing denied in 169 U. S. 737, 42 L. ed. 1216, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 940.

An express warranty of the size of a pump raises a conclusive presumption that other qualities requisite to its fitness for general use were not warranted, since an express warranty of one of the qualities of an article excludes any implied warranty of other qualities of a similar nature. Reynolds v. General Electric Co. 73 C. C. A. 23, 141 Fed. 551.

An express warranty of the working qualities of an elevator excludes an implied warranty as to the rate of speed. Yancey v. Warner Elevator Mfg. Co. 6 Ga. App. 125, 64 S. E. 663.

An express warranty that scales shall be accurate in weight and computation excludes an implied warranty with reference to the same matter. Stimpson Computing Scale Co. v. Taylor, 4 Ga. App. 567, 61 S. E. 1131.

A written warranty in the sale of grain drills, warranting them against breakage caused by manifest defects in material, etc., excludes all implied warranties of quality. Dowagiac Mfg. Co. v. Mahon, 13 N. D. 516, 101 N. W. 903.

g. Miscellaneous.

An express warranty as to the strength and quality of paper excludes an implied warranty that the paper is fit for a particular use. The idea that any additional warranty is expected or intended is repelled by the fact that the parties have chosen to make their own warranty on the subject in express terms. Dwight Bros. Paper Co. v. Western Paper Co. 114 Wis. 414, 90 N. W. 444.

Where in the sale of cans to a canning factory, to be used for canning purposes, uously insisted that the written warranty, so called, is not the agreement, representation, or warranty of the defendant, but of the "factory" which made the machine which was in no manner a party to the contract of sale in controversy, and is not a party to this action. This defense appears to us to be untenable. To give the clause referred to any reasonable construction or effect as an express warranty by any person would require us to say that the appellant thereby adopted as its own warranty the representations, if any, found in the publications of the manufacturer. It could not reasonably be said that the appellee was buying upon a warranty to him by the Richardson Manufacturing Company, for that company was a stranger to the transaction. If there be any warranty expressed in the writing, it must be that of the appellant, who alone was filling the order. But defendant denies that the language constituted an express warranty on its part, and, having succeeded in inducing the trial court to so hold, it cannot be permitted in this court to escape liability on the ground that its implied warranty has been merged in an express warranty which it never gave. Moreover, even if it should be held that this writing contains an express warranty, we are not prepared to say that it is such as excludes the idea of an implied warranty. Though such is not the universal holding, it is the rule in this state that a written contract of sale and written warranty do not necessarily deprive the

there is an express warranty of the quality of the cans, their nature, character, and the price to be paid upon failure thereof, and the conditions upon which such payments are to be made, such warranty excludes an implied warranty on the same subject-matter of quality. Wasatch Orchard Co. v. Morgan Canning Co. 32 Utah, 229, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 540, 89 Pac. 1009.

An express warranty of quality excludes an implied warranty that the articles sold were merchantable or fit for their intended use. It is the existence of the express warranty or its absence which determines the question. Thus, where there is an express warranty in terms that a quantity of varnish and drier should in quality be equal to similar goods furnished a designated person, and also according to a sample furnished at the time, which was delivered and accepted, no implied warranty of quality exists. DeWitt v. Berry, 134 U. S. 306, 33 L. ed. 896, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 536.

Compare with Alvin Fruit & Truck Assn. v. Hartman, 146 Mo. App. 155, 123 S. W. 957, which held that an express warranty that a carload of berries were fancy klondikes did not exclude the implied warranty that the berries were reasonably fit for shipment, where the seller knew they were being purchased for shipment. As to the doctrine of this decision, see infra, "where implied warranty relates to distinct and independent matter."

III. Exceptions to rule.

a. Where article to be manufactured.

As heretofore pointed out (II. a), to the general rule already considered, that an express warranty will exclude an implied warranty relating to the same general subject, there are many exceptions recognized and applied by the weight of authority. Considering the cases wherein the general rule is asserted in connection with the cases asserting exceptions thereto, the rule is apparently established by the great weight of authority that, while ordinarily an express warranty will exclude an implied warranty relating to the same general subject, yet, for this rule to apply, the character of the article warranted, as well as the express warranty relative thereto, must be such as to cover all implied warranties on the same subject, so that they are merged therein, or the warranty, considered with reference to the article warranted, must be of such a character as to preclude the supposition that the seller intended to assume any other obligation than that expressly assumed, or that the buyer was relying upon any other warranty than that expressly stated. Hence, by the weight of authority, the rule does not apply to sales by a manufacturer as to implied warranties that his product is free from latent defects arising from the process of manufacture, or that it is reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was manufactured, unless the express warranty specifically warranted the property as to its working qualities in such terms as to preclude the supposition that the manufacturer intended to warrant it to be reasonably fit for some particular purpose.

This question received able consideration in Carleton v. Lombard, A. & Co. 149 N. Y. 137, 43 N. E. 422, on rehearing, 149 N. Y. 601, 44 N. E. 1121. A distinction is here made between contracts for the sale of specific articles and executory contracts for the manufacture of some particular article. The court said that the rule that where parties to a contract of sale express in words the warranty by which they intend to be bound, no further warranty will be implied by law, but the express warranty will be deemed to include the whole obligation of the seller, applies to sales of specific existing chattels, and not ordinarily to sales of goods to be made or supplied upon the order of the buyer. It is not applicable to the obligation of a manufacturer who contracts for a sale of his own product, the condition of which he is presumed to know, and in such a case, whether the words of description are considered as warranties or as conditions precedent to any obligation on the part of the purchaser to take the property, there is an implied obligation that the commodity shall buyer of the benefit of an implied warranty. Bucy v. Pitts Agri. Works, supra; Alpha Checkrower Co. v. Bradley, 105 Iowa, 537, 75 N. W. 369; Ideal Heating Co. v. Kramer, 127 Iowa, 142, 102 N. W. 840. Our attention is directed to nothing in the writing which is inconsistent with the existence of an implied warranty.

It is further argued that plaintiff received and held the machine a sufficient length of time in which to inspect and reject it if found wanting, and cannot now be heard to claim a breach of the warranty. The record does not make a case for the application of the rule which counsel here invoke. It may be true (though that question is not now before us) that, had the alleged defects been of a patent character, or such as were readily observable from an ordinary inspection, a retention of the machine beyond a reasonable time for such casual inspection would be a waiver of the right to claim a breach of the warranty; but it certainly is not the rule that one who purchases with an implied warranty a piece of farm machinery like a threshing machine, a windmill, a harvester, a manure spreader, or other article the real character and quality of which can be determined only by a test of actual practical use, must lose the benefit of his warranty because he fails to discover concealed or latent defects until, in the ordinary course of business, he or his customers put the thing purchased to the use for which it is designed and sold. Indeed, we think the

be free from latent defects arising from the process of manufacture, or, as in this case, being the sale of oil, the process of refining, which could be guarded against by ordinary care so as to render it merchantable.

A warranty that machinery is to be made of good material, well constructed, and with proper use and management will do as good work as any other of the same size and rated capacity, etc., does not exclude the implied warranty under the sale of goods act, R. S. M. 1902, chap. 152, § 16, to the effect that, when there is a contract for a sale of goods by description, there is an implied condition that the goods shall correspond with the description, and that they shall be reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were purchased. North-West Thresher Co. v. Darrell, 15 Manitoba L. Rep. 553.

A postscript to a contract for installing furnaces in a steamboat, that the work shall pass government inspection, does not relieve the manufacturer from the implied warranty that the work will be properly performed and free from such defects as are only discoverable after use and trial. The Venezuela, 173 Fed. 834.

In a contract for the instalment of a heating apparatus, a warranty that all work is to be done in a good and workmanlike manner does not exclude the implied warranty arising where a seller undertakes to manufacture or construct the thing sold, that it will be fit for the contemplated use; neither is such implied warranty excluded by a provision in the contract that the same, when signed, shall fully express the agreement between the parties thereto. Ideal Heating Co. v. Kramer, 127 Iowa, 137, 102 N. W. 840.

An express warranty by a manufacturer, of the power of an engine and boiler to be manufactured for a given purpose, and that they should be in good order except from exposure to the weather, is not inconsistent with, and does not exclude, an implied warranty that the engine and boiler are fit for the purpose for which they were purchased. Blackmore v. Fairbanks, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

M. & Co. 79 Iowa, 282, 44 N. W. 548. And to the same effect see Boulware v. Victor Automobile Mfg. Co. infra.

But an express warranty that a gasoline engine should be of two and one half horse power, that it was made of good material and in a workmanlike manner, etc., excludes an implied warranty that the engine was fit and proper to run a newspaper plant, it being apparent that the express warranties were intended to embrace all the obligations assumed by the warrantor. Fairbanks, M. & Co. v. Baskett, 98 Mo. App. 53, 71 S. W. 1113. And see to the same effect, Hart Parr Co. v. Eberle, 3 Sask. L. R. 34, 13 West. Law Rep. (Can.) 263.

In Boothby v. Scales, 27 Wis. 626, it was held that a manufacturer of fanning mills, in selling the same for use, impliedly warranted that the mill was reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was manufactured and to which it was to be applied, and that, in an action on a note given for the purchase price, it was proper to submit the case to the jury on the defense by the purchaser of a breach of this implied warranty, as well as upon a breach of an alleged special warranty that the mill possessed the capacity set forth in a certain printed advertisement or post bill. In considering an alleged error on the part of the court in permitting the defendant to amend his pleadings so as to assert as a counterclaim the breach of this implied warranty, the plaintiff claiming that the amendment took him by surprise, and he was not prepared to meet the issue thereby raised, the court said that "it was obvious as to the implied warranty which it was the object of the amended answer to set up that the plaintiffs had all the testimony before the court and jury of which that issue was susceptible. They could rebut or disprove the implied warranty only by showing, either that they were not the manufacturers of the mill . . . or that there was a special agreement at the time of sale that the defendant should take the mill at his own risk, whether it would work well or answer the pur-duty of inspection upon receipt of the article purchased is applicable only to cases where the buyer undertakes to rescind his order, or to exercise the right to return the property to the seller. He may, if he so elect, rest upon his right to damages for breach of the warranty, and recoup therefor in an action against him for the purchase price, or he can maintain an independent action for damages, and in such proceeding it is immaterial that he did not inspect the article and ascertain the defects promptly upon its receipt. Bushman v. Taylor, 2 Ind. App. 12, 50 Am. St. Rep. 228, 28 N. E. 97; Brigg v. Hilton, 99 N. Y. 517, 52 Am. Rep. 63, 3 N. E. 51; Bonnell v. Jacobs, 36 Wis. 59.

pose for which it was intended or not." In Dwight Bros. Paper Co. v. Western Paper Co. 114 Wis. 414, 90 N. W. 444, the court, in referring to Boothby v. Scales, said that there was involved in that case no express warranty by written contract, and that the doctrine therein asserted relative to the right of a purchaser, in purchasing from the manufacturer of an article, to rely upon an implied warranty that it was fit for the purpose for which it was manufactured, did not apply where there was an express warranty of quality. And this seems to be the doctrine of Wisconsin.

The same rule is asserted and applied in J. I. Case Plow Works v. Niles & S. Co. 90 Wis. 590, 63 N. W. 1013, which holds the fact that limited warranties going to the question of suitability of wheels to be manufactured were expressed in the contract of sale by the strongest implication excludes and negatives the idea that it was intended that other or more comprehensive warranties should exist, and repels any implication of law to that effect.

See also Whitmore v. South Boston Iron Co. 2 Allen, 52, which holds that when a contract for the purchase of an article to be manufactured is in writing, and contains warranties of quality, no additional warranty, not expressed or implied by its terms, that the article is fit for a particular purpose, can be added by implication. The court said that such a warranty is excluded by the ordinary doctrine of construing contracts by adopting the fair import of the language which the parties have used.

In Forest City Ins. Co. v. Morgan, 22 Ill. App. 198, the court said that a warranty in an agreement to furnish and set up a steam boiler, as to the quality of the boiler, left no room for implications by law of a further warranty relative to the quality of the boiler.

An express warranty that machines to be manufactured shall be like the sample, and that the manufacturer, when called upon, shall make good any defects in workmanship or material, excludes any implied warranty of fitness for the purpose intended. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Again, it is urged that the damages which the plaintiff was permitted to recover were for his loss of a resale to Schwaller, and not the ordinary compensation allowable upon showing a breach of warranty, and this loss of a resale could have been avoided by him had he exercised reasonable diligence to ascertain the defects of the machine. It is true that plaintiff pleads the alleged loss of a resale of the machine and a consequent loss of profits; but he does more, and alleges that, by reason of its defective condition, the article was wholly unsalable, useless, and without value. The court, as was proper, instructed the jury that, if it found him entitled to a verdict, the measure of plaintiff's ed, the manufacturer having expressly refused to make an express warranty of fitness. Monroe v. Hickox, M. & H. Co. 144 Mich. 30, 107 N. W. 719.

b. Where article sold for retail purposes.

An exception to the general rule that an express warranty will preclude an implied warranty relating to the same general subject has also been asserted as to sales by manufacturers of articles for retail purposes. In such cases the manufacturer of articles, in selling same for retail, impliedly warrants that the article is reasonably fit for sale at retail and for the purpose for which it was manufactured, and this implied warranty is not excluded by express warranties relating to the quality of the articles sold.

Thus, a warranty in the sale of jewelry for retail, that any article failing to wear satisfactorily would be duplicated free if returned within five years, that such articles might be changed for new goods within twelve months from date of invoice, that the purchaser waived all right to claim failure of consideration, or that the goods were not like sample, or not according to order, unless he first exhausted the terms of the warranty in exchange, will not exclude the implied warranty that the articles shall be merchantable and reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were intended, such warranty arising whenever a manufacturer offers his goods for sale where the opportunity of inspection is not present before the purchase. Main v. Dearing, 73 Ark. 470, 84 S. W. 640.

An agreement in the sale of jewelry for retail purposes, that, if any of the articles are unsatisfactory, the seller will replace same, provided they are returned within a specified time, is not such a warranty as will exclude an implied warranty that the goods sold are reasonably fit for the retail trade. White v. Mercantile Jewelry Co. 6 Ga. App. 860, 65 S. E. 1075.

The rule that, if property is sold under a contract of express warranty, the terms recovery was the difference between the reasonable value of the machine had it been in a merchantable condition, as impliedly warranted, and its value in the actual condition in which it was delivered. The fact of an attempted resale was important only as showing plaintiff's conduct with reference to the machine, and the sufficiency of the efforts he had made to test its merchantability and fitness for the work it was designed to perform. His recovery was not simply the loss of a sale of the machine, but for its failure to fill the measure of the warranty on which it was sold to him.

Error is assigned upon the alleged refusal of the court to admit evidence of an expert witness as to the meaning of the phrase "all goods subject to warranties published in factory's catalogues and circulars." While it appears that the court at first sustained plaintiff's objections to this line of evidence, the transcript shows that it finally yielded to counsel's persistence, and admitted the very matter which this assignment of error assumes was excluded. In view of this record, it is not easy to understand just why the ruling is pressed upon our attention as reversible error.

We find no reason for interfering with the judgment below, and it is affirmed.

of which explicitly define the warranty actually made. the law of implied warranty has no application, does not apply to an agreement in the sale of jewelry for retail purposes, that, if the same does not prove satisfactory, it will be replaced by the vendor free of charge if returned within five years, and such an agreement does not prevent the raising of an implied warranty from the sale, that the articles are reasonably suited for the purposes for which they were bought, where the jewelry was worthless, and not fit for sale at retail trade. Elgin Jewelry Co. v. Estes, 122 Ga. 807, 50 S. E. 939.

c. Where implied warranty relates to distinct, independent matter.

A very similar exception to the general rule to those already considered, but which is stated in a somewhat different form, is the rule that an implied warranty wholly independent of the matters contemplated by the express warranty is not thereby excluded, although both warranties relate to the same general subject.

In Aultman v. Hunter, 82 Mo. App. 632, on this question, the court quoted with approval from International Pav. Co. v. Smith, B. & R. Mach. Co. 17 Mo. App. 264, to the effect that "the general rule denies an implied warranty as to any matter or particular which may be brought within the purview or intentment of the special warranty. But there may be an implied warranty so wholly independent of anything contemplated in the express warranty as to stand by virtue of its own distinctive force;" and added: "In other words, the two warranties may be so distinct and separate that both may stand at the same time, and both be enforced."

On the same point, in Boulware v. Victor Automobile Mfg. Co. 152 Mo. App. 567, 134 S. W. 7, the court said that an express warranty and an implied warranty may exist together where not inconsistent; that an express warranty, to exclude an implied warranty, must be of such a character as to make it apparent that the express warranty contains all the obligations assumed by the warrantor. This language was used 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) in sustaining an implied warranty in the sale of an automobile manufactured for the purchaser to the effect that the automobile would turn on the roads in the section where the buyer lived, although there was an express warranty relating to the general qualities of the machine and also that it was in perfect running order.

See also, Alvin Fruit & Truck Asso. v. Hartman, 146 Mo. App. 155, 123 S. W. 957, wherein the court remarked that an express warranty will not exclude an implied one upon other matters, but will as to matters which the former covers.

In Iowa, it is held that the rule that where there is an express warranty none will be implied does not extend to the exclusion of warranties implied by law where they are not excluded by the terms of the contract, and it is there asserted that the rule deducible from the authorities is that an implied and an express warranty may exist in the same contract if the express warranty does not relate to the obligation created by the implied; but when the express warranty does provide as to the same obligation, it excludes the implied. In other words, the law will not imply anything as to matters about which the parties have expressly agreed. Bucy v. Pitts Agri. Works, 89 Iowa, 464, 56 N. W. 541.

In Crankshaw v. Schweizer Mfg. Co. 1 Ga. App. 363, 58 S. E. 222, the court on this point said: "Not infrequently a mere shade of difference determines whether the issue calls for the application of the doctrine of implied warranty or excludes it. In many cases, in our experience, the line of demarcation was very dim, and we think there can be cases in which, as to different portions of even the same transaction, the law of express warranty will control so far as there has been express warranty without excluding the application of an implied warranty to other portions of the contract. We are aware that this statement seems contradictory, and is not in accord with the general view, for in Johnson v. Latimer, 71 Ga. 470, it was held that 'it is only in the absence of an express warranty that resort can be had to implied warranty, and where there was an express warranty, the court could refuse to charge on the subject of implied warranty. . . . This is an express holding that there can be no implied warranty if there is an express warranty. We yield to it as binding authority."

And see Hawley Down Draft Furnace Co. v. Van Winkle Gin & Mach. Works, 4 Ga. App. 85, 60 S. E. 1008, wherein it is asserted that the rule that an express warranty as to any feature of the sale excludes implied warranties does not go to the extent of excluding an implied warranty as to the working qualities of a machine unless the express warranty relates to the same thing; and that express warranties containing descriptive words of make, size, grade, quantity, etc., will not usually exclude an implied warranty that the article is merchantable and free from such inherent defects as render it worthless or not reasonably suited for the purpose for which such articles are designed and intended.

d. Where express warranty superadded for benefit of buyer.

Another exception to the general rule is that, where the express warranty, when considered with reference to the article to which it is applied, is of such a character as to indicate that it was merely superadded to the warranty implied by law for the benefit of the buyer, rather than as being the extent of the obligation assumed by the seller, the express warranty does not exclude the implied warranty. Mody v. Gregson, L. R. 4 Exch. 49, 38 L. J. Exch. N. S. 12, 19 L. T. N. S. 458, 17 Week. Rep. 176; Bigge v. Parkinson, 8 Jur. N. S. 1014, 7 Hurlst. & N. 955, 31 L. J. Exch. N. S. 301, 7 L. T. N. S. 92, 10 Week. Rep. 349; Drummond v. Van Ingen, L. R. 12 App. Cas. 284, 56 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 563, 57 L. T. N. S. 1, 36 Week. Rep. 20.

Thus, the doctrine that an express warranty excludes any implication does not apply to cases in which the express provision appears, on the true construction of the contract to have been superadded for the benefit of the buyer. Mody v. Gregson, L. R. 4 Exch. 53, 38 L. J. Exch. N. S. 12, 19 L. T. N. S. 458, 17 Week. Rep. 176.

This doctrine is also applied in Bigge v. Parkinson, supra, as to a guaranty that stores and provisions ordered for a foreign voyage should pass a certain inspection, as such warranty was said to be superadded to the implication raised by law from the fact that the seller knew the purpose for which the stores were purchased, that the same would be reasonably fit for that purpose, and that, hence, the two were not incompatible.

Applying the same rule, a warranty arising from a sale by sample does not exclude an implied warranty that the article shall be fit for the purpose for which such an article is ordinarily used. Drummond v. Van Ingen, supra.

e. Where contract contains special provisions affecting warranty.

1. Where application of express warranty is conditioned upon performance by buyer.

An express warranty does not exclude an implied warranty relating to the same general subject, where the contract of sale contains requirements the performance of which are conditions precedent to the application of the express warranty, and these requirements are not insisted upon by the seller, and are not performed by the buyer.

Thus, the implied warranty that a machine is adapted to the use intended, and that it will reasonably perform the service required, is not excluded by an express warranty as to the working qualities of the machine, which does not become of force or effect because, by the contract of sale, such warranty is conditional upon the payment of the purchase price of the machine, either by cash or note, before delivery, delivery being made without such requirement being insisted upon. Parsons Band Cutter & Self Feeder Co. v. Mallinger, 122 Iowa, 703, 98 N. W. 580.

Applying this doctrine in Alpha Check-rower Co. v. Bradley, 105 Iowa, 537, 75 N. W. 369, it was held that a warranty in the sale of corn cutters by manufacturer to retailer, that the same were well made and finished, did not exclude an implied warranty that the cutters were fit for the purpose for which they were intended.

So, where a contract for the sale of machinery provides that unless notes are given according to the terms thereof, the express warranty of quality contained therein shall be of no force and effect as against the seller, the law will then imply a warranty that the article is fit for the purpose intended, although ordinarily an express warranty will preclude an implied warranty on the same subject. Hansmann v. Pollard, — Minn. —, 129 N. W. 248.

2. Where contract provides against any other obligation than that expressly assumed.

The seller of an article may, by his contract of warranty, provide that no obligation other than that set forth in the contract and made part thereof shall be binding upon either party, and thus exclude any implied warranty that the article sold is fit for the purpose for which it was manufactured. Bagley v. General Fire Extinguisher Co. 80 C. C. A. 172, 150 Fed. 284.

But a provision in a contract for the sale of binding twine, that express warranties of quality will not be recognized unless approved by the seller in writing, does not exclude implied warranties of quality arising by virtue of a statutory provision applying to the sale of articles by the manufacturer thereof. Hooven & A. Co. v. Wirtz, 15 N. D. 477, 107 N. W. 1078. And see, to same effect, Ideal Heating Co. v. Kramer, 127 Iowa, 137, 102 N. W. 840.

So, a warranty of the quality and capacity of machinery (engine and separator) will exclude an implied warranty that the machinery is fit for the purpose for which it was purchased, and for which it was in fact worthless, where the allowance of the implied warranty would contravene the express terms of the contract relating to the remedy of the purchaser for breach of the warranty expressed in the contract. Boyer v. Neel, 50 Mo. App. 26. To the same effect is Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co. v. Bobbst, 56 Mo. App. 427. A. G. S.

GEORGE A. HORMEL & COMPANY,

AMERICAN BONDING COMPANY, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(112 Minn. 288, 128 N. W. 12.)

Guaranty insurance bond — construction.

1. The appellant executed a guaranty insurance bond to indemnify the respondent against loss from the failure of the principal in the bond to perform on his part the conditions of a building contract to which he and the respondent were parties. The contract reserved the right of the respondent

Headnotes by START, Ch. J.

Note. — Character of, and rules governing, contracts by corporations engaged for profit in business of guarantying the fidelity or contracts of other persons.

The overwhelming weight of authority supports the proposition that the rule of strictissimi juris, by which the rights of uncompensated sureties are determined, is not applicable to the contracts of surety companies, which make the matter of suretyship a business for profit; that their business is essentially that of insurance; and that therefore their rights and liabilities under their contracts will be governed by the laws of insurance. Hence, as declared in the above decision, if the contract of suretyship is ambiguous or fairly open to two constructions, it will be construed in favor of the assured. Guarantee Co. of N. A. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. 26 C. C. A. 146, 47 U. S. App. 91, 80 Fed. 766, affirming 68 Fed. 459, reversed on other grounds in 173 U. S. 582, 43 L. ed. 818, 19 Sup. Ct. ent to make changes in the work and order extras in writing, and provided that 15 per cent of the contract price should be retained until the work was completed, which was to be done within a time limited. The bond provided that the appellant should be notified of any breach of the contract or of any act on the part of the principal which might involve loss to the appellant, immediately after the knowledge thereof should come to the respondent. This is an action on the bond to recover the amount paid by the respondent to discharge liens upon the building arising from the failure of the principal to pay for labor and materials. Held:

While the bond in form resembles a contract of suretyship, it is in effect a contract of insurance, to which the rules of construction peculiar to contracts of suretyship proper do not apply, but to which the rules governing ordinary contracts of insurance are applicable.

Same — strictness — intent.

2. If a guaranty insurance bond is fairly open to two constructions, one of which will uphold and the other defeat the claim of the insured, that should be adopted which is most favorable to the insured; but the plain intention of the parties cannot be nullified by construction.

Same — release — noncompliance as to provision of building contract for extras.

3. Where a building contract, the performance of which is secured by a guaranty insurance bond, reserves the right to make changes in the work and order extras in writing without limit, the mere fact that such changes are made and extras ordered verbally, which are audited and allowed by the architect, does not release the bond.

Same — notice of default.

4. The provision of the bond for notice to be given the insurer of any default on the part of the principal which may result in loss, immediately after the insured has notice thereof, requires that it be given only within a reasonable time in view of all the circumstances. This is ordinarily a question of fact; but if the facts are undisputed, and only one reasonable conclusion can be drawn therefrom, it is the duty of the trial judge to instruct the jury accordingly.

Same — release — failure to give notice of default within reasonable time.

5. It conclusively appears from the undisputed facts in this case, which are stated in the opinion, that notice of the default of the principal was not given to the appellant within a reasonable time, and that thereby the bond was released.

App. 254, 72 Fed. 470, it was declared that if, looking at all its provisions, a bond insuring a bank against any fraud or dishonesty of its cashier was fairly and reasonably susceptible of two constructions, one favorable to the bank and the other to the surety company, the former, if consistent with the objects for which the bond was given, must be adopted, because the instrument was drawn by the attorneys, officers, or agents of the company. The court said: "The object of the bond in 83 L.R.A. (N.S.)

suit was to indemnify or insure the bank against loss arising from any act of fraud or dishonesty on the part of O'Brien in connection with his duties as cashier, or with the duties to which, in the employer's service, he might be subsequently appointed. And in United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Golden Pressed & Fire Brick Co. (United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. United States), 191 U. S. 416, 48 L. ed. 242, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 142, in which it was held that the extension of time for payment of a bill for materials furnished to the principal obligor by a third party did not, in the absence of any evidence of loss, thereby discharge a surety on a bond conditioned not only for the faithful performance of the original contract, but for the prompt payment of all persons supplying labor and materials, the court said: "The rule of strictissimi juris is a stringent one, and is liable at times to work a practical injustice. It is one which ought not to be extended to contracts not within the reason of the rule, particularly when the bond is underwritten by a corporation which has undertaken for a profit to insure the obligee against a failure of performance on the part of the principal obligor. Such a contract should be interpreted liberally in favor of the subcontractor, with a view of furthering the beneficial object of the statute. Of course, this rule would not extend to cases of fraud or unfair dealing on the part of a subcontractor, . . . or to cases not otherwise within the scope of the undertaking."

It was a question of law for the court as upon a consideration by a corporation organized to make the same for profit, that the rule of construction applicable to ordinary sureties was out of place, and that, such instruments being in the terms prescribed by the surety, any doubtful language therein should be construed most strongly against the surety, and in favor of the indemnity that the assured had reasonable ground to expect.

In Tebbets v. Mercantile Credit Guarantee Co. 19 C. C. A. 281, 38 U. S. App. 431, 73 Fed. 95, it was declared that cases holding that a surety was "a favorite of the law," and that a claim against him was strictissimi juris, had no application to a contract of indemnity against mercantile losses. The court said: "Corporations entering into contracts like the one at bar may call themselves 'guaranty' or 'surety' companies, but their business is in all essential particulars that of insurers, who, upon careful calculation of the risks of such business, and with such restrictions of their liability as may seem to them sufficient to make it safe, undertake to assure persons against loss, in return for premiums sufficiently high to make such business commercially profitable. Their contracts are, in fact, policies of insurance, and should be treated as such."

And in Carstairs v. American Bonding & T. Co. 54 C. C. A. 85, 116 Fed. 449, writ of certiorari denied in 187 U. S. 644, 47 L. ed. 346, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 844, it was declared to be quite true that the written contracts of indemnity issued by surety companies had come to be looked upon by the courts and to be treated more as policies of insurance than as bonds. The court said: "As contracts of indemnity, they will be liberally construed so as to effectuate the purpose for which they were issued, and as, like policies of insurance, they are generally prepared by the bonding company, the rule of contra proferentem will often be applied in construing their stipulations."

So, in American Bonding Co. v. Morrow, 80 Ark. 49, 117 Am. St. Rep. 72, 96 S. W. 613, it was declared to be now well settled that the bond of a surety company, "like any other insurance policy," was to be most strongly construed against the insurer, since its language was that selected and employed by the latter, and "when doubtful or ambiguous must be given the strongest interpretation against the insurer which it will reasonably bear."

In Lakeside Land Co. v. Empire State Surety Co. 105 Minn. 213, 117 N. W. 431, it was declared that it had become very well settled in the courts of the United States that the strict rule of construction was not applicable to bonds issued by surety companies, which, in the issuing thereof, furnished their own forms, and were presumed to be acting advisedly in the selection of the language used, and that therefore the intention of the parties would be ascertained by the rule applicable to insurance contracts. "When it fairly appears from the face of the contract what the parties intended, a strict construction of general statements or of particular clauses will not be indulged in to vary the evident purpose to be accomplished by the instrument."

And in Brandrup v. Empire State Surety Co. 111 Minn. 376, 127 N. W. 424, it was held that, a surety company being one who for hire executed fidelity bonds, which in their nature more nearly approached insurance policies than ordinary contracts guarantying the fulfillment by another of some obligation resting upon him, it "must be held to a stricter accountability for its own acts and conduct than would a surety who without consideration assumed a similar obligation."

And in Roark v. City Trust, S. D. & Surety Co. 130 Mo. App. 401, 110 S. W. 1, it was held that a contract of suretyship was "for all practical purposes a contract of insurance, and the contract must be governed and construed as an insurance policy."

drawn by such company, is to be construed most strongly against the company. . . . And no reason exists why the same rule should not apply to a bond surety company giving bond to secure employers against loss by dishonesty of employees."

And in Kansas City v. Davidson, — Mo. App. —, 133 S. W. 365, it was declared that sureties for hire were not favorites of the law, entitled to stand upon the strict terms of their obligations, but their status was rather that of insurers, and that their contracts should be reasonably construed to give effect to the protective purposes of their execution.

So, in Bank of Tarboro v. Fidelity & D. Co. 128 N. C. 366, 83 Am. St. Rep. 682, 38 S. E. 908, which was an action on a bond guarantying the fidelity of the plaintiff's cashier, the court declared that none of its members had ever seen or heard of a bond being tendered by a private surety in such a form as that sued on, and then went on to say: "In its very form and essence, the bond before us resembles an insurance contract, and differs materially from the ordinary forms coming down to us by immemorial usage. Therefore we must place such bonds in the general class of insurance policies, and construe them upon the same general principles; that is, most strongly against the company, and most favorably to their general intent and essential purpose. . . . The defendant has voluntarily become, by virtue of the statute, what may be called a 'common surety'; not exactly in the nature of a common carrier, like railroad and telegraph companies, but still one of those public agencies to which are given unusual powers, and which have assumed the most sacred responsibilities. Permitted by law to act as sole sureties for trustees, guardians, administrators, and other fiduciaries, they are held by the policy of the law to the full measure of the responsibility they have voluntarily assumed. They may make such reasonable regulations as are necessary for their own protection, or the proper transaction of their business; but such stipulations will be most strongly construed against a forfeiture of the indemnity for which alone the bond is given, and in favor of a fair and equitable construction of the essential purposes of the contract."

And in Bryant v. American Bonding Co. 77 Ohio St. 90, 82 N. E. 960, the court, in considering the construction of the contract before it, asked what its nature was. "Is it one simply of suretyship, one of those known as voluntary contracts, or is it rather one of the class issued for a money consideration and because of a desire for pecuniary gain? If the former, then it is one wherein the surety is regarded as a favorite of the law, and all doubtful questions to be resolved in his favor; if the latter, then he is regarded as an insurer, whose contract, being drawn by the surety himself, and for a money consideration, is, if ambiguity exists in the language, to be resolved most strongly against the surety."

And in Young v. American Bonding Co. 228 Pa. 373, 77 Atl. 623, it was said: "In all essential particulars the appellee here is an insurance company, and its obligation in this particular instance was that of an insurer. It was paid for its undertaking; the amount of its compensation being based on the calculation of risk assumed. The trend of all our modern decisions, Federal and state, is to distinguish between individual and corporate suretyship where the latter is an undertaking for money consideration by a company chartered for the conduct of such business. In the one case the rule of strictissimi juris prevails, as it always has; with respect to the other, because it is essentially an insurance against risk, underwritten for a money consideration by a corporation adopting such business for its own profit, the courts generally hold that such a company can be relieved from its obligation for suretyship only where a departure from the contract is shown to be a material variance."

In Walker v. Holtzclaw, 57 S. C. 459, 35 S. E. 754, it was held that while, as a general rule, a surety was a favorite of the law, and his contracts should be strictly construed in his favor, such rule had no application where the surety received compensation and the suretyship was in the line of his regular business.

And in Remington v. Fidelity & D. Co. 27 Wash. 429, 67 Pac. 989, it was held that fidelity bonds were in their nature insurance contracts, to indemnify the employer against the dishonesty of employees; that they were issued for profit, and therefore the same rules of construction should apply thereto as apply to other insurance contracts; and that if, looking at all its provisions, the contract was fairly susceptible of two constructions, one favorable and the other unfavorable to the insurance company, the latter, if consistent with the object of the contract, must be adopted, because the instrument was prepared by the attorneys, officers, or agents of the insurance company.

And in United American F. Ins. Co. v. American Bonding Co. — Wis. —, —L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 131 N. W. 994, which was an action upon a bond guarantying the fidelity of the plaintiff's employee, the court said: "The bond in question was an indemnity contract entered into by the defendant for a money consideration. It has all the essential features of an insurance contract, and should be subject to the rules of construction applicable to such contracts. . . . It being apparent that the bond sued on was prepared by the defendant, as to any ambiguity therein, the provisions, conditions, and exceptions of the bond which tend to work a forfeiture should be construed most strongly against the party preparing the contract."

But, as was said by Chief Justice Fuller in Guarantee Co. of N. A. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. 183 U. S. 402, 46 L. ed. 253, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124: "This rule cannot be availed of to refine away terms of a contract expressed with sufficient clearness to convey the plain meaning of the parties, and embodying requirements compliance with which is made the condition to liability thereon."

And in Granite Bldg. Co. v. Saville, 101 Va. 217, 43 S. E. 351, it was declared that, conceding that the contract of surety companies should be construed as insurance contracts and taken most strongly against the company issuing them, still, where their terms were clear and unambiguous, the principle invoked could not be availed of to refine away the terms of a contract deliberately entered into, and expressed with sufficient clearness to convey the plain meaning of the parties, and embodying requirements compliance with which was made the condition to liability thereon.

So, in United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Overstreet, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 248, 84 S. W. 764, it was declared that whether or not the rule that a surety was a favorite of the law, and that his contract should be construed strictly in his favor, applied to those who make it a business to become sureties for pay, or whether a contract in the latter case was to be construed as any other insurance contract, that is, most strongly against the insurer, still the obligation could not be extended beyond the plain meaning of its expressed terms.

In Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 99 Md. 423, 105 Am. St. Rep. 313, 58 Atl. 437, it was said that contracts of indemnity, like policies of fire insurance, to which they were closely analogous, though with which they were not strictly identical, must receive a reasonable construction so as to give effect to the intention of the parties, and so as to carry out, rather than defeat, the purpose for which they were executed. "They should neither, on the one hand, be so narrowly or technically interpreted as to frustrate their obvious design; nor, on the other hand, so loosely or inartificially as to relieve the obligor from a liability within the scope or spirit of their terms."

. . . The liability of an indemnitor is measured by the contract into which he enters, and it is never endangered by mere construction to include a term specifically excluded. Inasmuch as an indemnitor's liability is one dependent wholly upon the contract, it would be anomalous to hold that he is answerable under conditions directly contrary to the express stipulations of his undertaking. When he covenants to do not constitute a breach, even though at a later date they may develop into liens.

Farmers' & M. Bank v. Kercheval, 2 Mich. 515; Second Nat. Bank v. Gaylord, 34 Iowa, 246.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On October 28, 1908, the plaintiff, hereinafter referred to as the owner, entered into a written contract with J. W. Hilliard, hereinafter referred to as the contractor, whereby he was to erect at Duluth a cold storage warehouse for the owner, in accordance with the plans and specifications be bound provided certain antecedent conditions are complied with by the party indemnified, in the very nature of things, if those conditions are not fulfilled, his liability never becomes fixed. This is so elementary that we do not pause to cite authority in support of it. Giving to the bond of indemnity the most liberal construction contended for, treating it in point of fact as closely akin to a technical policy of insurance, we cannot understand how the indemnitor can be held accountable upon it, in the teeth of the explicit covenants that it should not be answerable unless designated provisions distinctly declared to be conditions precedent to the validity of the bond have been first complied with, when they have not been observed at all."

As intimated at the beginning of this note, the rule here discussed is not accepted by all the authorities. The supreme court of one jurisdiction has refused to follow it, and has declared that the rule of strictissimi juris, applicable to gratuitous sureties, should also govern contracts of suretyship entered into for hire by a surety company. In Lonergan v. San Antonio Loan & T. Co. 101 Tex. 63, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 304, 130 Am. St. Rep. 803, 104 S. W. 1061, the supreme court of Texas declared that it had been unable to discover a plausible ground for a distinction between the rights of a compensated and voluntary surety. The contract in suit was a bond guarantying the performance of a building contract, and the court said: "How it could be that receiving compensation by the surety would affect the relation between the surety on the bond and the owner of the building has not been suggested by counsel, and is not apparent to us. The well-established rule that material changes in the contract, made without the consent of the surety, will discharge him from liability, is based upon the clear and distinct ground that the surety's obligation is to answer for the contract as it is made, and a material change destroys that contract and substitutes a new one, for which the surety has not contracted to be responsible. Why should a compensated, any more than a voluntary, surety, be held to guarantee a contract to which he has not consented? The proposition antagonizes the fundamental requirement that, to make a valid contract, the minds of the contracting parties must meet and agree upon its terms."

And in American Surety Co. v. Koen, 49 Tex. Civ. App. 98, 107 S. W. 938, which was an action on a statutory appeal bond executed by a surety company, the court declared the general rule to be that such contracts should be strictly construed, and uncertainties and ambiguities be resolved in favor of the surety.

But in a later case in the Texas court of civil appeals, Griffin v. Zuber, 52 Tex. Civ. App. 288, 113 S. W. 961, the court thought the rule "correct" that where the language used was susceptible of more than one construction, that interpretation should be adopted which was most favorable to the party indemnified, upon the ground that the party issuing the same was engaged in the business of making such contracts for a consideration, and prepared the same and selected the language used therein. It may be added that the court said that there was nothing about the contract before it calling for the application of the rule. Lonergan v. San Antonio Loan & T. Co. supra, was not referred to.

And in American Surety Co. v. San Antonio Loan & T. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 98 S. W. 387, another court's statement of the prevailing rule was quoted apparently with approval, but the application of such rule was not necessary to the decision of the case. In any event, however, the two cases last cited can be deemed of little or no authority in Texas, at least, in view of the position taken by the supreme court upon this question.

There are some cases dealing with surety companies in which the language used, standing by itself, would seem to indicate an adherence to the old rule applicable to uncompensated sureties, but taking into consideration the fact that the circumstances of the cases did not call for a decision as to the applicability of either rule, and that the surety would have been dis-therefor, which were a part of the contract. The contract price was $19,500, in consideration of which the contractor undertook to furnish all materials, and perform all the labor for the erection of the warehouse, protect it from liens, and complete it by March 1, 1909. The other provisions of the contract, which are here material, are these: "No alterations shall be made in the work, except upon written order of the architects. . . . The owner reserves the right to make changes in the plans and specifications as may be necessary. If the alterations increase or decrease the cost, the contract price shall be increased or decreased in fair proportion. The architect is the arbiter of the amount, and it shall be fixed before the work proceeds. . . . Changes will not invalidate the contract, nor increase the time within which the work is to be completed, unless it can be shown that changes have caused delay. If extension of time is agreed to by the contractor and owner, the contractor is to notify the surety company. If the owner desires any extra work, it shall be on written order of the owner or architect. . . . Itemized bills for extras will be presented at the close of the week during which they are performed, and, if approved, paid at the next monthly payment day. . . . Monthly payment certificates for 85 per cent of the cost of the work performed and material delivered, which is to become a part of the permanent structure, shall be issued about the first of each calendar month by the architect or superintendent, on presentation by the contractor of a statement showing the cost of the materials and labor and the unwrought materials delivered. . . . The contractor will furnish a bond for 33½ per cent of the amount of his contract, to guarantee the faithful performance thereof. The surety company's terms are in no way to invalidate the terms of the contract between the parties thereto."

The appellant, hereinafter referred to as charged without regard thereto, the cases cannot be deemed much authority on either side of the question here offered for discussion.

In United States v. American Bonding & T. Co. 32 C. C. A. 420, 61 U. S. App. 584, 89 Fed. 925, it was held that when the rights of sureties were involved, they were bound only by the contract which they had signed, and had a right to look to a literal and strict construction of the same, and that their contract should not be extended by implication or as a consequence of what others might "do in matters in which they have no notice, and with which they are not connected."

And in American Bonding Co. v. Pueblo Investment Co. 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 557, 80 C. C. A. 97, 150 Fed. 17, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 357, it was held that a surety was never liable beyond the strict terms of his contract, that his obligation might not be extended by construction or implication, and that, on the other hand, it might not be reduced or destroyed thereby. "His agreement, like all other contracts, must have a rational construction, an interpretation which, while it carefully restricts his liability to that which he agreed to undertake, does not fail to hold him to that liability which, by the plain terms of his agreement, he promised to assume. Written language has the same significance, and its meaning must be ascertained by the same rules of law, when it is found in the contract of a surety as when it appears in other agreements."

And in State use of Howard County v. Hill, 88 Md. 111, 41 Atl. 61, an earlier case in the same jurisdiction, Archer v. State, 74 Md. 450, 28 Am. St. Rep. 261, 22 Atl. 8 (which was an action upon a bond, but whether such bond was signed by gratuitous sureties or by a surety company cannot be ascertained from the opinion), was quoted to the effect that the contract of a surety upon an official bond was subject to the strictest interpretation, that his obligation was strictissimi juris, and that nothing was to be taken by construction against him, and that his liability must be found within the terms of his obligation.

And in N. K. Fairbank Co. v. American Bonding & T. Co. 97 Mo. App. 205, 70 S. W. 1096, it was declared that the obligation of a surety was strictissimi juris, and that the law had begun early to deal tenderly with sureties out of consideration for the gratuity of the promises. The court said: "It is the law that a surety has the right to stand on the strict terms of his agreement, but what his agreement is, is to be determined by the same canons of interpretation applied to other contracts, without technical nicety or strained distinctions. . . . If this doctrine is applied to gratuitous sureties, it may certainly be applied to a company whose business is to become surety for hire. Appellant was paid to make this bond, and a plain liability arose on it which ought to be discharged."

And in Board of Education v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. — Mo. App. —, 134 S. W. 18, the court used the following language: "Though a surety is regarded as a favorite of the law, and the obligation of suretyship in its application to concrete facts is therefore considered strictissimi juris, the suretyship contract itself is nevertheless interpreted and construed in accord with the identical rules which obtain with respect to other undertakings. In other words, the terms employed in the obligation are to be given a reasonable interpretation, according to the intent of the parties as disclosed by the instrument read in the light of surrounding circumstances and the purposes for which it was made." See, however the other Missouri cases cited herein.

the surety company, gave the required bond, which contained the provisions, with others following: "The owner shall keep, do, and perform each and every, all and singular, the matters and things set forth and specified in said contract to be by the owner kept, done, and performed, exclusively at the times and in the manner as in said contract specified, provided said surety shall be notified in writing of any breach of said contract by said principal, or of any act on the part of said principal, or his agents or employees, which may involve a loss for which said surety may be liable hereunder, immediately after the occurrence of such act shall have come to the knowledge of said owner."

The contractor did not protect the warehouse from liens, and the owner was compelled to and did pay $7,615.95 in discharge of valid liens thereon, and thereupon brought this action in the district court of the county of St. Louis against the surety company on its bond to recover the amount so paid. The surety company answered to the effect that the bond was released, for the reasons that changes in the work were made and extras ordered orally, and not on the written order of the owner or architect; and that payments were made to the contractor in a manner not authorized by the contract; and, further, that immediate notice was not given to the surety company by the owner of the alleged failure of the contractor to complete the contract within the time limited, and to pay his bills for materials and labor. At the close of the evidence the surety company requested a directed verdict in its favor, for the alleged reason, in effect, that upon the evidence the owner was not entitled to recover. The motion was denied, the ruling excepted to, and the issues tendered by the answer submitted to the jury, with instructions, one of which was excepted to at any time. Verdict for the owner in the sum of $1,725.19. No motion for a new trial was made, but a motion was made for judgment in favor of the surety company notwithstanding the verdict, which was denied, and judgment entered upon the verdict, from which this appeal was taken.

The sole question for our decision is whether, upon the record as it stood at the close of the evidence, the surety company was, as a matter of law, entitled to a verdict in its favor. The answer to the question depends upon whether there was any evidence, taking the most favorable view of it for the owner, reasonably tending to show that it was entitled to a verdict in any amount. If there was not, then a verdict should have been directed as requested. If there was, then the requested instruction was rightly refused. The answer cannot be controlled in any respect by the instructions of the court to the jury in submitting to them the issues made by the pleadings; for the charge of the court as to either the law or facts, although not excepted to, is not the law of the case, as appellant claims. If the refusal to direct a verdict as requested was wrong, because there was no evidence to support any different verdict, the error could not be corrected by any charge which did not in effect grant the request. On the other hand, if there was such evidence, the ruling was correct, and no instructions in submitting the issues could make it erroneous. The charge, however, is entitled to consideration so far as it indicates the opinion of the learned trial judge as to the law and facts of the case.

In considering the question whether the surety company was entitled to a directed verdict for any of the reasons here urged, we must keep in view the character of contracts of suretyship of corporations organized for the purpose of engaging, for profit, in the business of guarantying the fidelity or contracts of a third party, and the rules of construction applicable to their contracts. While such contracts in form resemble those of suretyship, they are in effect contracts of insurance, to which the rules of construction peculiar to contracts of suretyship proper do not apply, but to which the rules governing ordinary insurance contracts are applicable. 32 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 307; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 452, §§ 174, 179, 208; Lake-side Land Co. v. Empire State Surety Co. 105 Minn. 213, 117 N. W. 431; Brandrup v. Empire State Surety Co. 111 Minn. 376, 127 N. W. 424. The rule of construction applicable to a contract of insurance, in cases where, as in this one, the legislature has not prescribed a standard policy, is settled, to the effect that if there is any ambiguity in the language of a condition, or it is fairly open to two constructions, one of which will uphold and the other defeat the claim of the insured, that should be adopted which is most favorable to the insured. The rule of strict construction against the insurer, and the liberal one in favor of the insured, must prevail under such circumstances. If, however, the terms of the contract be clear, and not fairly susceptible of two constructions, an ambiguity cannot be assumed and the plain intention of the parties nullified by construction. Loy v. Home Ins. Co. 24 Minn. 315, 31 Am. Rep. 346; American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 170 U. S. 133, 42 L. ed. 977, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 552.

1. This brings us to the first reason urged why it was error for the court not to direct a verdict for the defendant, namely, that the bond was released by a change in the contract by an unauthorized ordering of extras. The only basis for this claim found in the record is that changes were made in the work and extras ordered amounting in value to $1,804.39. Those ordered in writing amounted only to $442.80; but there was evidence tending to show that the whole thereof was audited and allowed by the architect before payment. The contract expressly reserved the right of the owner to make such changes and order extras without limit. In this respect this case differs from that of Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran Bethlehem Congregation v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 81 Minn. 33, 83 N. W. 487. The right to make changes and to order extras being expressly reserved by the contract, a failure to give a written order for them could in no event prejudice the insured or release the bond to any greater extent than the value of the extras ordered orally; for delay or increased risk, if any, due to the increase in the amount of work to be done, would be the same, whether or not the order was in writing. This seems to have been the view of the trial judge in denying the motion for a directed verdict, for the jury were instructed, in effect, that the owner could recover for payments for extras which were ordered orally. The evidence shows that, eliminating such payments, there would be at least a substantial balance which the owner was compelled to pay by the default of the contractor. It follows that the surety company was not entitled to a directed verdict for the first alleged reason urged, even if the construction of the trial court of the contract as to extras be accepted. It is not, however, necessary to rest this conclusion alone upon the consideration stated; for if a building contract, the performance of which by the contractor is secured by a bond of guaranty insurance, reserved the right of the owner to make changes in the work and order extras in writing without limitation, the mere fact that such changes are made and extras ordered verbally, but the architect audits and allows the amount thereof before payment does not release the insurer. Brandrup v. Empire State Surety Co. 111 Minn. 376, 127 N. W. 424; Smith v. Molleson, 148 N. Y. 241, 42 N. E. 669; Cowles v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 32 Wash. 120, 98 Am. St. Rep. 838, 72 Pac. 1032.

2. It is also urged that the surety company was entitled to an instructed verdict for the alleged reason that the owner made payments to the contractor in a manner not authorized by the contract; that is, the owner failed to retain 15 per cent of the cost of the work performed and materials delivered until the completion of the contract. The trial judge submitted to the jury the question whether the owner failed so to retain such percentage, and in case they found an overpayment, the amount thereof should be deducted from any amount the owner would otherwise be entitled to recover. It is evident that this instruction was given upon the basis that the question whether there was any overpayment during the progress of the work was made by the evidence a question of fact, and that if there was, it released the bond pro tanto only. It was held in the case of Simonson v. Grant, 36 Minn. 439, 31 N. W. 861, that such an overpayment would release the surety absolutely. That case, however, was not, as is this case, one of guaranty insurance, and the rule of strict construction was applied. It would seem to follow logically, from the rule of construction applicably to guaranty insurance, that any overpayment would release the surety company pro tanto only. However this may be, we are of the opinion that the question whether there was an overpayment was made one of fact by the evidence. The contract provided for the payment of 85 per cent of the cost of work performed and unwrought materials delivered. This provision, construed without reference to other provisions of the contract, would extend the 85 per cent to all work performed and materials furnished as extras. But the time and manner of payment for extras was specifically provided for by another clause of the contract, to the effect that they should be paid for at the next monthly payment day after they were furnished and approved. Therefore, in determining whether the evidence is conclusive that more than the 85 per cent was paid before the completion of the contract, the amount paid for extras must be excluded, and the fact kept in mind that payment of 85 per cent of the costs of work performed and unwrought materials delivered was authorized by the contract. Graves v. Merrill, 67 Minn. 463, 70 N. W. 562. The burden of establishing a breach of this condition of the contract was upon the surety company. Taking the most favorable permissive view of the evidence for the owner, it cannot be held as a matter of law that there were any overpayments made to the contractor during the progress of the work.

3. The last reason urged why the surety company was entitled to an instructed verdict is the alleged failure of the owner to give the surety company notice of the failure of the contractor to complete the contract within the time limited, and of his failure to pay bills for work and materials furnished. The bond provided that the owner should notify in writing the surety company of any breach of the contract by the contractor, or of any act on his part "which may involve a loss for which said surety may be liable hereunder, immediately after the occurrence of such act shall come to the knowledge of said owner." The object of requiring notice to be given of the contractor's default which may involve loss to enable the surety company seasonably to take such practicable action as might prevent or minimize loss by reason of the default, and it is not to be strictly construed for or against either party, but reasonably as to both. So construing it, it is clear that the provision for immediate notice does not require notice to be given instantly upon learning of the default, but that it should be given within a reasonable time in view of all the circumstances. Fidelity & D. Co. v. Courtney, 180 U. S. 342, 46 L. ed. 1193, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 833. The general rule is that the question of reasonable time is one of fact, and must be submitted to the jury with proper instructions; but when the facts are undisputed, and only one reasonable conclusion can be drawn therefrom, it is the duty of the trial judge to instruct the jury accordingly. Dunnell's Trial Book, § 206; Cochran v. Toher, 14 Minn. 385, Gil. 293; Roberts v. Mazeppa Mill Co. 30 Minn. 413, 15 N. W. 680; Warder v. Bowen, 31 Minn. 335, 17 N. W. 943.

Was the question in this case one of law? The answer depends upon a consideration of the undisputed evidence and admitted facts relevant thereto, which are, briefly stated, these: The work was to be completed by March 1, 1909. The general contract on that day was not entirely completed, as there remained work to the amount of $500 to be done, besides extra work done after that date amounting to over $1,400. On March 6th the contractor asked for an estimate of $3,500 to pay bills, which was allowed and paid to him on March 15th, but he used the amount to pay bills on other contracts on which the surety company had risks. On April 6th the contractor presented a bill for extras in the sum of $1,804.39, which was paid April 16th. On April 7th suit was brought against the contractor by a materialman to recover some $1,500, the value of materials which were furnished and used in the construction of the warehouse, and the owner was garnished. This was one of the claims for the payment of which an estimate was requested and allowed on March 6th. The owner, upon being garnished, at once communicated with the contractor with reference to the matter, who, on April 13th, replied to the effect that the claim made in the case in which the owner had been garnished was excessive in the sum of $400, and, further, that he would be cramped for money with which to meet his pay rolls and other obligations, and he would like to have the amount of the bill for extras paid. The owner also consulted a commercial agency, and received a favorable report as to the contractor's solvency. The bill for extras, $1,804.39, was paid April 16th. The owner, however, gave the surety company no notice of the default of the contractor until April 27th, at or about which date liens were filed against the warehouse, and the contractor went into bankruptcy. The trial court submitted to the jury the question whether this notice was given within reasonable time under all the circumstances.

The fact that the contract was not fully completed within the time limited, and no notice given, did not release the bond, for no claim for damages for failure to complete the warehouse on time is made by the owner against anyone. Lakeside Land Co. v. Empire State Surety Co. 105 Minn. 213, 117 N. W. 431. Nor was the bond released by the mere fact that the owner made payments to the contractor after it knew that he was not applying the money paid him under the contract to the payment of bills for labor and materials furnished for the warehouse, for it was bound to make payments as provided by the contract. American Surety Co. v. Waseca County, 77 Minn. 92, 79 N. W. 649. Such facts, however, are relevant and weighty in the consideration of the question whether the notice was given within a reasonable time under all the circumstances. The fact that the owner, upon being garnished, made an investigation, instead of giving the notice, is of special significance; for the very purpose of the notice was to enable the surety company to investigate, exercise its judgment, and take steps to avert the threatened loss. The owner could not speculate upon the probabilities of loss, but was bound to give the notice as required by the contract.

Upon a consideration of the undisputed evidence and admitted facts, we are of the opinion, and so hold, that it conclusively appears therefrom that the owner did not within a reasonable time give the surety company notice of the default and acts of the contractor to which we have referred, and that for this reason the surety company was entitled to a directed verdict. Therefore the judgment herein must be reversed, and the case remanded, with direction to the District Court to grant appellant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

So ordered.

Note. — Liability of municipal corporations for injuries through unsafe conditions in parks or other public grounds other than streets.

The weight of authority supports the fundamental proposition of law upon which the decision in BISBING v. ASBURY PARK rests, that a municipality maintaining public parks is discharging a public duty, and is not performing a private, corporate function for its own advantage.

A leading case upon this subject is Blair v. Granger, 24 R. I. 17, 51 Atl. 1042, in which it was held that where the place of injury was a public park, a municipal corporation would not be liable, in the absence of a statute, for omissions or neglect in the performance of a corporate duty imposed upon it by law, or for that of its servants engaged therein, where such corporation derived no benefit therefrom in its corporate capacity. The court said: "The city of Providence, for aught that appears, seems to have been in the discharge of a governmental power, engaged in the performance of a public service, in which it had no particular interest, and from which it derived no special benefit or advantage in its corporate capacity, but which it is bound to see performed in pursuance of a duty imposed by law for the general welfare of the inhabitants, or of the community; that the members of the park department, like those of the fire department, although appointed by the city corporation, are not, when acting in the discharge of their duties, servants or agents in the employment of the city, for whose conduct the city can be held liable; but they act rather as public officers, or officers of the city, charged with a public service, for whose negligence or misconduct in the discharge of official duty no action will lie against the city, unless expressly given; and hence the maxim respondet superior has no application."

And in Park Comrs. v. Prinz, 127 Ky. 460, 105 S. W. 948, which was an action to recover for injuries alleged to be caused by the negligence of the board's employees, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

rented parts of the public lands, or connected therewith, the negligence of the public authorities in permitting such condition to exist will not render such municipality liable to respond to the suit of one of the general public injured in consequence thereof.

(November 14, 1910.)

ERROR to the Monmouth County Circuit of the Supreme Court to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's servants. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

it was declared that parks were essentially public places established for purely public purposes, and that an action would not lie against a municipality for the neglect of a public duty imposed for the benefit of the public, or for mere personal tort or negligence of any of its officers or agents in the performance of such public duties.

And in Clark v. Waltham, 128 Mass. 567, the court refused to hold a town liable for injuries occasioned a traveler by a defect in a public common, upon the ground that, though it was alleged that the town negligently suffered a dangerous place to exist in the park, and failed to give proper notice to persons using the same, it did not hold the park for its own profit or emolument, but for the direct and immediate use of the public.

And in Steele v. Boston, 128 Mass. 583, recovery was refused for injury to a person on Boston Common by colliding with a sled on one of the paths there upon which the city permitted coasting, where the city held the common for the public benefit, and not for its own emolument or as a source of revenue, and had constructed and kept in repair the paths as a part of the common for the comfort and recreation of the public, and not as a part of its system of highways or streets.

And in Russell v. Tacoma, 8 Wash. 156, 40 Am. St. Rep. 895, 35 Pac. 605, it was held that a city was not liable for injuries occasioned by the negligence of its officers or employees while engaged in the improvement of a park. The court declared that the city in improving the park was exercising a power or franchise conferred upon it for the public good, and not for private corporate advantage.

In McGraw v. District of Columbia, 3 App. D. C. 405, 25 L.R.A. 691, in which recovery was denied for the death of a boy from drowning while swimming at a public bathing beach, it was declared that a municipality required by statute to establish and maintain a free bathing beach could not be held responsible for its safety, and the safe use of it by those likely to have recourse to it, in the same manner

Messrs. Patterson & Rhome for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Durand, Ivins, & Carton, for defendant in error:

The defendant owed plaintiff a duty with respect to this land, because it was used, devoted, and appropriated for purposes of pecuniary profit or special advantage to the defendant, as distinguished from the duty imposed upon defendant as a public instrumentality of the state without pecuniary or other special advantage to the defendant city.

A municipal corporation in its private character as the owner, lessee, or controller of lands, houses, public docks, piers, water and gas works, etc., is to be regarded in the same light as an individual, and dealt with accordingly.

as streets and highways, where to be rendered safe, or even as parks and grounds kept for entertainment and amusement, without direct profit or advantage to the municipality, might have to be maintained in a condition of safety. But the court made no attempt to discuss municipal liability as to parks or grounds kept for entertainment and amusement.

On the other hand, in Denver v. Spencer, 34 Colo. 270, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 147, 114 Am. St. Rep. 158, 82 Pac. 590, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1042, it was held that a city would be liable for the negligent acts of its park commission in erecting a stand in a park for the convenience of the public so insecurely that it collapsed under the weight of the persons using it. The court declared that no authorities need be cited to the proposition that the parks were the private and exclusive property of the city, in which the state, as distinguished from the municipality, had no property interest whatever.

And in Bloom v. Newark, 3 Ohio N. P. N. S. 480, a city was held to be liable for an assault committed by a care taker in a public park while acting in the line of his duty, upon the ground that the city, in maintaining and caring for a park, was exercising a private corporate function.

In the following cases, in which judgment was had against municipalities upon the merits, no reference was made to the question offered for discussion in this note, it apparently being assumed that municipalities would be liable for their negligence 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) in maintaining parks and other public grounds:

In Weber v. Harrisburg, 216 Pa. 117, 64 Atl. 905, a city was held liable for injuries caused by the plaintiff's falling over an iron cable stretched across a path along a river front which had long been used as a public park under the control of the city, and also as a public landing place, upon the ground that it was the city's duty to see that the path was kept in a safe condition for public use.

That a municipality is charged with the duty of keeping its public grounds in a safe condition seems also to have been the ground for the decision in Barthold v. Philadelphia, 154 Pa. 109, 26 Atl. 304, in which a city was held liable for the death of a boy eleven years old caused by drowning in an open well acquired by the city for the purpose of adding it to a park, the court treating the land as "public grounds," though not formally thrown open to the public.

So, in Silverman v. New York, 114 N. Y. Supp. 59, recovery was allowed against a city for injuries occasioned by one of its employees driving a wagon used for removing rubbish from the park over the plaintiff's foot while he was seated on a bench in the park.

And in Lowe v. Salt Lake City, 13 Utah, 91, 57 Am. St. Rep. 708, 44 Pac. 1050, recovery was allowed against a city for injuries received by the plaintiff's straying from a path and falling into an unguarded and unlighted hatchway, while undertaking to cross, at night, the back yard of the city hall, while legally on the premises as a legislator.

In Roullier v. Magog, Rap. Jud. Quebec 37 C. S. 248, recovery was allowed against a municipal corporation for the death of a child drowned in a reservoir maintained by the city near a street, it appearing that defendant permitted the public, and particularly children to play upon the land.

On the other hand, in the following cases recovery was denied against defendant municipalities upon the merits, also without considering the question here under discussion:

In Sheehan v. Boston, 171 Mass. 296, 50 N. E. 543, recovery was refused against a city for injury occasioned to a person who, in violation of an ordinance of the city, and aware that the public were warned to keep off, walked across the grass in a public park, and fell into an unguarded trench which had been dug by the city for the purpose of laying a water pipe.

In Carey v. Kansas City, 187 Mo. 715, 70 L.R.A. 65, 86 S. W. 438, a city was held not liable for the death of a child eleven years old, who was drowned in the city's water supply reservoir, situated in a public park, it appearing that the city had so constructed a 4-foot fence around the reservoir that children had to remove their shoes to climb it, and that deceased had climbed the fence notwithstanding the fact that he had been warned by public watchmen not to go inside the inclosure, and had been driven out of it.

In O'Rourke v. New York, 17 App. Div. 349, 45 N. Y. Supp. 261, recovery was refused against a municipality for injuries to one who, walking briskly upon a path at night talking to a companion, did not observe, and fell down, properly constructed steps in the path, which were not lighted by artificial light, upon the ground that no legal duty was imposed upon the municipality to light up its walks in the park so that the attention of the people would necessarily be called to irregularities, like the steps in question, that might be found in different parts of the park.

In Platt v. New York, 8 Misc. 409, 28 N. Y. Supp. 672, in which it appeared that the city had constructed a fence separating a bridle path from a foot path, recovery was refused for injuries received by a horseman who went on the foot path at night, and was injured by his horse falling over such fence.

Cases like Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489, 3 Am. Rep. 485, which is set forth in BISBING v. ASHBURY PARK, will be found collected in the note to Columbia Finance & T. Co. v. Louisville, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 88, on municipal liability for tort in connection with municipal buildings, since the decisions in such cases went off upon the nature of the buildings on the grounds, though the injury complained of occurred on public grounds.

Voorhees, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error removes a judgment entered for the plaintiff in Monmouth county circuit court, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff, alleged to be in consequence of the negligence of the servants and agents of the city of Asbury Park. The case was tried before the court without a jury. It appeared that on the evening of the 30th day of August, 1906, the plaintiff was at a carnival or celebration in progress in the streets of the city of Asbury Park, and, for the purpose of viewing the pageant, had gone upon the board walk extending along the ocean, between 7 and 8 o'clock, and walked up to about Seventh avenue, and then turned to retrace her steps. The crowd was then "immense," as she expresses it, making it very difficult to walk, so she decided to leave the board walk, and, when near the corner of Second avenue, turned into a narrower brick walk, some 22 feet in width, leading at right angles into Ocean avenue. North of this brick walk or way were located a group of bath houses, and on the south side of it was a grass plot, on the same level with the walk. In the grass plot, about 2½ feet southerly from the walk, there was maintained by the city an upright water pipe 3 or 4 inches in height, and a lateral pipe which, near the upright pipe, was exposed; there being a hole or depression in the ground about 6 inches deep, and some 2 feet in diameter.

The plaintiff thus describes the accident: "I hadn't gone very far before I felt my foot go in that hole. I caught it. It seemed to catch between something and threw me to the ground." She also testified that there was so great a crowd that she and her sisters, who were with her, could not walk together, but were making their way through it as best they could, and that there were just as many people on the grass as on the walk, and she did not realize that she was walking on the grass. The grounds were illuminated by electric lights. There was no railing or other barrier separating the cross walk from the grass plot, and no inclosure or protection about the pipes. The defendant's negligence is thus set forth in the declaration: "That the defendant, a municipal corporation, was clothed with the powers and subject to the duty by and through its public grounds commission, among other things, of keeping sound, safe, and serviceable for public use all the parks and public places, except the streets and avenues in said city of Asbury Park, and particularly the public place known as the beach front, lying east of Ocean avenue. . . . Yet the defendant did not keep said public place known as the beach front . . . sound, safe, and serviceable for public use and travel," etc.

It is not controverted, and could not well be under the law as expounded in this state since the year 1840, that, in the absence of statute, an action will not lie against a municipal corporation at the instance of an individual who has sustained special damage in consequence of the neglect of such corporation in the performance of a public duty. Sussex County v. Strader, 18 N. J. L. 108, 35 Am. Dec. 530; Livermore v. Camden County, 29 N. J. L. 245, affirmed in 31 N. J. L. 507; Pray v. Jersey City, 32 N. J. L. 394; Wild v. Paterson, 47 N. J. L. 406, 1 Atl. 490; Carter v. Rahway, 55 N. J. L. 177, 26 Atl. 96, affirmed in 57 N. J. L. 196, 30 Atl. 863; Paterson v. Erie R. Co. 78 N. J. L. 592, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 209, 75 Atl. 922. The plaintiff, however, seeks to bring herself within an exception to this general rule, and argues that the negligent act was committed by the city, not in the discharge of a strictly public duty, but while holding and dealing with the property whereon the neglected dangerous condition existed, as its own and for its own benefit, by receiving income therefrom, just as a private owner would lease his property and receive the rents therefrom. It is contended by the plaintiff that when a municipal corporation so deals with its property,—that is, as its own, as distinguished from the property which it holds strictly for public benefit,—the law discriminates between negligent acts done in the discharge of a public duty, wherein no liability to the corporation will attach, and acts done not in the performance of a public function, but in what has been called, by way of distinction and for lack of a better designation, its private capacity, for which an action may be maintained against the municipality.

The principle here invoked has authority in several well-considered cases, among which are Bailey v. New York, 3 Hill, 531, 38 Am. Dec. 669; Western Sav. Fund Soc. v. Philadelphia, 31 Pa. 185; Scott v. Manchester, 3 Hurlst. & N. 204, 26 L. J. Exch. N. S. 406, 3 Jur. N. S. 590, 5 Week. Rep. 598; Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489, 3 Am. Rep. 485; and Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332. In the last-cited case the opinion by Chief Justice Gray is most instructive, and in it he has collected and critically reviewed all the cases, both English and American, on the subject of public liability for negligent acts. The exception above urged finds some recognition in passing allusions to it in at least two cases in our supreme court. Pray v. Jersey City, supra, and Jersey City v. Kiernan, 50 N. J. L. 246, 13 Atl. 170.

In order to apply this distinction to the present case, the plaintiff has shown that the accident occurred upon lands acquired by the city of Asbury Park by purchase from James A. Bradley by deed of April 4, 1903. This deed conveyed a strip of land bordering on the ocean, together with the board walk, piers, pavilions, etc. The city was enabled to accept the conveyance and acquire the property by virtue of an act of the legislature of 1900, entitled "An Act to Authorize Cities Bordering on the Atlantic Ocean to Purchase the Lands in Any Such City Bordering on the Ocean, and Adjacent Lands Thereto in Such City, for Public Purposes, and to Improve the Same, and to Issue Bonds for Such Purposes." P. L. 1900, p. 285, and the several amendments to said act, passed in 1902 and 1904 (P. L. 1902, p. 805; P. L. 1904, p. 199). The city in the deed covenanted that the lands were to be used by the city for the purposes set forth in the act, and for such other purposes and uses as might be then or thereafter authorized by law.

An examination and construction of the enabling act are necessary, not only to characterize the lands thus acquired, but as well to determine whether the neglect of the municipal agents arose by the nonperformance of a public duty. The 1st section of the act authorizes the acquisition by purchase or condemnation of lands bordering on the ocean, for "public purposes and for places of resort for public health and for recreation, and to improve the same." A bond issue is sanctioned to provide the funds. By the 2d section the city is required, after acquiring such lands, to establish a "public grounds commission" consisting of three commissioners with three years' terms, to be appointed by the mayor and confirmed by the governing body, to serve without compensation. This commission, by § 3, is given the entire supervision and control of all parks and public places in the city, except the streets and avenues, including all lands then owned by the city or thereafter to be acquired for the purposes mentioned in the act; also full power to erect public buildings on the grounds, and to make and direct all improvements, alterations, repairs, and expenditures upon and on account of said parks, places, and lands. The 4th section of the act deals with the defraying of the expenses of maintenance, and the construction of buildings, roadways, and walks, the paying of the principal and interest of the bonds, and the expense of the general improvement of said public parks and places of public resort. The commissioners are then given power to set apart one or more places or pavilions for holding concerts and entertainments to which an admission fee may be charged. They are also authorized to operate the bathing grounds and bath houses in the event of their inability to rent the same, and until they may be able to do so, in order to prevent great public inconvenience and loss to the city. They may also lease any part of the property so acquired for any special term, not exceeding three years, for any purpose not inconsistent with the laws governing the city, which may seem proper for the improvement of the same. They may also rent spaces for the erection of a pier or piers, with the consent of the council. These rentals are then directed to be applied in the payment of the operating expenses and necessary repairs and improvements in said public parks, and the balance applied to the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds.

The principle underlying the exemption in favor of a municipality is rested upon the fact that the duty is owed to the public, the neglect of which forms the basis of the action, although such neglect may be injurious in varying degrees to every individual composing the public. Where, however, the duty is specifically owed to an individual, such individual has a right of action whenever the breach of that duty has occasioned injury to him. This is made clear by an examination of the opinion by the late Chief Justice Beasley in Jersey City v. Kiernan, supra. Therefore, in order to decide whether the present action is maintainable against the city, it must first be determined whether the neglect properly to guard the water pipe which caused the injury was a duty owed to the public. Aside from the fact that the dangerous condition existed not in a public way, but upon a grass plot evidently not intended to be walked over (which I think, under the circumstances, it is not necessary to discuss, for the case has not been tried on that theory), it cannot be doubted that the duty owed was a public duty.

I say "public duty" because the lands were originally acquired under the conveyance and by specific legislative sanction for public purposes, and for a place of resort for public health and recreation. The commissioners were public appointive officers, serving without compensation, and under their control were placed, not only the particular lands acquired by the Bradley conveyance, but all the parks and public places in the city, except the streets and avenues. Nor is it argued or seriously contended that the brick way, in proximity to which the dangerous condition existed, was not a public way, and free for all citizens to pass and repass. The only difference between that and the ordinary streets and avenues is the fact that it existed within the confines of the public park. It cannot be doubted that the act was designed primarily to create a public park, and that, in establishing a public commission to serve without emolument, to care for it, as well as for all other public places in the city, it created public officers whose acts in so doing are public acts exercised for the benefit of the general public. I conclude therefore that thus far there is no difference to be noted between an action brought by an individual to recover damages sustained for the nonrepair of the ordinary public street, and the circumstances surrounding the present action.

But it also appears in the case, that upon the lands so acquired under the Bradley deed, there were "constructed piers, pavilions, bath houses, a restaurant, soda water stands, novelty stands, confectionery stands, cigar stands, and other buildings owned by the city, and from which the city, by way of rents, admissions, charges, and bathing privileges, derived a revenue." It as well also was in receipt of a revenue from ground rents for portions of said grounds, for rolling chair privileges, weighing machines, telescopes, and charges for the privilege of going to a place of landing of a sailing yacht. By reason of the income from these buildings and from the privileges granted by the commission, the city became liable, it is said, for the negligence of its servants in not using due care to keep safe all parts of the lands upon which they were erected, inasmuch as the board walk leads to all of said buildings, attractions, and privileges, and the brick cross walk was one of the principal walks whereby the board walk was reached from Ocean avenue. Hence, the insistence is that the defendant was managing and dealing with this whole property as a private owner would, and that it was held by the city for its own advantage and profit.

Has the plaintiff brought herself within the exception thus invoked? As before in-dedicated, the primary object of the purchase, and of the act permitting it, was to acquire lands for public or park purposes for public resort. The construction of a board walk along the ocean, of the walks leading to it through the several grass plots, most appropriate to make it attractive for public resort and preserve its park-like appearance, the installation of the very water pipe (an appliance designed and used, not for private gain, but for sprinkling the grass and public ways) in consequence of which the accident occurred, all indicate the public character of the place, and the effort to carry into effect this most obvious purpose of the act.

Now, the right to lease and accept rentals from the land was not an unlimited right in the public ground commission. They had powers to set apart one or more places for pavilions, not the whole of the lands. They had power over the bathing grounds, and might take charge of the bath houses until they could be rented, referring also to a part only of the lands purchased. They might lease any part of the property so acquired, not the whole of it. It must be here mentioned that to the jurisdiction of this commission were committed, not only the Bradley tract, but also all the parks and public places in the city (except the streets) then owned by the city or thereafter to be acquired. Therefore the privilege of leasing any part of the property, it would seem, was not confined, under the act, to the specific lands conveyed by the Bradley deed, but extended to all the lands over which the commission had control.

It would not be seriously contended that a dangerous condition existing in a park territorially disconnected with the Bradley lands would visit liability upon the city because of the rental derived from buildings located upon the Bradley tract, or vice versa. If not, then, if the plaintiff's insistence be correct, it must be because the dangerous condition existed within the confines of the Bradley tract, upon some parts of which, specially set apart and rented, were located the income-producing structures, thus making the mere territorial boundaries of the whole purchase a magic inclosure to visit liability upon the public. Nor would it be reasonable to assert that because a city street led to another upon which a rented building was located, this circumstance laid the foundation for recovery because of the dangerous condition of the former street.

It is perfectly apparent that the condition was in no wise consequent upon the renting, that it arose quite independently thereof, and upon lands which, under the powers granted by the act, have been reserved from the leased portions of the tract, or, more properly speaking, that the rented portions had been set apart from the public park. Nor did the condition result from any act performed or omitted in connection with the properties thus separated and rented.

In Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489, 3 Am. Rep. 485, the plaintiff was walking in a footpath within the public common in the city of Worcester, and fell into an excavation which had been caused in the course of the reparation of a building standing in the common, which the city had leased and was receiving rent for. The court said: "If, in the course of repairing this building, the servants and agents of the city negligently suffered the adjoining land within its control to be in a dangerous condition, . . . the city was responsible." It will be perceived that the negligence there grew out of the control of the property actually in use by the city in its private capacity. It arose directly from the management of the rented premises, a condition of affairs clearly distinguishable from this case.

Neither the grass plot nor the way upon which it bordered produced revenue to the city. They still remained to serve the public uses humanely and beneficently made possible by the lawgivers, to promote the health and recreation of all citizens. In keeping up the public grounds, the agents of the city were fulfilling a corporate duty imposed by law, from which the city derived no benefit in its corporate capacity. This was a governmental act, and not the exercise of a power conferred for its own benefit. Curran v. Boston, 151 Mass. 505, 8 L.R.A. 243, 21 Am. St. Rep. 465, 24 N. E. 781; Moffitt v. Asheville, 103 N. C. 237, 14 Am. St. Rep. 810, 9 S. E. 695.

Where a dangerous condition exists in a public park or way, in a portion thereof not leased, the power to rent portions only of such public lands having been conferred by statute, such condition not arising from or in consequence of the management or control of the municipality over the rented parts of the public lands, or connected therewith, the negligence of the public authorities in permitting such condition to exist will not render such municipality liable to respond to the suit of one of the general public injured in consequence thereof.

The judgment will be reversed, to the end that a venire de novo may be awarded.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA EX REL.
J. H. KERR et al.

v.

ISAAC HICKS et al., Appts.

(154 N. C. 265, 70 S. E. 468.)

Religious society — special meeting — attempted call — validity.

1. A voluntary religious association consisting of an annual meeting of delegates from constituted churches, whose constitution provides only for a yearly meeting, the place of which shall be designated at the prior meeting, has no authority to call special meetings or change the place of the annual meeting after it has been fixed and the regular annual meeting adjourned, and an attempt to do so by the majority members will be ineffectual as against the acts of the minority assembling at the regular time and place fixed.

Same — rival trustees — authority.

2. Trustees of a school maintained by a voluntary religious association, appointed by a minority at a meeting regularly called in accordance with the constitution of the association, are entitled to act as against those appointed by a special meeting of the majority, for which there is no provision in the constitution.

Parties — intervention — trustees — real parties in interest.

3. The trustees selected for a sectarian school by a regular meeting of the religious body controlling it may be permitted to become parties to a suit by the state against rival trustees, to determine who was entitled to administer the school.

Appeal — refusal to dismiss — separate review.

4. No appeal lies from an order refusing to dismiss an action brought by the state to determine which of two sets of trustees is entitled to administer a sectarian school, but the entry of appeal may be treated as an exception upon appeal from the final judgment.

Action — amendment — change of parties — necessity of dismissal.

5. It is no ground for dismissal of an action brought by the state against parties claiming to be trustees of a sectarian school, to determine who is entitled to administer the school, that the trustees having the right to the property are admitted as parties by amendment, and that the state solicitor still remains a party, since the rights of the parties may be adjudicated without the necessity of bringing a new action.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1871 a voluntary association known as "Shiloh Association" was formed by several missionary Baptist churches for colored people. In 1883 the association purchased land for $2,500, and established a school called Shiloh Institute. Said school was chartered (Priv. Laws 1891, chap. 321), the aforesaid association procuring the charter and naming the trustees. The charter was amended (Priv. Laws 1903, chap. 49). In August, 1907, the association was composed of fifty-eight churches. At the annual meeting held at that time, the Church of Blessed Hope at Henderson was named as the place for the next meeting of the association. But, subsequently, the officers of the association called an extra session to be held at Manson, December 27, 1907. The churches were notified, and forty-four of them sent delegates. At that meeting it was decided to withdraw fellowship from Blessed Hope Church, and the resolution to hold the next annual session at that church was rescinded, and it was decided to hold it at Ridgeway. The plaintiffs claim that they were duly elected trustees of the school by the representatives of ten or twelve churches who assembled at Blessed Hope in 1908, in accordance with the resolution passed at the regular annual meeting of 1907, and at subsequent meetings in pursuance of its action, and that the called meeting at Manson in December, 1907, was without authority and void.

The judge below held that there was no provision in the by-laws or constitution of the association for calling the extra session at Manson in December, 1907, and that the proceedings at said meeting were irregular and void, as were all the subsequent meetings held in pursuance thereof and the election of trustees at such meetings, and that the annual meeting held at Blessed Hope in 1908 was the regular meeting of the association, and that the trustees chosen thereat, and at the subsequent meetings held in pursuance of the resolutions adopted thereat, are the legally chosen trustees.

The question presented, then, is whether the action of a minority of the churches, who met at the regular time and place, or that of the seceding majority, held at an irregular time and place, is valid. The constitution of the association provides: "Art. 11. This constitution may be altered or amended at any regular meeting of the association by a two-thirds vote of the members present." There is no provision which required a majority to constitute a quorum, nor which authorized the calling by certain officers of the meeting at Manson in December, 1907. The association is not incorporated, and the constitution, which is the contract between the parties, contemplates that a majority of the members present at any regular meeting should be the association.

A corporation has only such powers as are conferred by the charter creating or the laws regulating it, and a voluntary association has no existence or power, except as contained in its formal articles of agreement, or established by custom acquiesced in by the parties to it. When the association consists, as here, of the annual meeting of delegates from its constituent members,—the churches,—to further certain common interests, the organization is dissolved, upon adjournment, into its individual elements, until reassembled pursuant to the common agreement. "In church organizations those who adhere and submit to the regular order of the church, local and general, though a minority, are the true congregation." Roshi's Appeal, 69 Pa. 462, 8 Am. Rep. 280; Gable v. Miller, 10 Paige, 627. This was recently held by the House of Lords in England as to the Free Church of Scotland Overtown [1904] A. C. 515, 91 L. T. N. S. 395, 20 Times L. R. 730, where a very small per cent of the "regulars" were adjudged entitled to hold the entire property of the organization. The courts will not decide such controversies beyond ascertaining which is the "regular" organization.

We concur, therefore, with his Honor, that the regular meeting held in 1908 at Blessed Hope, in pursuance of the resolution adopted at the regular annual meeting in 1907, constituted the legal association, though the representatives of only a minority of the original fifty-eight churches attended, and that the action of the seceding majority held at Manson in December, 1907, had no legal force or effect. There has been a regular succession of meetings, and the election of trustees of Shiloh Institute thereat, in pursuance of the action taken at Blessed Hope, the regular meeting, in 1908, and his Honor properly held that the plaintiffs, being such trustees, are entitled to administer the school known as Shiloh Institute.

amendment to the charter in 1903 provided that the trustees of Shiloh Institute should be elected by Shiloh Baptist Association, two at each annual meeting of the association. The defendants in the action were the trustees elected at the Manson meeting and at the other meetings held in pursuance thereof. It appearing that the real parties in interest were the trustees which had been elected at the regular meeting held at Blessed Hope in 1908 and at the successive meetings held in pursuance thereof, his Honor properly granted their application to be made parties plaintiff, so that the whole matter might be decided upon its merits, and refused to dismiss the action. It could have been no advantage to either plaintiffs or defendants to have dismissed the action that was then pending, which was brought to decide who were entitled to administer the trust, and the court in its discretion admitted the real parties in interest to be joined. Revisal 1905, § 507. No appeal lay from the refusal to dismiss. Johnson v. Grand Fountain, U. O. T. 135 N. C. 385, 47 S. E. 463. And the entry of appeal, though not perfected, will be treated as an exception on this appeal from the final judgment. Bernard v. Shemwell, 139 N. C. 446, 52 S. E. 64.

The defendants were already in court, the subject of the controversy was not changed by the amendment, and the additional parties, being the beneficiaries for whom the action was brought, were properly made parties. Revisal 1905, § 400. Even if it be conceded that the solicitor was an unnecessary party, that is not ground for exception. The object of the Code system is to decide cases upon the merits. Here the cause of action from the beginning was to determine which set of trustees should administer Shiloh Institute. The defendants were regularly made parties, and had full opportunity to present their side of the question. If there was a defect of parties plaintiff originally, it was cured by the amendment, which allowed the beneficiaries of the action, the other set of trustees, to be made parties plaintiff.

This case differs from Simmons v. Allison, 118 N. C. 774, 24 S. E. 716, where the congregation was permitted to vote as to its choice. There the congregation was the constituent body. Here by the constitution,—the contract of the association,—a "majority of the members present" at a regular meeting was the organic body, and had the right to elect the trustees.

No error.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

EMILY L. PRATT, Plff. in Err.,

v.

NORTH GERMAN LLOYD STEAMSHIP

(106 C. C. A. 445, 184 Fed. 303.)

Carrier — steamship company — state of decks — measure of care.

1. The exercise of reasonable care with respect to the condition of its decks as to their slipperiness is the measure of duty which a steamship company owes a passenger, and the court cannot be required to instruct the jury that it must exercise the greatest care.

Evidence — fall on deck — condition of other decks.

2. Evidence of observations as to the washing of decks in respect to leaving them in a slippery condition, which one injured by falling upon a steamer deck had made on other voyages, is not admissible upon the question of negligence in respect to the one on which she fell.

Note. — Duty of steamship company to passengers as to condition of decks.

A case somewhat analogous to that of PRATT v. NORTH GERMAN LLOYD S. S. Co. is Mulvana v. The Anchoria, 27 C. C. A. 650, 51 U. S. App. 608, 83 Fed. 847, where it was held that no negligence rendering the ship liable was shown from the fact that there was a wet spot under the water cooler in the steerage, and that the steward slipped on such spot and spilled hot gruel upon a passenger. The court said: "The libellant invokes the proper and rigorous obligations of care and caution which the law imposes upon carriers of passengers for hire, and which are stated in Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 26 L. ed. 141; New Jersey S. B. Co. v. Brockett, 121 U. S. 637, 30 L. ed. 1049, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1039; and The City of Panama, 101 U. S. 462, 25 L. ed. 1064, and says that the carelessness of the steward in permitting the existence of a wet spot upon the floor was an act of negligence which renders the ship liable. It is probably true that a carrier of passengers for hire is bound to use care to overcome or obviate the known ordinary carelessness of the passengers, and, if a wet floor was dangerous, it would not be an adequate excuse for not guarding against the danger that it was caused by their known and continuous carelessness. The reason which excuses liability for this accident was presented by the district judge, and it is that no danger was to be apprehended, and that the danger of a grown man's slipping by reason of a wet spot upon the floor, and hurting a passenger in his fall, was so remote that the failure to keep the floor in a state of perpetual dryness, 33 L.R.A. Evidence — questions — ridiculing witness — excluding.

3. The court may, in its discretion, exclude questions which are calculated to ridicule the witness to whom they are propounded.

Same — opinion — cause of fall.

4. A witness cannot give his opinion as to the cause of the fall of one upon the deck of a vessel to his injury.

Appeal — exclusion of opinion evidence.

5. It is not reversible error to refuse to permit a witness who has testified as to the condition of weather on a certain day, to state whether or not he would call it a fair day, since the jury are able, from his description, to determine that fact for themselves.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries while it may be evidence that passengers were not prevented from a disagreeable tendency to a lack of neatness, is no evidence of negligence on the part of the officers or stewards of the ship in the protection of passengers against injury."

So, in Fearn v. West Jersey Ferry Co. 143 Pa. 122, 13 L.R.A. 366, 22 Atl. 708, it was held that the mere existence, during the storm which caused it, of snow on the deck of a ferryboat raised no presumption of negligence on the part of the ferry company, rendering it liable to a passenger who was injured by falling on the slippery deck.

And the placing on the main stairway of a boat of a brass plate which is corrugated save where it turns over the edge of the step, where it is left smooth and slippery, does not show such negligence as will warrant a recovery by a passenger who slips and falls thereon, where it appears that the stairs were finished in the same manner as the best boats of the period. Crocheron v. North Shore Staten Island Ferry Co. 56 N. Y. 656.

And where it appeared that a chain box on the deck of a steamer covering a necessary portion of the steering gear was the same as those commonly used on vessels of the size and age of the boat in question, and that such boxes had long been well known on vessels used for passengers, negligence on the part of the owner cannot be predicated of such construction, although there was testimony given to show that a sloping cover for such chains would have been less dangerous. Savage v. New York, N. & H. S. S. Co. 185 Fed. 778.

But the leaving of rudder chains exposed on the decks, where there is testimony that such construction is unusual and danger-alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Franklin M. Clark also for defendant in error.

Ward, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Mrs. Pratt, the plaintiff, a passenger upon the defendant's steamship Princess Irene, while walking on the promenade deck before the steamship had left her dock, fell, sustaining a fracture of her right ankle. The result was most painful. She was confined to a hospital for eleven weeks, during nine of which she was unable to walk without crutches, suffered and still suffers great pain, and was put to an expense of between $700 and $800. The plaintiff observed that the deck was wet, but complains that it was slippery both for passengers sufficiently strong to carry them without breaking under their weight, and further that the falling of the roof was conclusive evidence that it was not built with that degree of care and strength which it was the defendant's duty to exercise, is erroneous. Evers v. Wiggins, 116 Mo. App. 130, 92 S. W. 118. The court said: "Instruction No. 1 is erroneous in that it makes defendant an absolute insurer of the strength and safety of its boat. A common carrier of passengers is, to use the oft-repeated ruling of the appellate courts of this state, required 'so far as it is capable by human care and foresight, to carry them safely, and it is responsible for all injuries resulting to its passengers from even the slightest negligence on its part.'"

And where such chain box on the deck is obvious to a passenger for some hours before her injury on a clear day, the carrier's failure to warn her of the obstruction is not actionable negligence. Savage v. New York, N. & H. S. S. Co. supra.

And a steamer is liable where a passenger is injured by a fall caused by the slipping of a mat placed at the head of a stairway, where the mat was too small to fit properly into its place. Mohns v. Netherlands-American Steam Nav. Co. 104 C. C. A. 551, 182 Fed. 323.

And where a passenger on a ferryboat is injured by falling into a coal hole in the deck, which was open for the purpose of coaling the boat, he may recover where there was no device to prevent persons from walking into it, or guard to warn them. The Lackawanna, 151 Fed. 499.

And an instruction in an action by a passenger injured through the falling of the deck, that the falling of the deck was prima facie evidence of defendant's negligence, and shifted the burden of proof, is proper. Evers v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 116 Mo. App. 130, 92 S. W. 118, subsequent appeal 127 Mo. App. 236, 105 S. W. 306.

But an instruction that it was the duty of a ferry company to build the part of its boat designed and used for the carrying of 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

passengers sufficiently strong to carry them without breaking under their weight, and further that the falling of the roof was conclusive evidence that it was not built with that degree of care and strength which it was the defendant's duty to exercise, is erroneous. Evers v. Wiggins, 116 Mo. App. 130, 92 S. W. 118. The court said: "Instruction No. 1 is erroneous in that it makes defendant an absolute insurer of the strength and safety of its boat. A common carrier of passengers is, to use the oft-repeated ruling of the appellate courts of this state, required 'so far as it is capable by human care and foresight, to carry them safely, and it is responsible for all injuries resulting to its passengers from even the slightest negligence on its part.'"

. . . But a common carrier is not an insurer of passenger. . . . The same rules of law apply in respect to the equipment a carrier provides for the carriage of passengers as to its management of that equipment when carrying them. . . . The instruction is also erroneous for the reason it told the jury that the falling of the roof was conclusive evidence that it was not built with that degree of care and strength which it was defendant's duty to exercise. . . . From the fact that the roof of the boat fell, the law presumes negligence (if the plaintiff was rightfully upon it), but this presumption is not a conclusive one. It may be overthrown or explained away by evidence showing that the defendant exercised proper care. The instruction deprived defendant of the right of such explanation, and cut up by the roots all of its evidence tending to exculpate it from blame."

possession as was possible under the circumstances had been exercised by the promisee, and he had used the water from the ditch in question.

Generally, in specifically enforcing an oral contract for the sale or purchase of real estate, when the contract has been in part performed, equitable interposition rests upon the fact that the promisor has induced or permitted the promisee to place himself in such a position, in reliance upon the contract to convey, that specific performance is necessary to prevent the perpetration of a fraud by the promisor or vendor, the circumstances being such that there is no adequate remedy at law for the promisee or vendee to recover, either for the injury occasioned him, or the benefit received by the promisor or vendor. Hence, while it is the general rule that possession is necessary in order to enable the vendee of real estate, under an oral contract of purchase, to secure the specific performance thereof, yet this rule is not adhered to where there has been such performance on the part of the vendee that to deny him relief by specific performance would result in enabling the vendor to perpetrate a fraud upon him. Of course, it follows that, in order that this exception to the rule apply, the remedy at law must be inadequate. One of the exceptions to this general rule is illustrated in the note to Grindling v. Reyhl, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 466, wherein are gathered cases considering the question of specific performance of oral contracts to devise or convey land in con-

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pierce County in defendant's favor in an action brought to enforce specific performance of an oral contract to convey real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

This action was brought to enforce specific performance of an oral contract to convey real estate. After certain admissions and denials, the defendant set up affirmatively a general settlement and satisfaction of all matters of difference between the parties, including matters set forth in the complaint, and that the plaintiff accepted $1 and other valuable consideration in satisfaction and discharge of all causes of action, suits, or controversies, claims and demands against the defendant. The facts sufficiently appear from the findings.

The court found that on or about May 12, 1901, Paul C. Henrikson, the father of plaintiff and defendant, died intestate at the town of Gilman, county of Pierce, and at the time of his death was the owner in fee simple of the lands described in the complaint; that at the time of his death said Paul left him surviving his widow, then sixty-eight years of age, and eight children, including the parties hereto, all of sideration of performing services or furnishing support, where no possession is taken or improvements made.

HENRIKSON v. HENRIKSON also makes, as an exception to this general rule, a case where the promisee has made valuable improvements upon the real estate which the promisor has orally contracted to convey in consideration of such improvements, and for the recovery of which the promisee has no adequate remedy at law. The theory of the court in this case is that possession was not taken by the vendee, although he made improvements upon the property. In this connection it is of interest to compare Townsend v. Vanderwerker, 160 U. S. 171, 40 L. ed. 383, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 258, which is very similar as to the facts. In this case, although there was no distinct allegation of possession in the vendee, in his bill in equity to recover one half the value of certain real estate, under circumstances such that the court said that the bill must be maintained upon the same principles and with the same cogency of proof as if it were in fact, as well as in substance, a bill for specific performance, yet the court said that an allegation that the plaintiff gave his personal attention to the selection and purchase of the materials for the improvements to be made under the contract (a dwelling house), and the erection of the same upon the land, and paid a large amount of money in defraying the cost thereof, sufficiently showed facts inconsistent with any other theory than that the purchaser took possession of the land for that reason and because it was old and worn, and apparently, also, because it was greasy or slimy. The trial judge having charged the jury very fully to the effect that the defendant was bound to exercise reasonable care under the circumstances, the plaintiff asked him to charge that the defendant owed the plaintiff "very great care." He declined to charge otherwise than he had charged. We think the charge was right. "Very great care" is an unmeaning phrase, and the jury, in determining what was reasonable care with reference to the circumstances, would necessarily determine whether it was great or very great. Such expressions as "the utmost care" or "the highest degree of care," and so forth, are appropriate to the seaworthiness or road-worthiness of the vehicle of transportation, or to things inherently dangerous. Obviously the degree of care appropriate to boilers or to the sufficiency of the hull of a steamer or the body of a car or stage is very different from the degree of care required with reference to the washing of decks or the maintenance of a window sash or a curtain hook. Kelly v. New York & S. B. R. Co. 109 N. Y. 44, 15 N. E. 879. Such cases as The City of Panama, 101 U. S. 453, 25 L. ed. 1061 (in which a concealed hatch was left open in a passageway), and Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 26 L. ed. 141 (where a berth in a Pullman car, which the company's servants knew to be out of order, fell upon a passenger), have no application here.

The plaintiff, having testified that she had been to Europe twice and once to Jamaica, offered to show "what she noticed as to the decks of the vessels of these lines," which testimony the court excluded. The better way to raise exceptions is to propound definite questions; upon these the court can pass more intelligently. This offer was very vague. What the plaintiff may have noticed in respect to washing decks on these six voyages would be no evidence of the defendant's care or lack of care on this particular occasion. The subject was one which the jury were entirely competent to pass upon with reference to the actual circumstances proved.

One of the defendant's witnesses having testified that the deck was not worn, wet, or slippery, was asked upon cross-examination two questions, which were excluded: "Q. The plaintiff must have fallen on purpose, didn't she? Q. How do you account for her falling then?"

The first question was one calculated to ridicule the witness, and it was quite within the discretion of the trial judge to exclude it. The second was improper, as calling for the opinion of the witness upon 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the very question to be decided by the jury.

A witness from the United States Weather Bureau, having testified to the humidity of the air and the condition of the sky with respect to clouds on the day of the accident, was asked: "Q. This is what you would call, if you were reporting it for a paper, a fair day, would you not?"

This was objected to as calling for a conclusion, and excluded. The jury were able to say from the facts testified to by the witness whether the day was fair or not. It is the sort of question which may or may not be admitted, largely within the discretion of the trial judge. This ruling, if error, was harmless.

There are some other exceptions, but we think them either without merit or unimportant because relating to the question of damages.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

It is not intended to include in this note cases involving the specific enforcement of contracts in relation to real estate, creating a license or easement with reference thereto. In this connection, however, attention is called to Flickinger v. Shaw, 87 Cal. 126, 11 L.R.A. 134, 22 Am. St. Rep. 234, 25 Pac. 268, and Blankenship v. Whaley, 124 Cal. 300, 57 Pac. 79, which hold that an oral agreement by the owner of real estate to give an adjoining owner the right to use for irrigation purposes water flowing from a ditch on the promisor's land, in consideration of the adjoining owner assisting in constructing and maintaining a ditch, will be specifically enforced in behalf of such adjoining owner, where he has performed his part of the contract and for sometime has received and used the water for irrigating purposes. In these cases, however, it is to be noted that actual possession in the promisee was impossible, owing to the nature of the interest created in the real estate, although such APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pierce County in defendant's favor in an action brought to enforce specific performance of an oral contract to convey real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

This action was brought to enforce specific performance of an oral contract to convey real estate. HENRIKSON v. HENRIKSON also makes, as an exception to this general rule, a case where the promisee has made valuable improvements upon the real estate which the promisor has orally contracted to convey in consideration of such improvements, and for the recovery of which the promisee has no adequate remedy at law. The theory of the court in this case is that possession was not taken by the vendee, although he made improvements upon the property. In this connection it is of interest to compare Townsend v. Vanderwerker, 160 U. S. 171, 40 L. ed. 383, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 258, which is very similar as to the facts. whom were of full age and competent, except Hannah Henrikson, now about fifty-six years of age, blind from infancy and mentally undeveloped, and Soren Henrikson, now about thirty-five years of age, who is also mentally incompetent; that on the day Paul C. Henrikson died, the dwelling house upon the premises described in the complaint was totally destroyed by fire, and the members of the family then at home were left without a house in which to live; that the family residing on the farm at that time consisted of the widow of Paul C. Henrikson and the said Hannah and Soren; that after the burning of the dwelling house, the premises described in the complaint were worth about $2,000, and there was some personal property upon the farm, the value of which was not shown, and money belonging to said Paul to the amount of $700; that after the death of said Paul and the burning of said dwelling, a consultation was had between the widow and various of the children of the family, and it was arranged that the widow and Hannah and Soren should live temporarily in the granary upon said farm, and some talk was had as to the construction of a new house upon the premises; that it seems to have been agreed among the children that the widow and said Hannah and Soren should remain upon the farm, and some provisions should be made for their maintenance upon the farm, being the premises described in the complaint; that a few days after the said 12th day of May, 1901, the defendant, then being a storekeeper in a village in Dunn county, had a conversation with the plaintiff, who was a farmer in Dunn county, at that time living and boarding with the defendant, concerning the rebuilding of a house upon the farm above mentioned, and making provision for their mother and the incompetent children; that as a result of said conversation, it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that the plaintiff should go to Pierce county, and provide upon the farm a comfortable and convenient home for the mother of the parties and the family remaining upon the farm; it being understood that the $700 then on hand should be used in the building of a house upon said premises, and that plaintiff should put in time and money and labor with said $700 sufficient to make a comfortable and convenient home for the family; that in consideration of the performance on the part of the plaintiff of said agreement, the defendant promised on his part that, when the mother was dead, he would transfer to the plaintiff his one-eighth share in said farm, as a remuneration to the plaintiff for the things to be done and performed by said plaintiff under said agreement, but no part of said agreement was ever reduced to writing; that thereafter, and during the summer of 1901, the plaintiff caused to be built upon said farm a good and substantial dwelling house, the $700 above mentioned being expended toward the building of said house, and the plaintiff doing a considerable amount of labor by way of digging the basement, hauling material with his team, and otherwise, probably spending two months or more in said work, although the matter is left somewhat indefinite by the testimony; that in addition to the labor so expended, plaintiff purchased several hundred dollars' worth of material which was used in the construction of said house, probably more than $500, although the testimony is quite indefinite as to the exact amount; that in the summer of 1902, plaintiff spent considerable time and money in the purpose of erecting the house. The court further said that if the plaintiff subsequently and after the completion of the house allowed the vendor to take possession of the land, in view of the intimate relations between them, he lost no rights as against her which he obtained by his original entry and erection of the house, and added: "The possession thus taken was evidently in performance of and in reliance upon the original agreement with the owner, and, we think, taken in connection with the improvements made by him, it makes a case of part performance sufficient to remove the bar of the statute. His subsequent relinquishment of such possession was evidently with no intention to abandon the interest he had already acquired in the property."

but is jointly with the vendor, the making of improvements by the purchaser is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds, and authorize a specific performance of the oral contract. It was, however, also held in this case that the oral contract relied upon was not sufficiently clear and explicit in essential respects to entitle one of the parties thereto to invoke the aid of equity for its specific enforcement.

In Toe v. Toe, 3 Grant, Cas. 74, specific performance of an oral contract to convey land was denied where it did not appear that any possession had been taken under the contract, and maintained notoriously and exclusively, although valuable improvements had been made thereon by the purchaser, such improvements, however, having been fully compensated by the produce of the property. The case was also disposed of upon the theory that the purchaser failed to prove any oral contract of purchase.

constructing an additional cistern upon the premises, and bought and erected a windmill, all at considerable expense of time and money; that on the 16th day of April, 1908, the widow died, and thereafter plaintiff demanded of defendant that he convey to plaintiff his share in said farm, being one eighth thereof; but this the defendant refused to do; that no demand has ever been made by plaintiff of the defendant, except as above, for any remuneration for his services, performed by plaintiff pursuant to said agreement, in or about the erection of said house, cistern, or windmill, or for repayment to plaintiff of any sum expended by him in connection therewith; that on or about the 17th day of January, 1905, a settlement was had between plaintiff and defendant of certain differences then existing between them, and the plaintiff made and signed and delivered to defendant a writing to that effect; but the materials furnished and services performed in making the improvements in question were not considered or taken into account or settled for in said settlement, nor was the transfer of defendant's interest to the plaintiff on account of said improvements considered or settled. That after the death of said Paul C. Henrikson, the widow remained in full and complete possession of the premises described in the complaint up to the time of her death, and the plaintiff, between the 12th day of May, 1901, and the beginning of this suit, never in any manner occupied the farm or buildings thereon, and never had possession thereof during the time he worked upon said farm in the construction of the house and other improvements mentioned in these findings; that during said period he simply lived as a member of his mother's family in the same way as is ordinarily done by any person employed to do work of the kind he was doing.

The court concluded that the contract between plaintiff and defendant was void, because it was not in writing, and that there was never any such part performance on the part of plaintiff as would entitle him to specific performance of the contract. Judgment was ordered against the plaintiff for dismissal of the complaint, with costs. Judgment was entered accordingly, from which this appeal was taken.

Mr. N. O. Varnum for appellant.

Mr. Warren P. Knowles for respondent.

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented is whether, upon the established facts, the plaintiff is entitled to specific performance of the oral 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

contract set out in the case. It is settled by the findings, and not denied, that the defendant agreed orally with the plaintiff to convey to plaintiff his one-eighth interest in the real estate described in the complaint, upon the death of the mother of plaintiff and defendant, in consideration of the erection on said real estate of certain permanent improvements, and furnishing the material and doing the work necessary therefor; that plaintiff performed and furnished in accordance with such agreement, and duly performed all the conditions of such agreement on his part to be performed; that, after the death of the mother, defendant refused to convey to plaintiff. The contention on the part of the respondent is that, although the appellant fully performed on his part in pursuance of the contract, he cannot compel specific performance, because he did not take possession, and has an adequate remedy at law. The general rule is that part performance by the purchaser under an oral agreement to convey is not sufficient to take the contract out of the statute of frauds, unless possession is taken by such purchaser. The general rule has often been laid down by this court. Smith v. Finch, 8 Wis. 245; Brandeis v. Neustadt, 13 Wis. 142; Ellis v. Cary, 74 Wis. 176, 4 L.R.A. 55, 17 Am. St. Rep. 125, 42 N. W. 252; Blanchard v. McDougal, 6 Wis. 167, 70 Am. Dec. 458; Koch v. Williams, 82 Wis. 186, 52 N. W. 257; Popp v. Swanke, 68 Wis. 364, 31 N. W. 916; Harney v. Burhans, 91 Wis. 348, 64 N. W. 1031; Horn v. Ludington, 32 Wis. 73. In the above and similar cases, it will be seen that the purchaser or party complaining because of failure to carry out the oral agreement could be restored to his former position in an action at law. In other words, equity will not enforce an oral agreement, where possession has not been taken, though partly or even fully performed by one party, because he has an adequate remedy at law.

It is true strong language is used in some of the cases in stating the general rule, to the effect that part or even full performance of an oral contract to convey real estate by the purchaser is not sufficient, without possession on the part of the purchaser. As, for example, in Popp v. Swanke, supra, 68 Wis., at page 368, quoting from Smith v. Finch, 8 Wis. 245, the court said: "It is only in cases where the defendant would be enabled to practise a fraud upon the complainant unless the contract is specifically executed, that a court of equity will interfere. If the purchaser has gone into possession of the land, so as to render him liable as a trespasser if the agreement is held void, the court will enforce performance." But it is also true that there is another class of cases, resting upon the well-settled doctrine that where there is performance or part performance by the purchaser under and in pursuance of an oral contract to convey land, though no possession be taken by the purchaser, and the vendor after performance by the vendee refuses to convey, equity will enforce specific performance, where the vendee has no adequate remedy at law, and the refusal to perform on the part of the vendor would work a fraud upon the vendee. The following are some of the authorities illustrative of this rule: Cutler v. Babcock, 81 Wis. 195, 29 Am. St. Rep. 882, 51 N. W. 420; Martineau v. May, 18 Wis. 54; Ingles v. Patterson, 36 Wis. 373; Littlefield v. Littlefield, 51 Wis. 25, 7 N. W. 773; Wall v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 86 Wis. 48, 56 N. W. 367; Brown v. Hoag, 35 Minn. 373, 29 N. W. 135; Bennett v. Dyer, 89 Me. 17, 35 Atl. 1004; Seaman v. Aschermann, 51 Wis. 678, 37 Am. Rep. 849, 8 N. W. 818; Scheuer v. Cochem, 126 Wis. 209, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 427, 105 N. W. 573; Freeman v. Freeman, 43 N. Y. 34, 3 Am. Rep. 657.

The cases in this court which lay down the doctrine that possession is necessary recognize the exception. In Harney v. Burhans, 91 Wis., at page 352, the court says: "It was early decided by this court (Smith v. Finch, supra) that the full payment of the purchase money is not sufficient to take a case out of the statute, so that specific performance will be decreed, unless accompanied by actual possession, or some act whereby the vendee has received an injury for which a court of law cannot give a complete remedy." And in Wall v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. supra, the court, after laying down the general rule that payment of purchase money alone is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of fraud, but that payment of any considerable part of the purchase price, and the vendee's entry into possession and making valuable improvements, would constitute such part performance as will take the case out of the statute of frauds, and justify the enforcement of specific performance, further says (page 58 of 86 Wis.): "So, where there has been such part performance by the vendee that it would operate as a fraud upon him to allow the vendor to repudiate the contract, the same will be enforced in equity." And in Littlefield v. Littlefield, supra, it was held to be the settled doctrine of this court that the mere payment of the consideration, unaccompanied by any other act, is not such part performance of a parol contract for the conveyance of land as will authorize specific enforcement, but that there must be some other act done to raise an equity, "such as the taking of possession of the lands sold under the contract by the purchaser, or one party must have induced the other so to act that if the contract be abandoned he cannot be restored to his former position, and a refusal to perform the contract will operate as a fraud." To the same effect are cases in other courts. Bennett v. Dyer and Brown v. Hoag, supra.

The making of valuable permanent improvements on the land by the vendee, in pursuance of the agreement, and with the knowledge of the other party, is always considered to be the strongest and most unequivocal act of part performance by which a verbal contract to sell land is taken out of the statute. Pom. Spec. Perf. of Contracts, §§ 126-130, and cases cited; Scheuer v. Cochem, 126 Wis. 209, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 427, 105 N. W. 573; Littlefield v. Littlefield, 51 Wis. 25, 7 N. W. 773. In the case before us the plaintiff made valuable and permanent improvements on the land in question, under and in pursuance of the oral agreement that defendant would convey his one-eighth interest as specified. Now, unless plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law, the refusal on the part of defendant to carry out the agreement operates as a fraud upon the plaintiff. The question therefore arises whether the plaintiff has such remedy. This turns upon whether he can be placed in his former position by recovering compensation for the improvements made upon the land. The defendant owned a one-eighth and the plaintiff a one-eighth interest in the land; the remaining six eighths being owned one eighth by each of the other six heirs, two of whom were incompetent. So, unless plaintiff can recover from defendant the full value of the improvements made, he has not an adequate remedy at law. The improvements made, so far as they benefited the property, benefited the whole, and the interest of each owner in the real estate would be enhanced in value by the services performed and money expended by the plaintiff, and the question is whether the plaintiff can recover damages beyond what defendant has been enriched by the improvements. The oral contract being void, it cannot serve as a basis for the recovery of damages. Brandeis v. Neustadt, 13 Wis. 158; Ellis v. Cary, 74 Wis. 176, 4 L.R.A. 55, 17 Am. St. Rep. 125, 42 N. W. 252; Rowell v. Barber, 142 Wis. 304, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1140, 125 N. W. 937. As was said by this court in Brandeis v. Neustadt, supra, in a case of oral contract for purchase of land: "A contract declared void by statute is in all respects a nullity." Such a contract is not voidable, but absolutely void, and affords no protection to the party claiming under it. Ibid.

The person receiving money, however, under a void contract for the sale of land, is bound to return it, on the theory that it is the money of the other party to the void contract, and which the holder is bound to return. This rule would require a defendant who had become enriched by valuable improvements placed upon his land under a void contract, to respond to the extent of such enhancement, upon the principle that the law implies a promise to pay for them. But the law imposes no liability on one who has under a void contract caused such improvements to be made upon another's land, because, the contract being void and the defendant receiving no benefit, there could be no implied promise to respond for a benefit bestowed upon another. Dowling v. McKenney, 124 Mass. 478; Keener, Quasi Contr. pp. 279-282; Browne, Stat. Fr. 5th ed. § 118a; Dunphy v. Ryan, 116 U. S. 491, 29 L. ed. 703, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486; 2 Page, Contr. § 751; Banker v. Henderson, 58 N. J. L. 26, 32 Atl. 700; Gazzam v. Simpson, 52 C. C. A. 19, 114 Fed. 71; Day v. New York C. R. Co. 51 N. Y. 583. The doctrine is well stated in Browne on Statute of Frauds, 5th ed. § 118a, as follows: "The rule that, where one person pays money or performs services for another upon a contract void under the statute of frauds, he may recover the money upon a count for money paid, or recover for the services upon a quantum meruit, applies only to cases where the defendant has received and holds the money paid or the benefit of the services rendered; it does not apply to cases of money paid by the plaintiff to a third person in execution of a verbal contract between the plaintiff and defendant, such as by the statute of frauds must be in writing. Such payment is not a payment to the defendant's use in the sense of the rule. It is a payment to his use only if he chooses to abide by the contract, and it is his right to refuse to do that." So, in Keener on Quasi Contracts, pp. 278, 279, the rule is laid down that where one renders services under a contract void by the statute of frauds, in order to recover, he must show that the defendant, if he is not compelled to pay the plaintiff for that which he has received, unjustly enriched himself at the plaintiff's expense.

The defendant here, owning one-eighth interest, could be enriched by the improvements only in the ratio of his interest to the interest of other owners, and therefore could not in an action at law be compelled to respond for the whole improvement. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The plaintiff, of course, could not recover for the benefits, if any, to his own one-eighth interest, the expense of which improvements he might never have incurred but for the promise of defendant to convey. Nor does it seem from the record that there is any basis for recovery at law from any of the other owners for any part of the expense of the improvements. There is certainly none for recovery from the incompetents. Independent of statute, the general rule is that a tenant in common cannot recover at law against his cotenant for improvements made upon the common property. 1 Wash. Real Prop. § 894, and cases cited. Whether plaintiff could have any allowance against any of the tenants in common of the property in an action of partition or other equitable action or proceeding, we need not consider, and do not decide, because that would be an equitable action, and not an action at law, and no answer to the plaintiff's present action. In order to warrant the court in denying specific performance in the instant case, it must appear that the plaintiff has a remedy at law, and such legal remedy must be "as adequate, comprehensive, and effectual as that afforded by a court of equity." Butterick Pub. Co. v. Rose, 141 Wis. 539, 124 N. W. 649. Even if an action at law could be maintained against all the heirs to recover for the benefits received, it is by no means clear that such action would afford an adequate remedy, because the reasonable cost of the improvements might not turn out to be the measure of their enrichment.

The theory of the liability of the defendant in the instant case is that the law raises an implied obligation on the part of defendant that he return that which he has received under the void contract; and this obligation requires him to respond only for what he has received, and not for what others have received because of the void agreement. The obligation rests upon the benefit received, and the extent of the obligation is measured by the benefit. It is true that there are some cases holding a different doctrine, and appear to hold that the liability is not measured by the benefit received. Parker v. Tainter, 123 Mass. 185, belongs to this class. However, in Dowling v. McKenney, 124 Mass. 478, the question was squarely met by the court, and it was held that, where one advances money to or performs services for another, based upon a contract void under the statute of frauds, he can only recover against such other so much as defendant has been enriched by the transaction. This we believe to be a sound doctrine, and the only logical basis of recovery in such a case. Upon that doctrine, of course, the plaintiff here has no adequate remedy at law, and therefore is entitled to specific performance of the contract. It follows, therefore, that the judgment must be reversed.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff for specific performance.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

LOUISE HARVEY et al., Exrx., etc., of Joseph Harvey, Deceased, et al., Respts.,
v.

EDWARD WEISBAUM et al., Appts.

(— Cal. —, 113 Pac. 656.)

Landlord and tenant — destruction of property — recovery of advance rent.

Rent paid in advance cannot be recovered upon accidental destruction of the tenement, although the statute and lease provide that such destruction terminates the lease.

(January 11, 1911.)

Note. — Destruction of premises as affecting rent paid or payable in advance.

Right of lessee to recover rent paid in advance.

Where a lease contains no provision on the question, or provides merely that in case the premises are destroyed during the term the lease or tenancy shall terminate, and there is no provision showing an intention that in such case a portion of the rent paid in advance should be returned, it is generally held that no recovery of such rent can be had.

Thus, it has been held that no recovery could be had by the lessee of any part of the rent paid in advance, although the premises had been destroyed:

—where a written lease of a room in a store building, and part of a lot back of the building, contained no covenant on the part of lessor to refund any portion of rent paid in advance in case the demised premises were rendered untenable by fire or other casualty. Lieberthal v. Montgomery, 121 Mich. 369, 80 N. W. 115;

—where the lease stipulated that rent should be paid quarterly in advance, and that for such time as lessees should be deprived of any portion of the building destroyed, a corresponding deduction should be made and allowed in the rent of the premises. Cross v. Button, 4 Wis. 468;

—where a lease of two mills stipulated for payment of rent yearly in advance, and provided that the term should immediately cease upon destruction of both mills, and for a deduction of a certain sum per annum in event of destruction of one of them, no 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in plaintiffs' favor, and from an order denying a new trial, in an action to recover rent paid in advance under a written lease of premises destroyed by fire. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. L. Well, for appellants:

Rent paid in advance cannot be recovered.

In the case of a lease of buildings only, their destruction both terminates the lease and relieves the tenant from payment of rent.

recovery was allowed upon the destruction of one of the mills before expiration of the half year for which rent had been paid in advance. Cornock v. Dodds, 32 U. C. Q. B. 625;

—where a lease provided for rent of $1,500 per year, payable $150 per month in advance, and further that in case any building should be destroyed or injured so as to be unfit for occupancy, without the lessee's fault or neglect, he should not be liable to pay rent after a surrender of possession, lessee was not entitled to recover portion of month's rent where, before expiration of month, building was rendered untenable and possession surrendered. Felix v. Griffiths, 56 Ohio St. 39, 45 N. E. 1092;

—under a lease providing for the payment of rent in advance on the 1st of each month, and providing that if the premises during the term should be so damaged by fire that the landlord should decide to rebuild, the term should cease, and the accrued rent should be paid up to the time of the fire, where a fire occurs on the 10th of the month, and landlord decides not to rebuild, a complaint in an action to recover a portion of the rent paid for the month, alleging the above facts, does not state a cause of action. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co. v. Wallace, 65 Misc. 27, 119 N. Y. Supp. 287;

—where rent had been paid in advance under an oral lease, there being no evidence to show that the landlord had agreed to refund any part of rent in case the building was burned. Stautz v. Protzman, 84 Ill. App. 434.

Per Curiam:

This cause was decided by the district court of appeal for the first district in favor of the appellants, and the judgment and order appealed from were reversed. On petition of the respondents the judgment of the district court of appeal was vacated, and the appeals were transferred to this court for further consideration. Upon a re-examination of the case, we find

"It seems to us as quite plain that there is no covenant to refund any portion of the rent already paid, but that the covenant relied on has reference to rent to accrue in the future not yet paid, from which the deduction should be made. As time advanced, after and during the continuance of the privation, the rate of deduction would or could be noted, and when the next quarter day arrived, a proportionate deduction would be made up to that time; if it still continued, a corresponding deduction would continue to be made until the repair should be completed and the use restored. But this is a very different matter from refunding rent already due and paid."

And one who hires land planted with asparagus, and pays rent in advance, cannot recover a portion of such rent where the asparagus crop was destroyed by water caused by the breaking of a levee without the fault of either party, where the asparagus bed was not destroyed, even although a statute provided that the hirer might terminate the hiring before the end of the agreed time in case the greater part of the thing hired perished from any other cause than ordinary negligence. Meek v. Cunha, 8 Cal. App. 98, 96 Pac. 107.

And where an assignee of a lease, upon the lessor agreeing to the assignment, paid a certain sum to him under a further agreement that the assignee should have the option to purchase the property within a year, and that in case he so elected the sum paid should apply on the purchase price, otherwise it should be absorbed in rent, the assignee cannot, where he did not elect within the year to purchase, recover a portion of such sum in an action for money had and received, where the property is destroyed before the rent amounts to hardly one fourth of the amount paid, although the original lease contained a provision that, in the event of the house being burned, the rent should cease, since he had had the benefit of a part of the consideration, including the option to purchase, and also because the rent already paid could not cease, and a recovery would therefore override the terms of the lease. Pulver v. Williams, 3 U. C. C. P. 56.

no ground for differing from the conclusions reached by the district court. The opinion and the judgment of that court, written by Mr. Justice Cooper, is hereby adopted as the opinion and judgment of this court. It is as follows:

"This action was brought by plaintiff Daroux and the other plaintiffs, as executors of the last will and testament of Joseph Harvey, deceased, to recover of defendants rent paid in advance by said Daroux and said Harvey, deceased, under a written lease; the leased premises having been destroyed by fire on April 18, 1906, as a result of the earthquake of that date. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and findings filed upon which judgment was entered for plaintiff for the amount claimed in the complaint. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

"On the 28th day of February, 1906, plaintiff Daroux and said Harvey, deceased, entered into a contract in writing, whereby they leased from defendants certain space and rooms in the second story of a brick building on Glasgow street, in the city and

And where a lease provides for the payment of rent in advance, and contains a provision that if, during the term of the lease, the lessor shall rent any office on the street front for a less sum than the lessees were paying, "such reduction shall also be made to lessee for term of this lease," no proportionate recovery can be had for the amount paid prior to the rental of the other premises at the reduced rent. Copeland v. Goldsmith, 100 Wis. 436, 76 N. W. 358. The court said: "They had paid their rent to the lessor at the old rate, and now claim that, under the clause of the lease quoted, they may recover from him the difference between the amount they have paid and what they would have paid at the reduced rate. In other words, they insist that this clause in the lease must be construed into a covenant to refund rent collected at the old rate. In support of this contention, they say there cannot be a reduction 'for term of this lease,' unless they are paid back a portion of the rent collected. We cannot agree with this construction. It seems to us quite plain that there was no covenant to refund any portion of the rent paid, but that the covenant relied upon has reference to rent to accrue during the remainder of the term."

county of San Francisco, 'for the term of two years from the 1st day of March, 1906, at the total rent or sum of $5,400, payable one half thereof in advance on the signing of this lease, and the remaining one half payable monthly in advance at the rate of $225 per month, beginning March 1st, 1907.' The lease contained the following clause as to the liability of the respective parties in case of the destruction of the premises by fire, to wit: 'It is further agreed between the parties hereto that in case the said demised premises shall be destroyed, or become damaged to such an extent as to render the same untenable, by reason of fire or the act of God or the public enemy, then this lease shall terminate and be at an end; but if such damage shall not be greater than can be repaired in one month, if the parties of the first part shall, at their own cost and expense, repair such damage, and put said premises in good tenable condition within one month from the time of the occurrence of such damage, then this lease shall continue in force; but the parties of the second part shall be allowed a proportionate reduction in the rent while such repairs are being made.' At the time the said lease was so made and executed, the defendants were paid the first year's rental, $2,700, by said Daroux and said Harvey, deceased, and thereupon and thereafter said lessees entered into the possession of the said leased premises, and so continued in such possession until the premises were destroyed by fire on the day before mentioned.

"The question, and the only question, that need be decided, is as to whether or not a tenant who has taken possession of the leased premises and paid his rent, or a part of it, in advance, as required by the terms of the lease, can, in the absence of any covenant in the lease, recover the rent so paid in case of the total destruction of the premises by fire without any fault of either party to the lease.

"The common-law rule applicable where

See also Werner v. Padula, 49 App. Div. 135, 63 N. Y. Supp. 68, affirmed in 167 N. Y. 611, 60 N. E. 1122, and Tarkovsky v. George H. Hess Co. 64 Ill. App. 513, which are set out at length in HARVEY v. WEISBAUM.

But the provisions of some leases and statutes have been held to show an intention that a part of rent paid in advance should be returned in case the premises were destroyed.

This result was reached in Rich v. Smith, 121 Mass. 328, where a lease upon which rent had been paid in advance provided that, in case of destruction by fire "during said term," "the rent hereinbefore reserved, or a just and proportionate part thereof, shall be suspended or abated, until the said premises shall be put in proper use and habitation by the said lessor," and the lessee was held entitled to recover back a proportionate part of the rent paid, where the premises burned during the term and the lessor elected not to rebuild.

So, in Carley v. Liberty Hat Mfg. Co. — N. J. —, post, 545, 79 Atl. 447, the same result was reached under a statute providing that, in case of total destruction of the premises, the rent should be paid up to the time of destruction, and then the lease should cease and come to an end.

And where a lease providing for payment of rent half yearly in advance contains a provision that, in case of total destruction of the property, the term should at once cease, and the rent should be adjusted at what, on a just apportionment, should be found to be the due proportional part thereof up to that time, and should be apportioned between the parties thereto accordingly, the following averments were held to state a good cause of action, i. e., the due payment until destruction by fire of all rent up to that time, including the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

half yearly payment due in advance for the half year commencing the June before the October in which the property was destroyed, the total destruction by accidental fire in October, whereupon the term immediately ceased, and plaintiff became entitled to have the rent adjusted and apportioned as aforesaid, and defendant became liable to refund and repay so much of the rent paid in advance by the plaintiff as, upon a just apportionment, should be found to be in excess of said rent beyond the due proportional part thereof down to the date of the fire, and that on that day a certain named sum was the sum which, upon a just apportionment of the rent reserved, would be and was the amount of said rent so paid in advance over and above a due proportional part of said rent paid down to the date of the fire, yet defendant had not paid the same. Hortop v. Taylor, 21 U. C. C. P. 56.

And in Porter v. Tull, 6 Wash. 408, 22 L.R.A. 613, 36 Am. St. Rep. 172, 33 Pac. 965, it was held that a tenant of a portion of a building might recover back rent paid in advance in accordance with the lease, upon the total destruction of the building by fire, such a requirement being held merely a prudential act to secure the lessor the rent, and to protect him against losing it.

And where a lessor rebuilds after the property is destroyed, and rents to a third person, the lessee who had paid his rent in advance, and who abandoned the property after its destruction by fire, can recover back the rent paid by him from the time the other lease was executed. Ward v. Bull, 1 Fla. 311.

Where a lease provides that, in case of the destruction of the premises by fire during the term, the landlord should refund rent paid in advance for the unexpired term, the tenant waives his right to such land is the subject of the lease is that, where there is a covenant on the part of the lessee to pay rent for the term, and the buildings are destroyed by fire, the tenant is not relieved from the payment of rent, unless he has protected himself by a covenant in the lease. This rule was based, as stated by the common-law writers, upon the reason that, as the destruction is usually by means of an accident, for which neither lessor nor lessee is responsible, it is but equitable to divide the loss; and as the lessor must lose the property, the lessee should lose the term; and upon the further reason that exemption from loss would tend to make the tenant less careful, as in many cases he would be benefited by the destruction of the premises, if the result would be to free him from the lease. In most states, however, the common-law rule has been superseded by either Code or statutory provisions. In this state the rule has been changed (Civil Code, § 1933) by direct provision that the hiring of a thing terminates by the destruction of the thing hired. Ainsworth v. Ritt, 38 Cal. 89. But there is no provision of the Code, and no well-considered case to which our attention has been called, making the lessor liable to the lessee, in case of destruction of the premises by fire, for rent paid in advance, in the absence of any such provision in the agreement of lease. In such case the contract has been executed, and the estate or premises leased delivered to the lessee. The fact that rent was to be paid in advance might have been the controlling factor in the mind of the lessor when he executed the lease and delivered the possession of the premises to the lessee. The consideration for the advance payment is not only the use of the premises for the month during which the lessee is to use them under the lease, but the conveyance by way of lease and the obtaining possession of the premises. The lease is an interest in real property passing from the lessor to the lessee. In many cases the landlord may recovery by remaining in possession of the premises after a fire, and deriving all the benefits to be had from possession of the property, although the landlord had made no demand for possession. Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 50 Ala. 530.

Recovery by lessor after destruction of premises of rent payable in advance.

The question of intention as shown in the lease or statute also controls in cases where the lessor seeks to recover rent payable in advance after the premises have been destroyed.

An interesting case upon the question here considered is that of Craig v. Butler, 83 Hun, 286, 31 N. Y. Supp. 963, affirmed in 156 N. Y. 672, 50 N. E. 962, which arose under the New York statute providing that the lessees of any building which shall, without any fault or neglect on the lessees' part, be destroyed or so injured by the elements or any other cause as to be untenable and unfit for occupancy, shall not be liable to pay rent to the lessors after such destruction or injury, unless otherwise expressly provided by written agreement, and that the lessees upon such injury occurring might thereupon quit and surrender possession of the premises. In this case the rent reserved for a summer hotel was payable in equal portions the 1st of May, June, July, and August, and the balance of the amount on the 1st of September; the hotel burned at 6 o'clock A. M. September 1st, which was Sunday, and the lessee on September 3d, Labor Day coming on the 2d, notified the lessor that he surrendered possession of the premises pursuant to the provisions of the statute. It was held that the rent balance became due at all times during the day of September 1st, that the fact that Sunday and Labor Day intervened only extended the time of payment, and that the rent having accrued before the burning of the property, the full amount might be recovered. This case was affirmed on the opinion of the lower court in 156 N. Y. 672, Chief Justice Parker and another justice dissenting. In an opinion filed by the chief justice, he said: "The construction of the statute which the respondents contend for would enable a landlord to recover of his tenants the yearly rent in advance, if the rent became due a day before the destruction of the premises. The appellant insists that a proper construction of the statute would enable a tenant, at a yearly rent payable at the end of the term, to escape payment entirely if the house should burn down on the 364th day of the term. It does not seem to me that the statute should be given the construction contended for by either party. Midway between these extremes may be found a natural and ordinary construction which will harmonize with the intent of the legislature as generally understood. The purpose of this statute was to abrogate the severe rule of the common law, holding the tenant to the payment of rent notwithstanding the building rented should be destroyed or rendered untenable during the running of the lease, and to permit him in such event to quit and surrender possession of the demised premises. The object of the legislature is accomplished when the tenant pays for such portion of a term as he occupies the demised premises, and is relieved from paying for such part thereof as he is prevented from enjoying without fault on his part. So, if the tenant occupies the demised premises for the greater part of the term, the rent of which is payable at the expiration thereof, he shall not have the premises free for the time actually occupied, even if they shall be destroyed have expended more money than the advanced rent, and for the very reason that he is receiving rent in advance. It may have been the very inducement to the lease. The destruction of the premises by fire being unforeseen, and without the fault of either party in contemplation of law, they each must suffer, and being equally innocent, why should the law interfere to aid the lessee in a case where he has not taken the precaution to provide in his lease for the contingency? The lessee has only paid the money he agreed to pay at the time he agreed to pay it; and, as he has not seen fit to have any provision inserted in the lease as to the recovery of the advanced rent, or a part thereof, in case the premises are destroyed by fire, the law will not insert such provision for him, particularly as in many cases it might work a great hardship on the lessor.

"In the state of New York the statute provides that where any leased building is destroyed by fire so as to be untenable, the lessee may quit and surrender possession, and in such case he shall not be liable to rent subsequent to the surrender. It is held, however, that where rent is paid in advance, it cannot be recovered, notwithstanding the provision of the statute. Werner v. Padula, 49 App. Div. 135, 63 N. Y. Supp. 68. It was there said: 'If by the terms of his lease rent is to be paid in advance, the tenant comes under an absolute engagement to pay it on the day fixed, and he is not relieved from that engagement by the fact that the property is destroyed by fire, and he is liable to pay the rent due in advance, even though the destruction takes place on the very day it falls due. . . . Under the statute therefore, the plaintiff would have been compelled to pay the first instalment of rent, although the premises had been destroyed on the day after this lease was signed. But it is said that if this construction be given to her contract, she gets no more benefit from the contract than she would have had, had she relied upon the statute. That is undoubtedly true. If she had written into her lease the exact words of the statute, they would have received there the same construction which the statute itself has received, and the fact that she has written words in her contract which have the same meaning gives her no other or different rights. When, therefore, on the day the lease was signed, she paid the rent in accordance with its terms, that payment was final and absolute, and she was not entitled to recover it back in the event of the destruction of the premises before the whole of that rent had been earned.'

"This case was affirmed in 167 N. Y. 611, 60 N. E. 1122, and again in Einstein v. Tutelman, 59 Misc. 462, 110 N. Y. Supp. 1025.

"In Tarkovsky v. George H. Hess Co. 64 Ill. App. 513, the lease contained the provision: 'Upon the destruction of said premises by fire the term hereby created shall cease and determine.' The premises were totally destroyed by fire, and the action was brought to recover part of a month's rent which had been paid in advance under the terms of the lease. The court held that such rent could not be recovered. In the opinion the court said: 'Can a proportionate part of such payment be recovered back? We think not. The contract of the parties ought to govern. They provided by their agreement how the rent should be paid, but did not agree that the rent should be abated for any part of the term for which it should be paid, in case the premises should be destroyed. Their only agreement with reference to the without his fault prior to the end of the term; nor, on the other hand, shall the landlord compel the payment of the yearly rent in advance if pay day shall arrive a few hours before the total destruction of the premises. The natural and ordinary use of the words employed in the statute seems to incline in favor of a construction which, in either event, would compel the payment of such value as the tenant has actually received out of the premises, and no more."

And where, by the terms of a lease, the rent is payable quarterly in advance, and there is a provision that, if the property is accidentally burned, the rent is from thenceforth to cease, the destruction of the property early in the quarter will not prevent the lessor recovering the full amount. Ryerse v. Lyons, 2 U. C. Q. B. 12.

And where a lease containing a provision for the suspension or abatement of rent in case of the destruction of the premises by fire was surrendered to the lessor in consideration of three notes made by the lessee, the latter is liable for all of the notes, although the premises are destroyed before the date on which the last falls due, the consideration being the surrender of the lease. Brooks v. Cutter, 119 Mass. 132.

But where rent is payable in advance on the 1st of every month, and there is a provision in the lease that in case of fire, if the premises be so damaged that the landlord should decide to rebuild, the term should cease, and the accrued rent be paid up to the time of the fire, the landlord, after a fire occurring on the 12th of the month and an election to rebuild, can recover rent only up to the date of the fire. Hecht v. Heerwagen, 14 Misc. 529, 36 N. Y. Supp. 271.

J. T. W.

destruction of the premises was that the lease should thereupon terminate, and, impliedly, that no more rent should accrue. Such was probably the law without any agreement. But as to rent previously paid they made no provision, and we do not feel called upon to make one for them. As we view the case, the risk of the lease being terminated before the time expired for which rent was paid was upon the party paying. That was in effect what his contract was when he agreed to pay in advance.'

"The same ruling has been made by the supreme court of Ohio (Felix v. Griffiths, 56 Ohio St. 39, 45 N. E. 1092); of Wisconsin (Cross v. Button, 4 Wis. 468; Copeland v. Goldsmith, 100 Wis. 436, 76 N. W. 358); and of Michigan (Lieberthal v. Montgomery, 121 Mich. 369, 80 N. W. 115).

"The only case cited which appears to be directly in point, holding the contrary rule, is Porter v. Tull, 6 Wash. 408, 22 L.R.A. 613, 36 Am. St. Rep. 172, 33 Pac. 965. The reasoning of that case, however, is not convincing, and the opinion states that the court has not been cited to any adjudicated cases on the question. The cases to which we have referred, and which have been cited herein, evidently were not called to the attention of the court.

"We are aware that there may be cases in which the rule that we have adopted may work injustice; but we apprehend that to hold to the contrary would work greater injustice in many cases. In our opinion it is better to let the rights of the parties rest upon their contract as they have made it, and not by judicial construction place a covenant in the lease which the parties have neglected to insert there themselves. It is better to have the rule uniform and certain, and any such contingency may be provided for in the lease.

"The judgment and order are reversed."

LIBERTY HAT MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

Landlord and tenant — destruction of property — recovery of advanced rent.

The supplement of 1874 to the landlord and tenant act (P. L. 1874, p. 27; 2 Gen. Stat. 1895, p. 1923, § 35), in case of the total destruction of the building or buildings erected on leased premises by fire or otherwise, without the fault of the lessee, permits a recovery by the tenant from the lessor of such portion of an instalment of rent that has been paid in advance as would have been earned after such destruction.

(March 6, 1911.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Second District Court of the City of Newark in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover an instalment of rent after the destruction of the premises by fire, alleged to be due under a lease requiring payment of rent monthly in advance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel F. Leber, for plaintiff in error:

The legislature intended that the rent reserved should be apportioned up to the time of the destruction.

Craig v. Butler, 156 N. Y. 672, 50 N. E. 963; Werner v. Padula, 49 App. Div. 135, 63 N. Y. Supp. 68.

There is no justice nor force in the argument that the month's rent was due and payable in advance on the 1st day of May, and consequently had accrued prior to the destruction.

Porter v. Tull, 22 L.R.A. 613, and note, 6 Wash. 408, 36 Am. St. Rep. 172, 33 Pac. 965; Craig v. Butler, 156 N. Y. 672, 50 N. E. 963.

By the terms of the lease the plaintiff in error took no interest in the soil upon which the demised buildings and machinery stood, and the common-law rule does not apply because the reason for the rule does not exist.

Voorhees, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the supreme court, which on appeal affirmed a judgment of the second district court of Newark rendered for the plaintiff for $150 and costs. The suit was brought for $150, being an instalment of rent due upon a written lease demising certain lands and premises, with the buildings thereon and appurtenances, at a yearly rental of $1,800, payable in monthly instalments of $150 each in advance, on the first secular day of each month. An instalment of rent became due for the month of May, 1909, on the 1st day of that month. It was not paid on the due date. The defendant remained in the undisturbed possession of the premises until May 8, 1909, when, without his fault, the buildings on the premises were totally destroyed by fire. Since the fire the defendant has not occupied the premises. Some time after the fire, but before suit brought, the defendant made a tender to the plaintiff of eight days' rent, which was refused. The suit was then instituted to recover the rent for the entire month of May. The defendant interposed a recoupment against the plaintiff's demand for the portion of rent from the 8th day of May to the 1st day of June. Judgment was given for $150 for the plaintiff for the whole month; the defendant's claim for the portion of the rent referable to the period after the fire being disallowed.

The solution of the question presented by the writ involves the construction of the act of March 5, 1874 (P. L. p. 27, Gen. Stat. 1895, p. 1923, § 35). It reads as follows: "That whenever any building or buildings erected on leased premises shall be injured by fire without the fault of the lessee, the landlord shall repair the same as speedily as possible, or in default thereof, the rent shall cease until such time as such building or buildings shall be put in complete repair; and in case of the total destruction of such building or buildings by fire or otherwise, the rent shall be paid up to the time of such destruction, and then and from thenceforth, the lease shall cease and come to an end; provided always, that this section shall not extend to or apply to cases where the parties have otherwise stipulated in their agreement of lease." Of course, this statute was a remedy for the harshness of the common-law rule which made the rent payable notwithstanding the destruction of the buildings upon the demised property. It provides for two cases: The first for injury to the buildings by fire, and makes it the duty of the landlord to repair, under penalty of having the rent cease until the buildings shall be put in complete repair. This does not contemplate the termination of the lease. The other case is where there is a total destruction of the buildings. In that case the rent shall be paid up to the time of the destruction, and then the lease shall cease and come to an end. Reading these two clauses together, it cannot be said that the statute offers an option to the tenant to be availed of by him within a reasonable time, whether he will terminate the lease or not. The language expressly provides that the lease shall terminate, and the word "then," in the clause "and then and from thenceforth," refers to the time of destruction. The severing of the relation between landlord and tenant may prove to be of substantial benefit to the owner by leaving him free to allow the premises to remain without buildings, or to erect thereon new structures suited to the location and condition of the property. The termination is not made dependent upon the rent being paid to the time of the destruction. The statute means that there shall be a liability for the payment of the rent to the date of destruction and cessation of the term, and provides that the tenant shall pay it. This is most equitable and a just change of the former rule, and, being within the plain words of the act, should be the construction.

It has been suggested that this view would in some cases lead to injustice, and the case has been instanced where a plantation had been demised, having but a single structure upon it, the destruction of which would work a termination of the lease. The answer to that is that the parties contract with knowledge of the law, and may provide against such a contingency by agreeing upon the circumstances which shall terminate the lease. Great stress has been laid upon the fact that at common law rent is not apportionable, and therefore cannot be divided. It is strenuously argued that, when by agreement rent has been made payable in advance of the period for which it is to be earned, it is still a unit and indivisible, and, a fortiori, when paid, is not recoverable, although the term of the tenant may have come to an end before the end of the period for which it was paid. The statute in the plainest words as to rent not made payable in advance has changed the common-law rule in the cases mentioned in the statute. Rent thus payable under the given circumstances has been clearly made apportionable. The language, "paid up to the time of such destruction," means payment of the rent which is earned up to that time, and it is clear that rent not payable in advance of being earned, but at the end of the period for which it was reserved, could be recovered only for a period "up to the time of such destruction." The plaintiff concedes the soundness of this proposition.

Should a different effect be given to the statute when the fire occurs after an installment of the annual rent has become due and payable, but within the period for which it was reserved? We agree that the plaintiff is correct in insisting that the failure of the tenant to pay the rent promptly upon the 1st day of the month in advance can gain for it no advantage from the circumstances that, in fact, the rent was unpaid when the fire took place. To hold otherwise would be permitting the lessee to profit by its own wrong. The case must be considered with reference to the right of the tenant to recover from the landlord, in case the rent had been paid in advance, the unearned portion thereof; that is, all that had not been earned at the time of the fire and after eviction under the statute. In debating this question, we must keep in mind what the statute avowedly intended to do and what it has in terms directed shall be done. First, it has provided that the fire shall mark a period down to which the tenant shall be liable to pay, and cancel his liability thereafter; secondly, that, after the fire, "the lease shall cease and come to an end." It thus not only puts an end to the enjoyment of the occupation, but, in consequence, causes a failure of the consideration for which the rent had been paid in advance. Thus, every obstacle to the recovery by the tenant of previously paid rent is removed. The rent is divisible and the consideration has failed. This result seems to attend the natural and ordinary meaning of the words of the enactment. It enforces payment on the part of the tenant for the value he has received in the enjoyment of his possession. It prevents the landlord from retaining that for which he has given no value.

The argument is that liberality of construction should not be accorded to the statute because it is in derogation of the common law. All statutes which change the common law are in a sense in derogation thereof; yet there is another rule which is likewise recognized, prescribing for remedial statutes a liberal interpretation. The case of Coles v. Celluloid Mfg. Co. 39 N. J. L. 326, cited as sustaining this principle, does not seem to be in point. While it referred to this statute, it was to show its inapplicability to the case then under consideration, because enacted after the cause of action in that case had arisen. Tinsman v. Belvidere Delaware R. Co. 26 N. J. L. 148, 69 Am. Dec. 565, also cited, is clearly distinguishable for the contention sought, for the enactment was quite without its terms and its reason and spirit as well. State v. Lash, 16 N. J. L. 380, 32 Am. Dec. 397, was a penal statute, and so clearly within the imperative rule requiring strict construction. The fundamental canon of construction is that the intention of the legislature shall prevail, and that it shall be gotten from the plain meaning of the enactment. That meaning, however, once ascertained, a remedial enactment will extend so as to advance the remedy provided by it, and suppress the mischief which preceded its passage. No one can doubt that in the plainest terms this act includes the objects above set forth. Nor can it be denied that the mischief which lurked within the old law, and was designed to be suppressed, was the great injustice that oftentimes happened to tenants by being obliged to pay rent after the possibility of the beneficial enjoyment of the premises had ceased. The statute is therefore highly remedial, and its scope should be held to include a complete remedy for the recognized wrong it was intended to right. That object is plainly within its words. We think, therefore, that the statute, in case of the total destruction of the building or buildings erected on leased premises, by fire or otherwise, without the fault of the lessee, permits a recovery by the tenant from the lessor of such portion of an instalment of rent that has been paid in advance as would have been earned after such destruction.

We have no direct authority in this state construing this statute. Turning to the cases in other states referred to by the plaintiff, we first notice Craig v. Butler, 83 Hun, 286, 31 N. Y. Supp. 963, affirmed in 156 N. Y. 672, 50 N. E. 962. The wording of the New York statute is: "Shall not be liable to pay rent. . . . after such destruction." The court says: "Of course, the purpose of the statute is to relieve the tenant from payment of rent which accrues after the destruction, not from the payment of rent which was due, but unpaid at that time. So that the question here is narrowed whether . . . the rent sought to be recovered had accrued when the fire occurred," and concluded that the rent had accrued before the fire. The New York statute is not as strong as ours. It is confined to the payment of rent after the destruction. Our statute says that the rent shall be paid up to the destruction,—clearly contemplating an apportionment. The New York court, in speaking of the rent having "accrued," evidently uses that word in the sense of "become due and payable," and thereby brings the case within the literal language of their statute. We think the true meaning of the word "accrue" is "to grow," and in that sense the rent accrues from day to day. It is on that principle that interest is apportionable as it accrues on a note or other interest-bearing obligation. Manning v. Randolph, 4 N. J. L. 145; Re Lackawanna Iron & Coal Co. 37 N. J. Eq. 26. In the latter case it is said: "Interest due on a bond and mortgage was always apportionable on the ground that it accrued from day to day." The New York statute differs from ours in the fact that the former makes it optional with the tenant whether he will end the term.

In Johnson v. Oppenheim, 55 N. Y. 280, at page 285, the New York statute is declared to be remedial, and to permit the tenant to quit and surrender. "It gives to the tenant the option, when the demised premises are no longer capable of beneficial enjoyment, to terminate and annul the lease." It requires the surrender of the possession as a release to the tenant from the payment of rent, if he elects to avail himself of its provisions. Our statute, as above pointed out, destroys the estate of the tenant, and thereby takes away from him all enjoyment of the premises,—a pointed distinction which must be made in comparing the two enactments, regarding the right of recovery of a pro rata of rent previously paid. The logical dissenting opinion of Parker, Ch. J., in Craig v. Butler, supra, is referred to as showing that even the less rigorous New York statute may well be construed to allow such recovery. The next case is Werner v. Padula, 49 App. Div. 135, 63 N. Y. Supp. 68, affirmed in 167 N. Y. 611, 60 N. E. 1122. That case arose upon the wording of a lease, and not upon the statute, which wording follows almost literally and quite substantially the language of our own act. The New York court held that the terms of the lease and their statute amount to precisely the same thing, and had exactly the same meaning, and therefore held that the case was governed by Craig v. Butler. The variation above pointed out between the two statutes received no attention or comment.

The case of Felix v. Griffiths, 56 Ohio St. 39, 45 N. E. 1092, arose likewise upon the construction of a lease. It was agreed that, in case the building from any cause should grow unfit for occupancy, the parties should not be liable to pay rent after the tenant should have surrendered possession of the premises. The court said that, by this agreement, the tenant exempted himself from payment of rent after surrender. Without comment upon the conclusion of the court as being a correct disposition of the case, it has no great bearing upon our statute. As the court said the parties "in distinct language limited that exemption to exoneration of the lessee after the surrender." The surrender was voluntary, and the selection of the time when it should be made.

A Wisconsin case—Cross v. Button, 4 Wis. 468—was also a covenant in a lease providing for a deduction to be made for rent for the time the tenant should be deprived of the use of the building destroyed. The court held that the deduction should be made, but from the unpaid rent falling due from the next quarter, and not from the rent already paid, and therefore would not construe it into a covenant to refund the rent already due and paid. It will be observed that it did not provide for a termination of the lease by fire, and therefore the question of refunding as here presented was not necessarily involved. But the apportionment of the rent was indirectly conceded. The case of Copeland v. Goldsmith, 100 Wis. 436, 76 N. W. 358, does not differ from Cross v. Button, and was decided on the authority of that case. Lieberthal v. Montgomery, 121 Mich. 369, 80 N. W. 115, was also on a covenant in a lease. It was there held that payment in advance was voluntary under the covenant, and that the earlier cases above referred to were conclusive upon the court. These cases thus cited by the plaintiff fail to overcome the theory which we advance, for our statute necessarily implies an apportionment as well as an enforced cessation of the lease. The mere fact that the parties in the lease agreed that the rent should be payable in advance will not be construed to mean that, under the proviso reading, "provided always that this section shall not extend or apply to cases where the parties have otherwise stipulated in their agreement of lease," they have assented that the statute shall not apply. There is no reference in the lease to the statute or to its subject-matter. Concededly advance payments merely modify the operation of the act. It is not claimed that such payments would avert its action in terminating the lease. They have not stipulated that the "section shall not extend to or apply" to the lease.

Of the cases cited by the defendant, it is admitted that Porter v. Tull, 6 Wash. 408, 22 L.R.A. 613, 36 Am. St. Rep. 172, 33 Pac. 965, is in point. Rich v. Smith, 121 Mass. 328, has to this extent a bearing in the defendant's favor that, in the absence of a direct covenant to repay, a repayment may be enforced upon a construction of a clause of a lease providing for the "suspension and abatement" of a just and proportionate part of the rent. Taylor v. Hart, 73 Miss. 22, 30 L.R.A. 716, 18 So. 546; Coogan v. Parker, 2 S. C. 255, 16 Am. Rep. 659; Lanpher v. Glenn, 37 Minn. 4, 33 N. W. 10, and Whitaker v. Hawley, 25 Kan. 674, 37 Am. Rep. 277, seem not to be specially instructive upon the questions involved.

To the plaintiff's contention that she is supported by cases involving surrender, eviction, dispossession, and condemnation, and those between heir and personal representative and life tenant and remainder—33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

man, a complete answer lies in the fact that the common-law doctrine that rent will not be apportioned in these cases has not been changed by statute. In the present case, as before remarked, the statute by fair construction makes rent apportionable, not generally, but only when the occasion therefor arises by reason of the destruction of the buildings.

The judgment of the Supreme Court will be reversed, to the end that a new trial may be granted.

v.

WILEY BAKER et al., Plffs. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 71 S. E. 186.)

Gaming — keeping house — misdemeanor.

1. The keeping of a common gaming house is a misdemeanor at common law, and consequently a violation of the law of this state. Same — select company.

2. That only those who gamble are admitted to the room where the gambling is carried on, and the rest of the public are excluded therefrom, does not affect the crime.

Same — gaming lawful.

3. The keeping of a common gaming house is unlawful, whether the gambling therein be lawful or unlawful.

Same — profit.

4. It is not material that a common gaming house should be kept for lucre or profit.

Same — publicity.

5. It is not essential, to constitute the offense of keeping a common gaming house, that the gambling therein should be in view of the public, or that the public should be disturbed by noise therein.

(April 25, 1911.)

Note. — Offense of keeping a gaming house as affected by restrictions on admission.

The holding in STATE v. BAKER, to the effect that the fact that only those who desired to gamble were admitted does not prevent the place from being a common gaming house, is in accord with the prior decisions upon the question.

Thus, where an incorporated club having 150 members occupied rooms which were commonly used for gambling by members of ERROR to the Circuit Court for Cabell County to review a judgment convicting defendants of keeping a common gaming house. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Jean F. Smith, for the State:

At common law, a common gaming house is a nuisance, and persons who are in the occupation and control of such a house are guilty of maintaining a nuisance.

Mr. William G. Conley, Attorney General, also for the State.

Williams, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

Wiley Baker and Dick Rader were indicted, tried, and convicted, and adjudged by the circuit court of Cabell county to pay a fine of $50 each and the costs of their prosecution, for keeping a common gaming the club and such persons as they invited there, it was held to be a common gaming house. Com. v. Blankinship, 165 Mass. 40, 42 N. E. 115. The court said: "Gaming houses in this country and in England are seldom open to all the public. Usually only those persons are admitted who are supposed to be willing to have the law violated in this way. Often strong doors and double locks are used to keep out, not only officers of the law, but all others who are not known to the proprietor or vouched for by his friends. The word 'common' as applied to a gaming house does not necessarily mean that it is open to all the public. The rulings requested and refused in the present case assume that the building was commonly resorted to, . . . not only by the members of the club, but by such other persons as they chose to invite there. If so resorted to, it might well be found to be a common gaming house."

And it was held in Jenks v. Turpin, L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 505, 15 Cox, C. C. 486, 50 L. T. N. S. 808, 53 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 161, 49 J. P. 20, that the fact that gaming was limited to the subscribers and members of a club, and that it was not open to all desirous of entering, did not prevent the club from being a common gaming house.

And in Cochran v. State, 102 Ga. 631, 29 S. E. 438, the evidence was held sufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty against the defendant for keeping a gambling house, where it appeared that he was an officer of a social club and knew that gambling was going on, and that part of the losses went to the use of the club.

So, in Com. v. Warren, 161 Mass. 281, 37 N. E. 172, it was held that there was sufficient evidence that the building in question was a common gaming house, although a part of the evidence showed that it was protected by a thick oak door which was fastened with an oak bar, and that the officers were unable to gain admission by knocking.

And it was held in State v. Black, 94 N. C. 809, that whether few or many were allowed to resort to a house for gambling purposes was immaterial.

And in State v. Mosby, 53 Mo. App. 571, where the defendant was indicted for keeping a common gaming house, and there was evidence that the playing was in a room used as a bedroom, and that the one handiest the door opened it to anyone who knocked, a conviction was upheld, the court saying that a gaming house could consist of a single rented room, and that it need not necessarily be open to the whole public in common.

And a verdict of guilty of keeping a gaming house is warranted by evidence that a social, genial man, fond of company and a glass, keeps his sleeping apartment with the doors "blanketed" in a fit condition for privately gaming therein, that he invites his friends at night to refresh themselves with beer, and has in the room a table suitable for gaming, a number of packs of cards, two boxes of "chips" and a memorandum book with names and numbers entered therein, and that some of his guests retire under the bed when the police visit the room at 1 o'clock in the morning. Pacetti v. State, 82 Ga. 297, 7 S. E. 867.

But an act providing that no house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof, or any person using the same, betting with persons resorting thereto, does not apply to a case where only members of a regular club bet with each other, such act being aimed at houses receiving money from improvident persons. Downes v. Johnson [1895] 2 Q. B. 203, 64 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 238. 15 Reports, 466, 72 L. T. N. S. 728, 43 Week. Rep. 556, 59 J. P. 487.

Is the keeping of a common gaming house a violation of the law of this state? We think it is. It was certainly an offense at the common law. "Common gaming houses are a public nuisance at common law, being detrimental to the public, as they promote cheating and other corrupt practices, and incite to idleness and avaricious ways of gaining property persons whose time might otherwise be employed for the good of the community." 2 Russell, Crimes, 7th Eng. ed. 1897; 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 504. In § 1135, Bishop says: "A common gaming house is a species of disorderly house; the disorder consisting of its allurements tending to evil." Its unlawfulness does not depend upon the unlawfulness of the games which may be therein played. The keeping of a common gaming house is forbidden because it is a public nuisance, tending to evil consequences. All the text writers say that it is in indictable offense at the common law. Joyce, Nuisances, § 395; 1 Wood, Nuisances, § 45; Bacon, Abr. p. 223; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 666; 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 893; Woods v. Cottrell, 55 W. Va. 476, 65 L.R.A. 616, 104 Am. St. Rep. 1004, 47 S. E. 275, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 933; State v. Ehrlick, 65 W. Va. 700, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 691, 64 S. E. 935; Com. v. Warren, 161 Mass. 281, 37 N. E. 172; Thrower v. State, 117 Ga. 753, 45 S. E. 126, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 315.

The common law of England was made a part of the law of Virginia, and later, the law of this state. In May, 1776, Virginia passed an ordinance providing that "the common law of England, all statutes or acts of Parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the First, and which are of a general nature, not local to that Kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force until the same shall be altered by the legislative power of this colony." 9 Henning's Statutes at Large, 127. The general assembly by act passed December 27, 1792, repealed so much of the above ordinance as relates to the English statutes made in aid of the common law; but that part of the ordinance making the common law a part of the law of Virginia was not repealed, and the common law of England continued to be the law of Virginia. 1 Min. 51. The first Constitution (1861-63) of West Virginia, which became 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the law of the state upon its admission into the Union (§ 8, art. 11), declares: "Such parts of the common law and of the laws of the state of Virginia as are in force within the boundaries of the state of West Virginia when this Constitution goes into operation, and are not repugnant thereto, shall be and continue the law of this state until altered or repealed by the legislature." And § 21 of article 8 of the present Constitution (Code 1906, lxiii.) also declares the common law to be the law of this state until altered or repealed by the legislature. There is no statute in this state which repealed the common law in relation to the offense of keeping a common gaming house; and the common law relating thereto is the law of this state. The statutes against gaming do not repeal by implication the common-law offense of keeping a common gaming house.

The demurrer to the indictment was properly overruled. The offense of keeping a common gaming house is sufficiently alleged. The fact that the indictment alleges that the games which were played in the house kept by defendants were unlawful games is immaterial. Such allegation may be treated as surplusage. It is not necessary that the games which were played should have been unlawful in order to constitute the offense with which defendants are charged.

The state produced a number of witnesses who testified that they had gambled in the room kept by defendants, and that they sometimes lost money, and sometimes won money, at a game played with cards called "stud poker." It does not appear that any greater amount of money than $1 or $2 was ever won or lost by one person at any one game or sitting. But the amount won or lost is immaterial, as the amount of money or value of the thing gambled for constitutes no part of the offense of keeping a common gaming house.

It appears that the gambling room was over Rau's barber shop in the city of Huntington, and had to be reached by way of an alley. A stairway led from the alley up to a door opening into a hall or anteroom; and, in order to obtain admission, the visitor had to knock on this outer door, and, if the guard or keeper of the door was satisfied that he was a gambler, he was then admitted. From this hall or anteroom, another door led into another and still more private room, where the gambling was carried on. There was a hole in the door leading into this room, through which the keeper inside could look out in order to determine whether the visitor was a proper person to be admitted. If he was known to the gambling fraternity as a gambler, he was admitted, if not too drunk. Only those who wished to gamble were admitted. The room was kept closed, and the gambling could not be seen except by those in the room. Some of the witnesses were advised of the location of this gambling room by persons on the street who knew its location, and who would tell them when a game was going on. It appears that this room was only kept and used for the purpose of gambling. It does not appear that the room was used for any other purpose than as a gambling place. Neither does it appear that the defendants kept this gaming house for gain or lucre. It is testified to by at least one witness, who says he used to run the place himself, that the defendants kept this gaming house in the year 1909 prior to October. The indictment was found on the 28th of October, 1909. Defendants offered no testimony, and there is no conflict in the evidence. Defendants rested upon their motion to strike out the state's evidence. This motion was overruled by the court, and the case allowed to go to the jury, and defendants excepted.

The fact that it is not proven that defendants kept the room for lucre is not material. True, some authorities hold that, to constitute the offense of keeping a common gaming house, it must be alleged and proven that it was kept for gain or lucre; but the better opinion, as well as the weight of authority, is to the contrary. The offense consists in the keeping of a gaming house. The keeping of such house is, in law, a public nuisance. Its character as a nuisance in no wise depends upon the matter of profit to those who maintain it. 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, §§ 1086, 1137; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 715.

That the game was not carried on in view of the outside public, or that the public was not disturbed by noise from within, does not affect the case. These are not necessary elements of the offense. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 697, and cases cited in notes 3 and 4.

It is none the less a common gaming house because only those who desired to gamble were admitted within its walls. Says Hawkins, J., in Jenks v. Turpin, L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 515: "To no gaming house is the public at large invited to go without restriction of some sort or other. The keeper of such a house has always the right to admit or refuse admission to anyone he pleases, or to make such rules as he may think fit for the regulation of such admission." Again, on the same page, the learned judge further says: "It is true that no annoying interference in the public street can be pointed to, so that in that sense a public nuisance can be said to have 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

been created; but that is not necessary,"—citing Reg. v. Rice, L. R. 1 C. C. 21, 35 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 93, 12 Jur. N. S. 126, 13 L. T. N. S. 382, 14 Week Rep. 56, 10 Cox, C. C. 155, which we do not find in the library. Com. v. Blankinship, 165 Mass. 40, 42 N. E. 115; Com. v. Warren, 161 Mass. 281, 37 N. E. 172; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 679; 20 Cya. Law & Proc. p. 893.

Counsel for defendants cite State v. Maynard, 66 W. Va. 522, 66 S. E. 688, as authority for the proposition that, in order to constitute the offense of keeping a common gaming house, it must be shown that it was carried on in a public place. That case was an indictment under § 4 of chapter 151, Code 1906, for playing cards in a public place, and the proof showed that the playing was carried on in a secluded place. It was quite a different case from the present one. There the player was indicted for playing cards at a public place, a statutory offense; here the keepers are indicted for keeping a common gaming house, a common-law offense, and it matters not whether the gambling carried on in the house was visible to the general public, or was lawful or unlawful. This case is not controlled by that one.

We find no error in the judgment of the court below, and it will be affirmed.

ROSA G. BOYLE

v.

BOSTON ELEVATED RAILWAY COMPANY.

(208 Mass. 41, 94 N. E. 247.)

Evidence — paper in possession of adversary.

1. One party cannot make a paper otherwise incompetent as evidence competent in

Note. — Effect of calling for and inspecting document to make it competent.

The question as to the effect of putting part of a document in evidence is not included. As to the effect of putting in evidence part of books of account, see the note to Smith v. Smith, 52 L.R.A. 600.

In favor of party calling.

In BOYLE v. BOSTON ELEV. R. Co. the court persuasively contends that the language of the rule laid down by Greenleaf and in some of the cases was mere looseness of expression, and not intended to mean that an incompetent document in the opponent's hands could be made evi-his favor against his adversary, by calling for and inspecting it on its being produced on his call.

Appeal — incompetent evidence — curing by instructions.

2. Error in admitting in evidence a written statement of those in charge of a street car which was in an accident, in an action to hold the street car company liable for injuries thereby, is not cured by a charge to the effect that it is admitted only to contradict such persons' testimony as witnesses in the case, where, as to one of the witnesses, it was not admissible for that purpose because he had never adopted it by signing it, and it contains matters prejudicial to the objecting party other than those which are merely contradictory while, in a portion of the charge, the jury are authorized to use it as substantive evidence.

dence against him, against his objection, by merely calling for it, and inspecting it.

No other case has been found in which this question has arisen as to the competency of the contents of the document, but there are some English cases upon the question whether the caller for an instrument in the hands of the opposing party was compelled to prove its execution.

In Pearce v. Hooper, 3 Taunt. 60, it was held by Lord Mansfield and the whole court, that it was not necessary for the defendant to prove the due execution of a lease to the plaintiff, by a third party produced by the plaintiff on call.

So, in Rex v. Middlezoy, 2 T. R. 41, it was held that an indenture of apprenticeship produced on call by the other party did not require proof of execution (it had no subscribing witness). Buller, J., said that in civil cases a deed thus produced was prima facie taken as duly executed, as the opposite party, not knowing who were the subscribing witnesses, could not be prepared with the proof. In Bowles v. Langeworthy, 5 T. R. 366, Buller, J., refers to the Middlezoy Case as law.

But in Gordon v. Secretan, 8 East, 548, Lord Ellenborough said: "That the case of Rex v. Middlezoy, which was much questioned at the time, had been since overruled. And that it was not enough to give notice to the opposite party in a cause to produce an instrument in his hands, in order to dispense with any further proof of it by the party giving the notice; but that the production of it at the trial, in pursuance of such notice, did not supersede the necessity of proving it by one of the subscribing witnesses, if any, as in ordinary cases. And Lawrence, J., said that this had been so ruled by Lord Kenyon in a subsequent case respecting a will, which the adverse party, in whose hands it was, had notice to produce, and did produce at the trial, when it appeared that there were subscribing witnesses to it; and Lord Kenyon held that the party calling 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William G. Thompson, George E. Kimball, and F. Delano Putnam, for defendant:

Such portions of the paper produced and examined as would not otherwise be legally admissible are not made legally admissible against the objection of the party producing it, by the mere fact of such production.

Wharam v. Routledge, 5 Esp. 235; Clark v. Fletcher, 1 Allen, 53; 3 Wigm. Ev. § 2125, p. 2883; Lawrence v. Van Horne, for it was bound to call one of the subscribing witnesses to prove the instrument. Lord Ellenborough, Ch. J., added that the case of a will showed strongly the necessity of adhering to the strict rule of proof." See also Wetherston v. Edgington, 2 Campb. 94.

In favor of producer—mere notice to produce.

It is universally held that the mere notice to produce a paper will not make it evidence for the producer. Randel v. Chesapeake & D. Canal Co. 1 Harr. (Del.) 284; Hutchinson v. Gordon, 2 Harr. (Del.) 179; Morrison v. Whiteside, 17 Md. 452, 79 Am. Dec. 661; Anderson v. Root, 8 Smedes & M. 362; Com. v. Davidson, 1 Cush. 33; Joost v. Scott, 19 Tex. 474; Riocker Nat. Bank v. Brown, — Tex. Civ. App.—, 43 S. W. 909; see also to the same effect, Blight v. Ashley, Pet. C. C. 15, Fed. Cas. No. 1,541, where, however, it does not seem clear that there was no inspection.

In State v. Wisdom, 8 Port. (Ala.) 511, the appellate court, in sustaining the exclusion of a bill of sale offered by the producer without proof of its authenticity, said: "If produced on the motion it may be read by the party who has requested its production, but if he does not choose to give it in evidence, the mere notice will not have the effect to allow the party in whose possession it has been, to read it without proof. 2 Starkie, Ev. 360."

—rule that inspection renders paper admissible.

The so-called "English rule" is that if one party calls for a paper and inspects it, it is thereby made evidence in favor of the producer. For cases sustaining this rule, see Edison Electric Light Co. v. United States Electric Lighting Co. 45 Fed. 55; Coote v. Bank of United States, 3 Cranch, C. C. 50, Fed. Cas. No. 3,203 (as Messrs. W. Flaherty, D. H. Coakley, and J. F. Creed for plaintiff.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are of opinion that the exception must be sustained which was taken to the admission in evidence of a typewritten statement of an examination of the motorman and conductor of the car here in question. This examination was made by one Shea, who was employed in the defendant's claim department, a few days after the accident.

Just before the end of the direct examination of the motorman (who was called as a witness by the defendant), this statement of Shea's examination and the accident report made by the same two employees were marked for identification. At the end of the motorman's examination, counsel for the plaintiff asked for the "report," by which he must be taken to have meant the accident report. The counsel for the defendant objected to giving it to him then, saying that he had not a right to read it until he cross-examined, and the presiding judge said to the counsel for the plaintiff that he had no right to it unless it went in evidence. Thereupon a colloquy ensued, the meaning of which is not altogether clear. But as we construe it, counsel for the defendant said that if the report which counsel for the plaintiff called

See also cases cited infra.

"The reason for this rule is that it would give an unconscionable advantage to a party to enable him to pry into the affairs of his adversary, without at the same time subjecting him to the risk of making whatever he inspects evidence for both parties." Ellison v. Cruser, 40 N. J. L. 444.

The English foundation for this rule is by no means satisfactory. It was upheld by Lord Ellenborough in Wharam v. Routledge, 5 Esp. 235.

So, in Calvert v. Flower, 7 Car. & P. 386, where Kelly, the defendant's counsel, called for the ledger of the plaintiff's intestate, Lord Denman said and held: "I ought now to say that if Mr. Kelly looks at the book, he will be bound to put it in as his evidence."

But in Wilson v. Bowie, 1 Car. & P. 8, Park, J., having looked at the paper produced, said that it need not be read, as it was not material to the case at all; and observed that if the plaintiff's counsel call for a paper, and look at it, they must read it in evidence if it is at all material to the case; but if it does not bear on the case, they need not read it.

And in Sayer v. Kitchen, 1 Esp. 209, Lord Kenyon held, "if the counsel on one side called for the other's books, and made no use of them, that it was only matter of observation to the counsel on the other side, that the entries there were in favor of his client, but did not entitle him to use them as evidence to be offered to the jury." It would appear that this means that after inspection the books were not evidence to the producing party.

In Massachusetts the rule was not at first certain. Thus, in Com. v. Davidson, 1 Cush. 33, the court said "that whether calling for the books of the opposite party and inspecting them, and doing nothing more, makes the book evidence, is a mooted point."

In Clark v. Fletcher, 1 Allen, 53, the rule was sustained, also, following this case, in Long v. Drew, 114 Mass. 77.

As is stated in BOYLE v. BOSTON ELEV. R. Co., the rule in New Hampshire is practically the same as that in Massachusetts. The New Hampshire cases hold that the party producing a document may offer it upon the condition that if it is inspected it becomes evidence for the producer. Huckins v. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co. 31 N. H. 238; Austin v. Thomson, 45 N. H. 113, where, however, the court, after stating that the English cases do not support the "English rule," says further: "As the party notified is not obliged to produce the papers, and as he may, if he produces them, decline to allow them to be examined, except upon the condition that, if examined, they shall be read in evidence (Huckins v. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co. 31 N. H. 238), parties notified seem amply protected from any such unconscionable advantage, and the reason stated entirely fails; and we see no sufficient reason for a rule that is at variance with the general course of our practice, and that can hardly facilitate the administration of justice, since, if it has any practical effect in addition to the rules for the admission of competent evidence, it must be to compel the court to allow incompetent evidence to go to the jury. See Gordon v. Secretan, 8 East, 548."

In Wentworth v. McDuffie, 48 N. H. 402, it was held that as the defendant had a right to refuse to produce his memorandum book, except upon the condition that if the plaintiff examined the memorandum, it should be read in evidence, if he did not annex that condition, he could not complain of only a part of it being read in evidence by the other party, and he was not allowed to put the rest of it in evidence.

Where the plaintiff had taken a deposition referring to a book of accounts in his possession, the question and answer referring to the book were stricken out upon the trial on the defendant's motion, but for was to be put in evidence he would produce "the whole paper." Then the counsel for the plaintiff said that he would like the "reports and all the rest of them." Thereupon the defendant's counsel handed the plaintiff's counsel the accident report and the typewritten statement of the examination conducted by Shea. Later the counsel for the plaintiff began to read the Shea statement to the jury, and, the defendant's counsel objecting, the presiding judge ruled that if a paper is called for and used "as a basis for cross-examination, it goes in." To this ruling the defendant took an exception. The counsel for the plaintiff then had the conductor recalled to the witness stand, and proceeded to read from the typewritten statement of Shea's examination this question, as a question put by Shea to the conductor at the time Shea examined him as to the accident: "The cause of the accident in your opinion was what?" He also began to read the conductor's answer to it, when the defendant's counsel objected on the ground that it was "mere theorizing." The counsel for the plaintiff stated that he proposed "to contradict his [the conductor's] statement, by showing [that] he made a different statement." The defendant's counsel said that as to fact he had no objection, but that the conductor's theories were not competent. The presiding judge then made this ruling: "I think, so far, he has not made any statement that tends to contradict anything he has said here. It is competent were restored later when the defendant inspected the book. Merrill v. Merrill, 67 Me. 70.

In Reed v. Anderson, 12 Cush. 481, it was held that for a party to bring his case within the rule which enabled him to put in evidence a document which he had produced at the request of the other party, which has been inspected, but not used by the other party, it must appear that the document is the identical one which was called for by the other party.

So, in Harper v. Ely, 70 Ill. 581, where a party notified to produce his books, produced his ledger, but not his books of original entry, and, on the ledger being inspected by the opposite party, the producer claimed it had become evidence by such inspection, this was denied by the court, as it was not the book called for, the court stating that if the claim had been made that a book which had been called for was thus made evidence, a different question would have been presented, which was not decided.

It was, however, held in Clark v. Fletcher, supra, that the rule is not altered by the fact that the party calling for the paper misapprehended the nature of its contents.

It has been held that the rule does not apply on a second trial to documents called for on the first trial, but that in such case they must be called for again to admit of the rule. Ellison v. Cruser, 40 N. J. L. 444. The contrary was held in Wooten v. Nall, 18 Ga. 609.

In Cushman v. Coleman, 92 Ga. 772, 19 S. E. 46, it was held that the production of such writings will not suffice to make them evidence for the producing party on the trial of another and entirely different case, though brought by the same plaintiffs against the same defendants, and for the same cause of action.

—rule that inspection does not make paper admissible.

Other cases have held that inspection of 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a document produced on call does not make it evidence for the producer. Price v. Garland, 3 N. M. 505, 6 Pac. 472.

Where, in an action against a street car company for personal injuries from negligence, it appeared on cross-examination of two of the employees of the defendant, that they had made reports to it about the matter, and the plaintiff called for these reports, and put in evidence only a part of one of them, it was held that the defendant was limited to offering any part of this particular report, and, as to it, could offer only such part as had relation to the matters in it which the plaintiff had already put in evidence. Laufer v. Bridgeport Traction Co. 68 Conn. 475, 37 L.R.A. 533, 37 Atl. 379.

The leading authority in New York is Smith v. Rentz, 131 N. Y. 169, 15 L.R.A. 138, 30 N. E. 54, where the court said, in holding that the calling for and inspection of the ledger of the defendant's testator did not make it evidence for the plaintiff: "The party who has in his possession books or papers which may be material to the case of his opponent has no moral right to conceal them from his adversary. If, on inspection, the party calling for them finds nothing to his advantage, his omission to put them in evidence does not prevent the party producing them from proving and introducing them in evidence, if they are competent against the other party. The party calling for books and papers would be subjected to great hazard if an inspection merely, without more, would make them evidence in the case. That rule tends rather to the suppression, than the ascertainment, of truth, and the opposite rule is, as it seems to us, better calculated to promote the ends of justice."

This case was followed in Reed v. Zimmerman, 1 Misc. 189, 20 N. Y. Supp. 665.

The same principle was sustained in Caradine v. Hotchkiss, 120 N. Y. 608, 24 N. E. 1020, and in Rumsey v. Lovell, Anthon, N. P. 17.

In Smith v. Rentz, supra, the court points out that in Lawrence v. Van Horn, 1 Caines, 276, the judges were not agreed on that ground." To this the defendant excepted. The Shea statement then was admitted in evidence under the defendant's exception, and was read to the jury and was sent with them into the jury room.

The Shea statement was signed by Leach, the conductor, but not by Ridge, the motor-man. So far as Leach's statements there set forth contradicted the testimony given by Leach on the witness stand, it was competent as a written statement signed by Leach which contradicted his testimony, and the defendant's counsel did not object to so much of the Shea statement being admitted in evidence. But so far as the Shea statement contradicted Ridge, it was not competent, because it never had been adopted by Ridge as his statement.

It is now contended by the plaintiff's counsel that the Shea statement was produced by the defendant upon the promise of the plaintiff to put it in evidence. While the bill of exceptions on this point is not entirely clear, we do not on the whole so construe it. And we are confirmed in this by the fact that when it was admitted in in opinion, and that in Kenny v. Clarkson, 1 Johns. 385, 3 Am. Dec. 336, Spencer, J., said: "I must not be understood as sanctioning the course adopted at the trial in admitting the paper to be read without proof because notice had been given to produce it, and it had been called for and perused."

The opinion in BOYLE v. BOSTON ELEV. R. Co. seems to be in error as to Pennsylvania. In Summers v. M'Kim, 12 Serg. & R. 405, the "English" rule seems to have been squarely denied. In that case the court said: "In the present instance, it appears that the paper produced by the defendant, on the call of the plaintiffs, contained something which they had no reason to expect, and which could not have been given in evidence by the defendant. In such case, without laying down any general rule, I think it most conducive to justice, to permit the plaintiffs to waive the reading of it, and leave the defendant to make such use of it as he lawfully may, without regard to the call which was made on him."

The observations of the court in Farmers' & M. Bank v. Israel, 6 Serg. & R. 293, are too general and immaterial to be of much value.

In Texas also, while it was held in Saunders v. Duval, 19 Tex. 467, that production of papers upon notice does not make them evidence unless the party calling for them inspects them, and in Ricker Nat. Bank v. Brown, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 43 S. W. 909, that a notice to produce, where the documents are not offered, will not make an incompetent document evidence for the producer, in Ellis v. Randle, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 475, 60 S. W. 462, the court said: "We regard the question . . . as an open one in this state, and are inclined to the opinion that sound reason and the weight of authority is against the English rule." In that case, a number of letters had been produced on demand and examined by the other party, and some of them not put in evidence, and the producer was not allowed to put in the omitted letters. There was, however, other evidence of the facts recited in the letters so omitted, and the court held that there was no error in ruling.

Miscellaneous.

While the effect of putting in evidence

part of a document called for is without the scope of this note, reference may be here made to cases relating to the effect of putting in evidence one or more of several produced documents.

Thus, where the plaintiff called for one paper, and the defendant tendered four, the court said if any other papers were offered, he was not obliged to take them unless he wished to do so; that those not called for did not become evidence without his inspection. Rea v. Randel, 2 Harr. (Del.) 500.

In Heaffer v. New Era L. Ins. Co. 101 Pa. 178, where, in an action of a policy of life insurance, the plaintiff called upon the defendant to produce all proofs of death of the insured, meaning thereby the proofs of death with which he had furnished the defendant, and the defendant's counsel thereupon handed to the plaintiff a package of papers from which the latter selected those he desired, the other papers produced by defendant being certain letters purporting to be denials by the beneficiary of any application for the policy, it was held that it was error to compel the plaintiff to offer all the papers produced.

But it was held in Re Thorn, 2 Pa. St. 331, where two papers were produced on call, that it was proper to prohibit that one be read without the other.

And in an early case in New York, where the defendant, by an order of court compelled the plaintiff to produce all letters which he had relating to a certain voyage, and proposed to read only two of them, it was held that the plaintiff had the right to read any of the letters in evidence. Lawrence v. Ocean Ins. Co. 11 Johns. 241. This case was followed in Raymond v. Howland, 17 Wend. 389.

In Boudinot v. Winter, 190 Ill. 394, 60 N. E. 553, the court said: "We know of no principle that will enable a party to a suit to call upon his adversary for the production of documentary evidence, and, when it is so produced, claim the benefit of such part or portion thereof as may be to his advantage, and, at the same time, reject such part as tends against him and also deprive his opponent of the right to its use."

evidence it was not admitted by the presiding judge on that ground.

It is stated in Clark v. Fletcher, 1 Allen, 53, and Long v. Drew, 114 Mass. 77, on the authority of 1 Greenleaf on Ev. § 563, that if a paper is called for by one party, and is inspected by him, it becomes evidence for both parties at the trial. We assume that the ruling of the presiding judge was made on the authority of that statement. But that statement of Prof. Greenleaf does not mean that a party can make a paper (not otherwise competent as evidence) competent evidence in his own behalf by calling for it, and inspecting it on its being produced on his call. All that is meant by that statement is that, if one party calls for a paper and inspects it, it is thereby made evidence in favor but not against the party who produces it. When Prof. Greenleaf said that if it is produced and inspected it becomes evidence for both parties, he had in mind the case of a paper which was evidence against the party producing it, and, speaking of such a case, he said that if the paper is called for and inspected it becomes evidence for both parties. As we have said, there is no basis for the contention that if a paper is not competent as evidence, a party can make it so by calling for it and inspecting it.

The English rule on which Clark v. Fletcher and Long v. Drew, supra, were founded, was, without question, that if a paper was called for and inspected it became evidence for but not against the party producing it. See Calvert v. Flower, 7 Car. & P. 386; 3 Wigmore, Ev. p. 2885, § 2125, note 2.

Under the Massachusetts rule the plaintiff had no right to put the Shea statement in evidence, against the objection of the defendant. The presiding judge in one portion of his charge told the jury that "the statements of two of the men have been presented to you. They are offered upon the theory, coming in that way, that they precent contradictions to the statements that the witnesses have had [made] here. Whatever they contain, they are not substantive and affirmative evidence of the truth of what they contain, but they are only evidence to enable you to judge as to how much credibility you will give to the testimony upon this witness stand of that same witness whose statements they contain or purport to contain. So that, in considering those, they have to be considered in conjunction with the witness who is said to have made the statement, and it is out of the statement and his whole testimony that the truth of that witness as to the story he tells, and just 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

what effect and weight you give to it, is to be determined."

This did not cure the error in admitting the whole of the Shea statement for several reasons. In the first place none of the Shea statements was admissible to contradict Ridge. In the second place, so far as Leach is concerned, from what is stated in the bill of exceptions, the statement must be taken to have contained matters prejudicial to the defendant, other than the parts which contradicted Leach's testimony. And lastly, in a later part of his charge the judge told the jury that the Shea statement could be used as substantive evidence. He said: "In the papers that are to be submitted to you, and here and there through the evidence in the case, there are and there have been references to injuries to other people in this same accident. Those are not of any consequence as far as you are concerned, except in one single respect, and that is whether they indicate to your minds, with the other description of the falling of the car, etc., that the force that was applied to this plaintiff's person would be adequate to account for the things that she says have come to her since."

We have been asked by the defendant to reconsider the rule of practice established in Clark v. Fletcher and Long v. Drew, supra, on the ground that it is not founded on principle and is against the weight of modern practice. It seems to be law in Delaware, Georgia, Maine, Mississippi, Pennsylvania, and Texas (see 3 Wigmore, Ev. p. 2885, § 2125, note 4). It has been decided not to be law in New York and Connecticut, and has been repudiated by statute in California, Idaho, Iowa, Montana, and Nebraska (see 3 Wigmore, pp. 2885, 2886, § 2125, note 5); and there is some reason to suppose that it is not now law in England (see 3 Wigmore, Ev. p. 2885, § 2125, note 3). It has been said that the rule has been repudiated in New Hampshire. But the result of the practice authorized in Austin v. Thomson, 45 N. H. 113, is in effect the same as the Massachusetts rule. It is not necessary to go into this question in the case at bar, for, if calling for and perusing a paper does not make it evidence for either party, the presiding judge was wrong in admitting the Shea statement.

We ought to add, in view of a possible new trial, that we do not agree with the defendant's counsel in his contention as to the statement made by Leach that in his opinion the cause of the accident was oscillation. He testified on the stand that as the car left the bridge and began to go down grade, he "observed a grating sound, and immediately the car tipped, took an unusual tip, and settled on its side," and it went off the bank "immediately." A jury would be warranted in finding that Leach would not have said that in his opinion the cause of the accident was oscillation, if he had heard the grating sound which he testified to.

Exceptions sustained.

Note. — Intent on part of bankrupt to create a preference as a condition of a voidable preference under § 60b.

Allied closely with this question is that of the validity of a transfer to secure a pre-existing debt within four months of the bankruptcy, in the absence of any intent on part of the debtor to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, or of reasonable cause on the part of the creditor to believe that it was intended as a preference,—which was the subject of annotation in 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 372.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Bernalillo County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount of a payment made by Jasper N. Broyles, bankrupt, to the defendant bank on an indebtedness, as a voidable preference. Affirmed.

Statement by Parker, J.:

This was an action brought by appellee against appellant under subdivision "b" of § 60 of the bankruptcy act (act July 1,

The cases which come within the scope of this note are confined to a discussion of intent upon the part of the debtor as an essential element of a preference under § 60b, and § 57g since the amendment of 1903. The latter section provides as follows, the language in quotation marks indicating the amendment of 1903: The claims of creditors who have received preferences "voidable under § 60, subdivision b, or to whom conveyances, transfers, assignments, or encumbrances void or voidable under § 67, subdivision e, have been made or given" [32 Stat. at L. 799, chap. 487, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 1314], shall not be allowed, unless such creditors shall surrender "such" preferences, "conveyances, transfers, assignments, or encumbrances." It should be noted that, for the purposes of this note, no benefit is to be derived from the consideration of the cases determining whether intent is an element of a fraudulent conveyance under § 67e, for that section expressly provides that the debtor must have made the transfer "with the intent and purpose on his part to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors." The same is true of cases involving § 3 (a) 2, declaring a transfer made with intent to prefer creditors, an act of bankruptcy.

Since nothing in § 60a, defining preferences, makes the intent of the debtor an essential element thereof, the question discussed in this note is to be determined by a consideration of § 60b. Originally, that is, in the act of 1898, this section provided that if a bankrupt should give a preference, and the person receiving it, or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, should have reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference, it should be voidable by the trustee, and he might recover the property or its value from such person.

1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 562, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3445), as follows: "If a bankrupt shall have given a preference within four months before the filing of a petition, or after the filing of the petition and before the adjudication, and the person receiving it, or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall have had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee, and he may recover the property or its value from such person."

The case was tried by the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment in favor of appellee. The court made, among others, the following findings of fact:

"(4) That the said Jaspar N. Broyles on the said 16th day of April, 1908, was insolvent, and as a reasonable man should have known from the circumstances that he was so insolvent.

"(5) That the said defendant on the said 16th and 17th days of April, 1908, in the person and through the medium of its cashier and attorney, persuaded and induced the said Jasper N. Broyles to pay and to remit to the said defendant the sum of $2,283.45, for the express purpose and with the intent to apply the same upon the indebtedness then owing by the said Broyles to the defendant.

"(6) That the effect of said payment was to enable the said defendant to secure and obtain a greater percentage of its debt than would be secured by any other of the creditors of the said Broyles of the same class.

"(7) That the said Jasper N. Broyles intended to do, and did, that which constituted giving a preference within the meaning of the bankruptcy law, namely, made a transfer to the defendant of some of his property with the effect of enabling the defendant to obtain a greater percentage of its debt than any other creditor of the same class, but he did not intend that result in the sense that he wished

By the amendment of 1910, whose enactment is probably to be accounted for by the conflict among the decisions as to whether an intent to prefer upon the part of the debtor was necessary under § 60b in the form in which it had previously existed, such section was amended so as to eliminate the provision that the creditor must have had reasonable cause to believe that a preference was intended, and to make it read that the creditor must have had reasonable cause to believe that the enforcement of such judgment or transfer "would effect a preference." While no cases have been found to involve the amendment, it would seem that the language of the amendment is so clear as to leave it beyond doubt that Congress meant to declare that an intent upon the part of the debtor to create a preference is not necessary in order to render a particular transaction a preference under § 60b.

However, cases involving § 60b as it stood before the amendment are hereto subjoined, for the purpose of showing the state of the law which doubtless moved Congress to pass the amendment.

On one hand, the view was taken that to bring a preference within § 60b, so that it must be surrendered as a prerequisite to proof of claims under § 57g as amended by the act of 1903, a preference must actually have been intended by the debtor, or there must have existed what the law regards as the equivalent thereof, the court reasoning that reasonable cause for the transferee to believe that a preference is intended cannot exist, unless the intent itself is in existence. Hardy v. Gray, 75 C. C. A. 562, 144 Fed. 922, 16 Am. Bankr. Rep. 387.

For, it is argued, if the payment is made by the bankrupt without thought of injuring other creditors, and in the belief that he will be able to pay them all, the transferee cannot be charged with reasonable cause to believe that a preference was intended, so as to render the transaction voidable under § 60b. Tumlin v. Bryan (5th Circuit) 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 960, 165 Fed. 166, 21 Am. Bankr. Rep. 319, followed in Pounds v. Bryan (5th Circuit) 91 C. C. A. 203, 165 Fed. 169.

It was expressly held in Re Mayo Contracting Co. (D. C. Mass.) 157 Fed. 469, 19 Am. Bankr. Rep. 551, following Hardy v. Gray, that to make a transfer such a preference as is voidable under § 60b, and therefore a preference which must be surrendered under § 57g, it must have been actually intended on the debtor's part, or there must have existed what the law regards as the equivalent of such an actual intent on his part, and that such an intent is not to be conclusively presumed from the mere fact that the debtor knows himself to be insolvent according to the definition in the bankruptcy act.

And a referee writing in Re Ebert, 1 Am. Bankr. Rep. 340, gave it as his opinion that to render a preference voidable under § 60b, it must have been given with a view to creating a preference, although it seems that the statement was not necessary to a decision of the case, for the reason that there was no evidence that the transferee had reasonable cause to believe that preference was intended.

And in Re First Nat. Bank (6th Circuit) 84 C. C. A. 16, 155 Fed. 100, 18 Am. Bankr. Rep. 766, the court inclined to the opinion that the reasonable implication of the language of § 60b, requiring that the creditor have reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was intending to give him the preference, is that the debtor himself must have intended the preference; but the real ground upon which the court held a preference not voidable was that there was in fact no preference and that the transaction constior proposed to have the defendant obtain a greater percentage of its claim than any other creditor of its class.

"(8) That the defendant and its cashier, being the same officer who secured the payment on the said 16th day of April, 1908, had reasonable ground to believe that the said Jaspar N. Broyles was insolvent, and that it was the purpose of the defendant, and was intended by the transaction, to grant and secure to the said defendant a preference.

"(9) That the said Jaspar N. Broyles thereafter, and within four months of the said 16th day of April, 1908, was duly adjudicated a bankrupt, and the plaintiff duly appointed his trustee in bankrupt."

Mr. E. W. Dobson, for appellant:

The bank had the right to charge said check against the Broyles account.

Intent to create a preference is necessary to avoid the transaction.

tuted a bona fide transaction supported by sufficient consideration.

And the view was taken in Rutland County Nat. Bank v. Graves (D. C. Vt.) 156 Fed. 168, 19 Am. Bankr. Rep. 446, that to render a preference voidable under § 60b, so as to make it subject to surrender under § 57g, the intent upon the part of the debtor to prefer must be present, as well as the reasonable cause upon the part of the creditor to believe that a preference was intended; but it is to be observed that the court held that both elements were lacking in this case, and, of course, want of reasonable cause upon the part of the creditor to believe that a preference was intended is sufficient to exclude the transaction from § 60b, and therefore any statement that intent upon the part of the debtor to prefer is necessary is little more than obiter dictum.

In Re Leech (6th Circuit) 96 C. C. A. 424, 171 Fed. 622, 22 Am. Bankr. Rep. 599, affirming 171 Fed. 591, it was declared that a petition for the avoidance of a preference must allege, among other things, that the transfer was intended as a preference by the debtor; but, as a matter of fact, there was such an allegation in the petition, which was held insufficient for failure to allege that the bankrupt was insolvent at the time of the transfer, and that the transferee had reason to believe that a preference was intended.

In Sparks v. Marsh (D. C. E. D. Ark.) 177 Fed. 739, it was declared that, to avoid a conveyance under § 60b, it must appear that it was intended as a preference; and in this case it was held that the transaction in question was not voidable, for the reason that the evidence, while sufficient to show that the bankrupt intended to give a preference, was insufficient to show that the creditor had reasonable ground to believe that a preference was intended.

whether a preference within the meaning of subdivision a has been created, the intention of the debtor is entirely immaterial, but that it is material in ascertaining whether the preference is voidable under § b, the court saying that the word "intended" in subdivision b is used in its ordinary sense, and means an actual intention, although in determining the existence of such intent, the court may, of course, apply the rule that one is supposed to have intended the probable results of his own acts, but that this is a rule of evidence, and not of law.

Other state courts took the view, before the amendment of 1910, that, to render a preference voidable under § 60b, intent upon the debtor to prefer was necessary. Bacon v. Merchants' Bank, 146 Ala. 521, 40 So. 413; Herzberg v. Riddle, — Ala. —, 54 So. 635; Baden v. Bertenshaw, 68 Kan. 32, 74 Pac. 639, 11 Am. Bankr. Rep. 308; Peck v. Connell, 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 22, 8 Am. Bankr. Rep. 500.

On the other hand, it was held that a particular transaction was none the less a voidable preference because the debtor did not intend it to have that effect. Western Tie & Timber Co. v. Brown, 64 C. C. A. 256, 129 Fed. 728, 12 Am. Bankr. Rep. 112. In reversing this case, the United States Supreme Court, in 196 U. S. 502, 49 L. ed. 571, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 339, 13 Am. Bankr. Rep. 447, did not expressly declare itself upon the question whether an intent to prefer upon the part of the debtor is an essential element of a voidable preference, but, in speaking of the finding that there was no such intention, said that if the inevitable result of the transaction will have the effect to create a preference, then the law will conclusively impute to the debtor the intention to bring about the result necessarily arising from the nature of his act. The precise ground of the reversal was that the transaction in question was not a voidable preference, for the reason that it brought about

Where a bank allows a customer to overdraw on the express agreement that a good account shall be assigned to the bank for collection to pay the overdraft, the subsequent actual assignment of the account does not constitute a preference.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant contends for a construction of subdivision "b" of § 60 of the bankruptcy act, to which we cannot give our consent. It contends that an actual intent on the part of the bankrupt to create a preference, as well as the fact that the creditor preferred shall have reasonable cause to believe that the transaction was intended thereby to give preference, is necessary in order to authorize the reno preference whatever, and this seems to have been placed upon the ground that an agreement between the debtor and the creditor in respect of funds of the former in the hands of the latter afforded the latter no alternative but to pay them over to the debtor in pursuance of the agreement, such being the necessary result of the finding that there was no intent upon the part of the debtor to create a preference, and that therefore, so far as such funds were concerned, the relation between them was not that of debtor and creditor, but that of trustee and cestui, the precise decision in the case being that a sum retained by a corporate creditor with knowledge of the debtor's insolvency, and within four months of the filing of the petition, which sum was due and owing the bankrupt under an agreement by which the corporation, in paying its employees, was to deduct from their wages the amounts due from such employees to the bankrupt for supplies furnished them by him, and was to remit to him the amount so deducted, irrespective of any indebtedness otherwise due by him to the corporation, was not a voidable preference under §§ 57g and 60b, which must be surrendered before the corporation could prove its claim against the bankrupt debtor's estate.

In Brewster v. Goff Lumber Co. (D. C. M. D. Pa.) 164 Fed. 124, 21 Am. Bankr. Rep. 106, the court cited the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Western Tie & Timber Co. v. Brown, and held that where the inevitable effect of the transaction is to give the transferee a greater advantage than other creditors, it will be conclusively presumed that it was so intended, even though it may be that the debtor had no idea in reality of treating the creditor any differently than any other creditor, but that the trustee must go further to make out a case for avoidance of the transfer, and show that the transferee had reasonable cause to believe that he was getting a preference.

And in Re C. J. McDonald & Sons (D. C. S. C.) 178 Fed. 487, 24 Am. Bankr. Rep. 446, affirmed without opinion in 25 Am. Bankr. Rep. 948 (4th Circuit), the court took issue with the decision in Tumlin v. Bryan (C. C. A. 5th C.) 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 960, 165 Fed. 166, 21 Am. Bankr. Rep. 796, and held that the better rule was that where the inevitable effect of the transfer is to give a preference, it must be conclusively presumed that such was the intention, thus leaving as the only question in the case, the inquiry whether the transferee had reasonable cause to believe that it was so intended.

As is said in Chiam v. Citizens' Bank, 77 Miss. 599, 27 So. 637, the motive of the bankrupt is not a matter of consideration, for, however good the motive may be, it does not affect the question, the point of inquiry being the intent, which is taken to arise out of the act; and if a payment is made by an insolvent, knowing himself to be an insolvent, the intent to prefer is conclusively presumed.

And in Re Bloch (Second Circuit) 74 C. C. A. 250, 142 Fed. 674, 15 Am. Bankr. Rep. 750, § 57g was construed to mean that before a creditor could prove a claim, he must surrender, on the one hand, a preference voidable under § 60b, upon the ground that he had reason to believe that a preference was intended, and, on the other hand, a transfer voidable under § 67e, upon the ground that the debtor made the transfer with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, the court saying that the test of such preference is the payment out of the bankrupt's property of a greater percentage to one creditor than is received by others of the same class, and that it is not necessary, in order to constitute a preference "under § 60a," that there should have been any intent to prefer on the part of a bankrupt. While the court confined its express declarations with respect to the necessity for intent to § 60a, there seems to be a fair infercovery of the subject-matter of the preference by the trustee in bankruptcy. It cites Hardy v. Gray, 75 C. C. A. 562, 144 Fed. 922, in support of the contention, which case seems to support the same. That was a case arising under subdivision "g" of § 57 of the bankruptcy act (act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 560, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3443), as amended by § 12, act Feb. 5, 1903, chap. 487, 32 Stat. at L. 799, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 1314. The amendment of 1903 brought into the section the same terms as those employed in subdivision "b" of § 60, and therefore the case is in point upon the question in this case. We refuse, however, to follow this case, for the reason that we regard the same as unsound, and as being in conflict with the controlling and much greater weight of authority.

Appellee contends that, under the statute, the intent of the bankrupt in making a preference is wholly immaterial if the preferred creditor had reason to believe that the preference was intended; and cites Western Tie & Timber Co. v. Brown, 64 C. C. A. 256, 129 Fed. 728; Re Andrews (D. C.) 135 Fed. 599; Brewster v. Goff Lumber Co. (D. C.) 164 Fed. 124; Western Tie & Timber Co. v. Brown, 196 U. S. 502, 49 L. ed. 571, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 339; and Benedict v. Deshel, 177 N. Y. 1, 68 N. E. 999, in support of his contention. In the case in 129 Fed. 728 (the circuit court of appeals of the eighth circuit), it is said: "The preferences denounced by the statute are often secured by creditors without any desire or intention on the part of the debtors to give them, as in cases in which the creditors obtain judgments against their debtors over defenses made to the action in good faith, and in cases like that at bar, where, without the consent of their debtors, creditors appropriate to the payment of their claims the property of their debtors which happens to be under their control. Such transactions are none the less voidable preferences, that the debtors do not intend them to have that effect. If they are conducted within the four months, and if they have the effect to give to the creditors who conceive and execute them larger percentages of their claims than other creditors of the same class receive, they fall as clearly under the ban of the law as transfers made by debtors with the intent on their part to give the preferences. Such a transaction is voidable by the trustee not only when the party receiving it has a reasonable cause to believe that it was intended by the debtor, but also when it was intended by the creditor, or by the actor who accomplished the result, to work a preference by means of the transactions."

The Supreme Court of the United States, in 196 U. S. 502, reversed this case, but upon another point, and upon the point in question said: "This conclusion, moreover, is the result of the finding that Harrison had no intention to give the tie company a preference, for if Harrison, being insolvent, to the knowledge of the company, within the prohibited period, gave to the tie company authority to collect the sums due to him by the laborers for goods sold them, with the right or even the option to apply the money to a prior debt due by Harrison to the company, the necessary result of the transaction would have been to create a voidable preference. And if the inevitable result of the trans-ence from the whole case that the court did not regard an intent to prefer as a prerequisite to the avoidance of a preference under § 80b, for the reason that it said that one modification effected by the amendment of 1903 to § 57g was to limit the preferences which must be surrendered to those where the person to be then benefited, or his agent, shall have had reasonable cause to believe that a preference was intended.

And in Benedict v. Deshel, 177 N. Y. 1, 68 N. E. 999, 11 Am. Bankr. Rep. 20, the court, in differentiating between § 60b and the provision of § 3, making a transfer by a debtor while insolvent, with intent to prefer the transferee over other creditors, an act of bankruptcy, said that it was for Congress to decide whether the consequences to a debtor of being forced into bankruptcy so far transcended the consequences to a creditor of a surrender of his preference, as to make the former depend upon his intent to offend the provision of the statute, and the latter not so to depend; and that there was nothing unreasonable in the distinction. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

For other cases which held intent on part of debtor to create a preference not essential under § 60b, see Parker v. Black, 143 Fed. 580, 16 Am. Bankr. Rep. 202, affirmed in 80 C. C. A. 484, 151 Fed. 18, 18 Am. Bankr. Rep. 15 (essentially standing for this view); Alexander v. Redmond, 103 C. C. A. 446, 180 Fed. 92; Gabriel v. Tonner, 138 Cal. 63, 70 Pac. 1021; Upton v. Mt. Morris Bank, 103 App. Div. 367, 92 N. Y. Supp. 1011, 14 Am. Bankr. Rep. 6; Harder v. Clark (N. Y. City Ct.) 86 Misc. 584, 123 N. Y. Supp. 1102, 23 Am. Bankr. Rep. 756.

Perhaps it will not be amiss again to state that all the cases herein cited appeared to involve § 60b as it stood before the amendment of 1910, and that, as previously suggested herein, such amendment must have been designed to meet the conflict among the decisions, and to remove about the only justification for holding intent to prefer on the part of the debtor an essential of a voidable preference under this section.

action would have been to create such a preference, then the law would conclusively impute to Harrison the intention to bring about the result necessarily arising from the nature of the act which he did." In the case in 135 Fed. 599, it is said: "It follows that a preference was given which must be surrendered before proof, if the creditor then had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference." If the debtor is insolvent, he intends preference by any payment of a pre-existing debt. If the creditor has reasonable cause to believe that the debtor is insolvent, then the creditor has reasonable cause to believe that a preference is intended." In the case of 164 Fed. 124, it is said: "That there was a preference in fact cannot, of course, be gainsaid; the firm, as well as the individual members of it, being insolvent, and the Goff Lumber Company securing by the transaction over one third of their bill, where other creditors will get practically nothing. This being the inevitable effect, it will be conclusively presumed that it was so intended, even though it may be that Moore had no idea in reality of treating the Goff Lumber Company any differently from, or of giving them any advantage over, other creditors." In the case of 177 N. Y. 1, it is said: "As to the debtor the statute declares that a payment under certain conditions shall be held to be preferential. He is not to be heard upon the question of his intent. The effect of his act is fixed by law." See also Van Iderstine v. National Discount Co. 98 C. C. A. 300, 174 Fed. 518; Coder v. Arts, 213 U. S. 223, 53 L. ed. 772, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 436, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1008.

We therefore hold that in an action brought by a trustee in bankruptcy to recover a voidable preference, the intent of the bankrupt in making the preference is immaterial.

2. Appellant contends that, as to all of the payments secured, it should have the right of set-off against the claim of appellee, by reason of the fact that the same were received in due course of business as a deposit in a bank, and as payments on notes and interest. The fifth finding of the court below, which seems to be supported, at least, by sufficient evidence, effectually cuts out this question from the case. The court finds that the appellant persuaded and induced the bankrupt to pay to them the amount of money involved in this action, for the express purpose and with the intent to apply the same upon the indebtedness then owing by the bankrupt to appellant. This being so, no question of the right of set-off for 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) money deposited in the ordinary course of business arises.

There being no error in the record, the judgment of the lower court will be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

OKLAHOMA CRIMINAL COURT OF APPEALS.

E. C. CHILDS, Appt.,
v.
STATE OF OKLAHOMA.

(4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 474, 113 Pac. 545.)

County attorney — abrogation of office.

1. The office of county attorney is not embodied in the Constitution of this state; and it may therefore be abrogated, or the powers and duties pertaining to it enlarged or diminished or wholly or partially transferred to district or state officers, as the legislature may see fit.

Office — creation — implication.

2. It is not necessary to the creation of an office that the legislature declare in express words that such office is created. The use of any language which shows the legislative intent to create the office is sufficient. And an act which empowers the governor to appoint a person to an office, and which designates the qualifications which the incumbent of the office must possess, and the duties which he is to perform, is sufficient to create the office.

Same — term — pleasure of appointing power.

3. The general rule is that when an office is created to be filled by appointment, if the legislature does not designate the term of the office, the appointee will hold only during the pleasure of the appointing power.

Note. — An extended search has disclosed but one other case upon the validity of legislation giving to a governor's counsel powers coextensive with prosecuting attorneys, — State v. Maben, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 114 Pac. 1122, a case in the same court and involving the same statute as CHILDS v. STATE. The decision in the Maben Case, while not overruling the CHILDS CASE, holds that the court in that case went as far as the law justified, and that, other than the power to appear and prosecute in cases involving the prohibitory law, the act in question does not confer authority to exercise the power of a county attorney.

As to the power of the legislature to delegate to the governor authority to create the office of special state attorney to prosecute infringements of the liquor laws, see State ex rel. Young v. Butler, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 744. W. A. S.

Same — absence of incumbent — effect.

4. An "office" is a legal entity, and may exist in fact, although it be without an incumbent.

Same — necessity of compensation.

5. Compensation is not indispensable to an office; it is merely incident thereto, and is no part of the office.

Public prosecutor — liquor law — legality of acts.

6. Section 24, art. 3, chap. 69, Sess. Laws 1907-08 Snyder's Comp. Laws, 1909, § 4204), creating the office of counsel to the governor, and making it such officer's duty to assist in the enforcement of the prohibitory laws, is not unconstitutional; and such officer has the same power to sign and file an information charging a violation of the prohibitory laws as has the county attorney.

Pleading — sufficiency of information — raising question.

7. The question whether an information states facts sufficient to constitute an offense, is duplicitous, or is defective in the description of the offense, cannot be raised by motion to set aside, but only by demurrer.

Indictment — duplicity — possession and transportation of liquor.

8. An information which charges a defendant with having in possession intoxicating liquor with the intent to sell same, and with the intent to convey same from one place within the state to another place therein, does not charge two offenses.

Evidence — proceeding under search warrant.

9. In a prosecution for having in possession intoxicating liquor with intent to sell same, and to convey same from one place within the state to another place therein, evidence that previously a justice of the peace had caused the liquor to be seized under a search warrant, and, on the defendant's motion, has subsequently quashed the warrant and ordered the liquor redelivered to the defendant, is not competent or admissible in the defendant's behalf.

Same — possession of liquor.

10. In a prosecution for having in possession intoxicating liquor with intent to sell same, proof that the defendant kept large quantities of liquor concealed on his premises is competent as a circumstance tending to show the intent to sell.

ERROR to the Seminole County Court to review a judgment convicting defendant of violating the prohibition law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Davis & Davis for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Fred S. Caldwell for the State.

Richardson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The information in this case was signed by Fred S. Caldwell as counsel to the governor, and charged plaintiff in error with having in possession intoxicating liquor with intent to sell the same, and to convey the same from one place within the state to another place therein. Plaintiff in error orally moved the court to set aside the information, because it was not signed by the county attorney. The court overruled the motion, and the ruling is assigned as error.

The legislature of 1907-08 enacted a prohibition law, which was approved March 24, 1908 (Sess. Laws, 1907-08, p. 594 [Snyder's Comp. Laws 1909, chap. 61]), § 24 of article 3 of which (§ 4204, Snyder's Comp. Laws) provides for the appointment of an attorney to be known as counsel to the governor. The section reads as follows: "The governor shall have power to appoint an attorney, who shall have been a resident in this state for at least two years, and shall have been a lawyer licensed by some court of record for at least five years, who shall be known as counsel to the governor. He shall, under the direction of the governor, assist in enforcing the provisions of this act and the other laws of the state, and shall perform such other duties as the governor may from time to time require. He shall have all the powers of county attorneys in their respective counties. He shall hold office during the pleasure of the governor, and shall give bond, to be approved by him, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties, in the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000), and shall receive a salary, to be fixed by the governor, of not more than twenty-five hundred dollars ($2,500) per annum, payable monthly; Provided, that in lieu of, or in addition to, appointing such attorney, the governor may call upon the attorney general or his assistant to perform such service." Inasmuch as this section provides that such counsel to the governor shall have all the powers of county attorneys in their respective counties, it is plain that if the section is not unconstitutional, the counsel to the governor may sign and file an information for a violation of the prohibition law, since a county attorney may lawfully do so.

In 1907 the legislature of North Dakota passed an act (Laws 1907, chap. 187) somewhat like the one in question here, providing that the governor should appoint an enforcement commissioner, who should be an attorney at law, and who was authorized to exercise in any part of the state all the common-law and statutory powers of state's attorneys in their respective counties, in the enforcement of the law against the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. Section 173 of the Constitution of North Dakota reads as follows: "At the first general election held after the adoption of this Constitution, and every two years thereafter, there shall be elected in each organized county in the state a county judge, clerk of court, register of deeds, county auditor, treasurer, sheriff, and state's attorney, who shall be electors of the county in which they are elected, and who shall hold their office until their successors are elected and qualified. The legislative assembly shall provide by law for such other county, township, and district officers as may be deemed necessary. . . ." And the supreme court of North Dakota, in Ex parte Corliss, 16 N. D. 470, 114 N. W. 962, held the act of the legislature void on the ground that the office of state's attorney was a constitutional office in that state; that the section of the Constitution above quoted unqualifiedly provided that the incumbent of that office should be elected by the people of each county; that by said section there was reserved to the people of each county the right to have the functions inherently pertaining to such office discharged only by the person of their own choosing, and that such right could not be infringed by a legislative enactment transferring any of the inherent powers of the state's attorney to a person appointed by central authority. There is a strong dissenting opinion in that case. We do not find it necessary, however, to express approval or disapproval of the reasoning used or the conclusion reached in either the prevailing or the dissenting opinion therein, for the reason that our constitutional provisions are wholly different from those of North Dakota with respect to the office of county attorney.

Section 2 of article 17 of our Constitution is as follows: "There are hereby created, subject to change by the legislature, in and for each organized county of this state, the offices of judge of the county court, county attorney, clerk of the district court, county clerk, sheriff, county treasurer, register of deeds, county surveyor, superintendent of public instruction, three county commissioners, and such municipal township officers as are now provided for under the laws of the territory of Oklahoma, except as in this Constitution otherwise provided."

By § 18 of the schedule to our Constitution, it is provided that, "until otherwise provided by law, the terms, duties, powers, qualifications, and salary and compensation of all county and township officers, not otherwise provided by this Constitution, shall be as now provided by the laws of the territory of Oklahoma for like named officers. . . ." It will be seen from an examination of these two constitutional provisions that neither the office of county attorney, nor the duties and powers pertaining thereto, are embedded in the Constitution. The office may be entirely abrogated, or the powers and duties pertaining to it enlarged or diminished or wholly or partially transferred to district or state officers, as the legislature may see fit. And for that reason it cannot be urged that this act is unconstitutional and void, as depriving the office of county attorney of any of its constitutional powers and duties.

In the case of State v. Butler, 105 Me. 91, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 744, 73 Atl. 560, 18 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 484, the supreme court of Maine held unconstitutional an act somewhat similar to the one in question, on the ground that the act did not create the office, but professed to empower the governor to do so; and the court held that such power could not be delegated to the governor. That act was in part as follows: "The governor may, after notice to and an opportunity for the attorney for the state for any county to show cause why the same should not be done, create, to continue during his pleasure, the office of special attorney for the state in such county, and appoint an attorney to perform the duties thereof. Such appointee shall, under the direction of the governor, have and exercise the same powers now vested in the attorney for the state for such county in all prosecutions relating to the law against the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and shall have full charge and control thereof. . . ." Laws 1905, chap. 92.

And the commission issued by the governor of Maine under that statute was in the following words: "Know Ye, that I, William T. Cobb, Governor of the State of Maine, do hereby create, to continue during my pleasure, the office of Special Attorney for the State of Maine in the County of Somerset, all as provided by chapter 92 of the Public Laws of the State of Maine, for the year A. D. 1905, entitled 'At Act to Provide for the Better Enforcement of the Laws against the Manufacture and Sale of Intoxicating Liquors,' and especially as provided for under § 8 of said Chapter: And reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, ability, and discretion of Amos K. Butler, of Skowhegan in the said County of Somerset, do hereby constitute and appoint the said Amos K. Butler Special Attorney for the State of Maine within and for said County of Somerset. . . ."

It will be observed that the act of the legislature of Maine did not purport to create the office of special attorney for the state, but specifically empowered the governor to create such office; and the commission which the governor issued expressly professed to create the office. An examination of § 4204, Snyder's Comp. Laws 1909, quoted above, will disclose no such condition here. The section in question authorizes the governor to appoint an attorney who shall be known as counsel to the governor. The section fixes the qualifications of the person to be appointed, and prescribes his duties; and we think that was sufficient to create the office. Nineteenth of the offices created by the legislatures of the various states in the Union, and by the Congress of the United States, are created in just this way; that is, by a provision authorizing the appointment or election of some person, designating the qualifications which he must possess, to some office the powers and duties pertaining to which are prescribed by the act. It is not necessary to the creation of an office that the legislature declare in express words that such office is created. The use of any language which shows the legislative intent to create the office is sufficient. And an act which empowers the governor to appoint a person to an office, and which designates the qualifications which the incumbent of the office must possess, and the duties which he must perform, is sufficient to create the office.

It is true that the act in question does not fix the term of office, but provides that the appointee shall hold office during the pleasure of the governor; but we do not regard that as fatal. The general rule is that whenever an office is created to be filled by appointment, if the legislature does not designate the term of the office, the appointee will hold only during the pleasure of the appointing power. Mechem, Pub. Off. §§ 406, 445; Throop, Pub. Off. § 304; 29 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1370, 1371, 1395, 1396. See also Patton v. Vaughan, 39 Ark. 211; *People ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. but provides that in lieu of appointing such officer, the governor may call upon the attorney general or his assistant to perform such service. In legal contemplation, an office is an entity, and may exist in fact, although it be without an incumbent. People ex rel. Madden v. Stratton, 28 Cal. 382; State ex rel. Coleman v. Rose, 74 Kan. 262, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 843, 86 Pac. 296, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 927; Heard v. Elliott, 116 Tenn. 150, 92 S. W. 764. In the last-mentioned case the syllabus is as follows: "Acts 1875, p. 51, chap. 55, abolished the office of county entry taker, and Acts 1879, p. 65, chap. 46, entitled, 'An Act to Establish the Entry Taker's Office,' provided that there should be elected by the justices of the county courts at the April term of the court, or any quarterly term, every four years, an entry taker for any county in the state desiring to have an entry taker. Held, that such act of 1879 created the office of entry taker throughout the state, whether a county elected to fill the same or not."

Neither is the section void because it provides that the counsel to the governor shall receive a salary, to be fixed by the governor, of not more than $2,500 per annum, payable monthly. Assuming that the power to fix the salary of an office cannot be delegated to the governor, and that this provision is therefore void, yet it does not follow that the whole section is void, or that the office was not in fact created. Salary is merely incident to an office, and constitutes no part of the office; the office may exist without provision for compensation of any kind or character. Compensation is not indispensable to an office. Throop, Pub. Off. § 8; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 7; State ex rel. Clark v. Stanley, 66 N. C. 59, 8 Am. Rep. 488; *State ex rel. Howerton v. Whether that portion of the section which provides that, in addition to enforcing the provisions of the prohibition law, the counsel to the governor shall assist in enforcing the other laws of the state, and shall perform such other duties as the governor may from time to time require, and shall have all the powers of county attorneys in their respective counties, is void as not being within the title of the act, we shall not attempt to determine here; for it is certain that the creation of this office was primarily for the purpose of securing the better enforcement of the prohibition law, and, the other powers granted to the incumbent of such office being merely additional, they may fall without affecting the main purpose of the section. Const. art. 5, § 57. In the instant case the counsel to the governor was acting solely in the enforcement of the prohibition law; and we hold that, even though the act be not effective to confer any other powers upon such officer, that does not render it bad, but it is effective at least in so far as it grants the power to enforce that law. In our opinion the counsel to the governor had full power to sign the information in this case, and the motion to quash the information on this ground was properly overruled.

Another ground upon which plaintiff in error moved to quash or set aside the information was that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. This defect, if it existed, was ground for demurrer by § 6747 of Snyder's Comp. Laws, and was not ground for setting the information aside. The demurrer, by § 6748, must be in writing, signed either by the defendant or his counsel, and filed. This question therefore was not properly raised in the court below. We have examined the information, however, and find that it properly charged an offense, and, even if plaintiff in error had demurred on this ground, the demurrer could only have been overruled.

It is next urged that the information charged two offenses, in that it alleged that plaintiff in error wrongfully and unlawfully had in his possession three cases and 5 pints of whisky, with the intent on his part to sell said whisky to divers and sundry persons, and with the intent then and there to convey the same from one place in said county to another place therein. The contention is that, inasmuch as the information alleged that plaintiff in error had the whisky in his possession with the intent to violate two provisions of the law, the information was duplicitous. If this contention were well taken, the matter could have been raised only by demurrer under § 6747, Snyder's Comp. Laws, and, as previously stated, no demurrer was filed. In the next place, only one possession of liquor was charged, and the fact that plaintiff in error may have intended to violate two provisions of the law with the liquor in his possession, and the fact that the information so alleged, would not make it duplicitous. It charged only one offense.

The information is further complained of for the reason that it does not allege that plaintiff in error's intent to sell and to convey the liquor in possession was wrongful and unlawful. This is a question, also, that could be raised only by a demurrer. But, however raised, the information alleges that the possession of the liquor was wrongful and unlawful, and with the intent to violate certain designated provisions of the laws of Oklahoma, and that was sufficient.

An instruction of the court is complained of wherein the jury were told that they should convict if they found from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, first, that the defendant was in the possession of the liquor, and, second, that he intended to sell the same in violation of the law, or that he intended to convey the same from his residence to his pool hall. There was no error in the instruction given.

It is next urged that the court erred in not sustaining plaintiff in error's demurrer to the state's evidence. There was no error in this. Snyder's Comp. Laws, § 6848; Cox v. State, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 111 Pac. 668. Plaintiff in error introduced a justice of the peace as a witness in his behalf, and undertook to prove by the justice and his records that theretofore he had issued a search warrant for certain liquor in plaintiff in error's possession, and that afterwards on the latter's motion had quashed the warrant and ordered the liquor redelivered to him. This the court ruled out, and plaintiff in error contends that such action was erroneous, for the reason that the evidence of the justice of the peace tended to establish an adjudication that the defendant's possession of the liquor in question was lawful. The court properly ruled out the evidence. It was not competent under any phase of the case. The justice had no jurisdiction of this case, and his action in the proceeding before him could not bind the county court in the trial of this cause. Also, it was not shown that the liquor which the justice ordered returned to plaintiff in error was the same liquor in controversy in this case, and, if it was, we know of no rule of law that would forbid the state from proving that the defendant had subsequently formed an intent to violate the law with the liquor in possession, even if the state were precluded by the justice's order from proving that the intent existed at the time the justice made the order in question.

It was proved by the sheriff that on the day this offense was charged to have been committed, he was about to search the plaintiff in error for liquor under a search warrant, when the latter pulled from his pocket two bottles of whisky and broke them. And plaintiff in error contends that the admission of this evidence was erroneous, as also the admission of evidence tending to show that he kept a large quantity of liquor concealed in his house, in a side of the wall, and that he had numerous bottles and cartons around the premises. The latter evidence was competent as a circumstance tending to show plaintiff in error's intent to sell the liquor in possession, and the evidence in regard to his breaking the bottles in the presence of the sheriff was competent as tending to show an attempt on his part to destroy evidence against him.

Complaint is made of the action of the court in refusing to give two instructions specially requested, but the court committed no error in this respect. The instructions given were just and correct, and fairly and properly stated the law. The evidence as a whole conclusively shows plaintiff in error to have been a wilful and confirmed violator of the prohibition law, and indisputably establishes his guilt of the present offense.

His conviction was right, and it is affirmed.

T. D. HARTGRAVES, Appt.,
v.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA.

(— Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 114 Pac. 343.)

Grand jury — private counsel — effect on indictment.

1. Where counsel privately employed to prosecute a case appear before a grand jury and assume to represent the state upon the Headnotes by FURMAN, P. J.

Note. — Appearance of special attorney or private counsel before grand jury.

This note does not cover the question of right and effect of appearance of duly appointed officers and their regular deputies before the grand jury, but it is confined to cases in which the appearance was by a special attorney or private counsel.

Right of appointment and appearance.

It has been held that the court has inherent power in the absence of the prosecuting attorney, to appoint an attorney to appear before the grand jury and examine witnesses. State v. Tyler, 122 Iowa, 125, 97 N. W. 983.

And in case of vacancy in the office of district attorney or in case of temporary disability, it has been held that the court may authorize any competent person to act in preparing indictments. State v. Gonzales, 26 Tex. 197.

It was held in United States v. Cobban, 127 Fed. 713, that under a statute providing that "the attorney general shall . . . employ and retain . . . such attorneys and counselors at law as he may think necessary, to assist the district at- 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

investigation of a case then pending before said grand jury, an indictment found by said grand jury as the result of such investigation should upon motion of the defendant be set aside.

Same — disqualification of prosecutor — substitute.

2. If the county attorney is disqualified from representing the state in the prosecution of a party charged with crime, said county attorney is without authority to appoint a special attorney to represent him before the grand jury in the investigation of said cause, and an indictment found as the result of such investigation upon motion of the defendant should be set aside.

Same — presence of stranger.

3. No person has a right to be in a grand jury room during any of their proceedings while investigating a criminal charge, except the witness then being examined and the attorney authorized by law to represent the state in such examinations; and if any other person is in the grand jury room during any part of their investigations, an indictment found by them as the result of such investigation should, upon motion of the defendant, be set aside.

Indictment — receiving stolen goods — name of person.

4. An indictment for receiving stolen goods should allege the name of the person from whom such goods were so received, and if the name of such person is unknown, that fact should be alleged.

Instructions — absence of evidence.

5. Where the plea of a former acquittal is interposed, but no evidence is introduced torneys in the discharge of their duties," the assistance contemplated is not limited to the trial of the case, but includes proceedings before the grand jury.

And a statute prescribing the duties of the prosecuting attorney, and authorizing the employment of additional counsel in cases of felony, does not prohibit the employment of special counsel to assist before the grand jury, when, in the judgment of the board of supervisors, the prosecuting attorney, and the court, such additional counsel is necessary. People v. O'Neill, 107 Mich. 556, 65 N. W. 540.

But it has been held that where a statute gives the attorney general power to employ attorneys "to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties," and further provides that the attorneys appointed "to assist in the trial of any case" shall receive a commission, etc., the attorney general has no power to appoint special attorneys to assist a district attorney before a grand jury. United States v. Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. 163 Fed. 66.

And it was held in United States v. Rosenthal, 121 Fed. 862, that where a statute empowered the attorney general to appoint a special attorney "to assist in the trial of any case," the trial of a case con-to support it, it is not improper for the court to decline to instruct the jury on that issue.

(March 21, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Custer County convicting him of receiving stolen goods, and sentencing him to imprisonment. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. J. Shive for appellant.

Messrs. Charles West Attorney General, and Smith C. Matson, for the State:

It is immaterial whether the defendant bought or received stolen personal property, or in what manner he received or bought it, or what was the consideration therefor, or the value thereof, provided only it has been stolen from another, and this defendant knows.

The indictment need not name the thief.

People v. Avila, 43 Cal. 199; People v. Ribolsi, 89 Cal. 492, 26 Pac. 1082.

Allegation of fraudulent intent is not a part of the crime, and hence is unnecessary.

Gandolpo v. State, 33 Ind. 439; State v. Hartleb, 35 La. Ann. 1180; State v. Hodges, 55 Md. 127.

Defendant's plea of former acquittal was insufficient.

templated does not include the proceedings before the grand jury.

And it has been held that a statute authorizing the county attorney, with the approval of the court, to appoint an assistant to aid him in the trial, is not broad enough to authorize the selection of an assistant before the grand jury. State v. Tyler, 122 Iowa, 125, 97 N. W. 983.

It was held in United States v. Kilpatrick, 16 Fed. 765, that the court cannot authorize an examiner of the department of justice to appear before the Federal grand jury and assist them in their investigation.

Where an act authorizing the governor to appoint a deputy excise enforcement commissioner, who is an attorney, is unconstitutional in attempting to have such duties performed by one appointed by the governor, instead of by officers of the people's selection, one appointed under the act has no right to be present in the grand jury room, and is guilty of contempt if he violates an order excluding him from the grand jury room. Ex parte Corliss, 16 N. D. 470, 114 N. W. 962.

And one whose employment by the county commissioners was for a nominal consideration, and was not a good faith employment for the purpose of assisting the state's attorney before the grand jury, but merely for the purpose of gaining admission to the proceedings for the purpose of discharging his duties under a private employment, has no right to be present in the grand jury room. Ibid.

So, one whose appointment as assistant state's attorney is void because of his non-residence has no right to be present in the grand jury room, and is guilty of contempt in violating an order excluding him from such room. Ibid.

And a plea which merely states that a counsel who appeared before the grand jury is "the retained private counsel of H. B. G." (the person from whom defendant was accused of embezzling) does not present the question of whether counsel who have been employed by a private individual to prosecute a supposed criminal can properly be 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

procured by the state attorney, with the consent of the court, to go before the grand jury for the purpose of securing the indictment, since great strictness must be used in framing such pleas, and no intentions will be indulged in their favor. Miller v. State, 42 Fla. 266, 28 So. 208.

Effect of appearance of special or private counsel.

There is some conflict among the decisions as to the effect of the appearance of special or private counsel before the grand jury. The weight of authority seems to hold that the fact that a special attorney was present before the grand jury, and assisted in examining witnesses, will not avoid the indictment, if he was not present during the deliberations of the grand jury and was not guilty of any further misconduct.

Thus, the appearance of the special or private attorneys before the grand jury under the circumstances indicated has been held not to avoid the indictment:

Blevins v. State, 68 Ala. 92 (attendance of an attorney at request of solicitor where he merely assisted in examining witnesses); United States v. Cobban, 127 Fed. 713 (appearance of a special assistant to aid the district attorney appointed by the attorney general); State v. Sullivan, 110 Mo. App. 75, 84 S. W. 105 (appearance of attorney general directed by the governor under statutory authority to assist prosecuting attorney); United States v. Reed, 2 Blatchf. 435, Fed. Cas. No. 16,134 (a son of the United States district attorney, not sworn, present, and participating in the proceedings, no abuse being committed while present); State v. Whitney, 7 Or. 386 (presence of attorney employed to assist prosecution at the request of the district attorney, and examination of witnesses by him, such appearance not being mentioned among the statutory grounds for setting aside an indictment); State v. Fertig, 98 Iowa, 139, 67 N. W. 87 (presence of attorney who assisted county attorney, the statute allowing certain persons in grand jury room, and

Rep. 617, 99 Pac. 760, 101 Pac. 111.

Furman, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

it not being shown that attorney in question was not duly authorized to act as deputy); State v. Gonzales, 26 Tex. 197 (one acting as district attorney not lawfully authorized to act); Shattuck v. State, 11 Ind. 473 (presence of two assistants of prosecuting attorney, neither of whom was sworn to act as assistant of such attorney, or appointed in writing); Jones v. State, 150 Ala. 54, 43 So. 179 (appearance of attorney appointed to act in place of the county attorney, who was disqualified from acting); State v. Kovolosky, 92 Iowa, 498, 61 N. Corcoran, 7 Idaho, 220, 61 Pac. 1034 (presence of attorney appointed by court, under authority given by statute in case the county attorney was disqualified); Raymond v. People, 2 Colo. App. 329, 30 Pac. 504 (appearance of special counsel appointed by the court, the record failing to show prejudice or injury to defendant); State v. White, 37 La. Nall, 242 Ill. 284, 89 N. E. 1012 (appearance of one of special counsel for state, it appearing that he was called before such jury, but was asked no questions with reference to the indictment in question); Wilson v. W. 539 (attorney employed as private prosecutor appeared before grand jury and examined witnesses, there being no suggestion that he was present when they were deliberating); United States v. Haskell, 169 Fed. 449 (appearance of two special assistant attorneys, one examining the witnesses and the other making a stenographic report of the testimony); State v. Harris, 39 La. was in attendance upon the court and the grand jury when his presence was required during the term of the court at which this indictment was found, and there was no physical or mental disqualification which incapacitated said Snodgrass from performing his duty as such county attorney at said time, but that R. P. Phillips, a member of the bar, who was not the county attorney or deputy county attorney of Custer county, Oklahoma, and was not the attorney general or deputy attorney general of the state of Oklahoma, and was not authorized or empowered by law to appear before said grand jury when they were considering this accusation against defendant, but was privately employed by the prosecuting witness in this report of the grand jury drawn up by a counsel other than the district attorney).

The court in Blevins v. State, 68 Ala. 92, said: "It is not consistent with the theory of the proceedings and privileges of the grand jury, that one bearing no official relation, bound by no oath, should, on the request or merely by the authority of the solicitor, be permitted to appear before them. The office of solicitor is a public trust, and its duties are incapable of delegation; and that the person introduced into the grand jury room is styled his deputy or his clerk cannot cure the wrong of the introduction. If it did not appear affirmatively that Clark did no more than examine witnesses—if it appeared that he counseled the finding of the bill against the appellant, or expressed any opinion favorable to its findings,—we should be inclined to the opinion the motion to quash the indictment ought to have prevailed. State v. Addison, 2 S. C. 356. But it appearing that he gave the jury no counsel, expressed to them no opinion unfavorable to the appellant, did no act affecting their deliberations, the appellant has suffered no injury from his presence in the jury room, and has no greater reason to complain of it than any other citizen."

And the fact that an attorney, with the consent of the district attorney, was present in the grand jury room and examined witnesses, is not sufficient ground for quashing the indictment, where he was not present during the deliberations, and it was not shown that anything was said by him to influence their finding, although a statute provides that "no person except the prosecuting attorney and the witnesses under examination are permitted to be present while the grand jury are examining a charge, and no person whatever shall be present while the grand jury are deliberating or voting on a charge." Bennett v. State, 62 Ark. 516, 36 S. W. 947.

And a motion made after a plea has been entered, to set aside an indictment because of the presence before the grand jury of an cause to prosecute this defendant without warrant or authority of law, was present, and presented this case to the grand jury, and conducted the examination of the witnesses before the grand jury, when the grand jury was considering as to whether or not they should find an indictment against the defendant in this cause, and said R. P. Phillips insisted that said grand jury should indict this defendant. This motion was duly sworn to by the defendant. The court heard part of the evidence in support of this motion, to the effect that said F. A. Snodgrass was the county attorney of Custer county, and was disqualified from prosecuting the defendant because, prior to the election of said Snodgrass to the office of county attorney of Custer county, Oklahoma, he had represented the defendant in some cases connected with the transaction in which the defendant is now indicted. It also appeared that said F. A. Snodgrass had verbally requested said R. P. Phillips to represent the state before the grand jury upon the investigation of this case, but that the said R. P. Phillips was not appointed as deputy county attorney, and did not have a commission from the district judge of Custer county to act as county attorney in this case. The district court thereupon declined to hear further testimony, and overruled the defendant's motion to set aside the indictment. As there was no denial of the other allegations contained in appellant's motion, they must be taken attorney authorized by the court, upon the recommendation of the county attorney, to act as assistant prosecutor, will not be entertained. State v. Tyler, 122 Iowa, 125, 97 N. W. 983.

So, a plea which states that an attorney, without the procurement and against the objection of the state attorney, appeared before the grand jury, the state attorney being in attendance on the court, and not being unable to perform the duties of his office, but not being present with the grand jury, is bad on demurrer where it does not also allege that he was willing to perform his duties, since, if the state attorney refuses to perform his duties, the court has power to appoint another attorney to appear before the grand jury, and from the facts stated it will be presumed that the court permitted the attendance of the attorney in question. Taylor v. State, 49 Fla. 69, 38 So. 380.

And a plea for avoiding an indictment, setting forth that a person not a member of the grand jury or a sworn officer of the court was admitted before the grand jury and examined witnesses, is bad where it does not also allege that such person was not a witness. Lawrence v. Com. 86 Va. 573, 10 S. E. 840.

And the appearance of the counsel to the governor or his assistant before the grand jury, assuming the act authorizing his appointment to be void, does not render the recommendation of the grand jury, under a statute providing for the removal of county attorneys in case of failure to enforce the provisions of a law, invalid. Leedy v. Brown, — Okla. —, 113 Pac. 177.

The appearance of special attorneys or private counsel was held in the following cases, however, to invalidate the indictment:

Miller v. State, 42 Fla. 266, 28 So. 208 (special attorney procured by the prosecuting attorney with consent of court appeared and remained during examination of evidence and the deliberation of the jury, and urged and requested the finding of the bill); Welch v. State, 68 Miss. 341, 8 So. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

673 (attorney for prosecution procured himself to be summoned before the grand jury as a witness, and addressed them, and urged the finding of an indictment); State v. Addison, 2 S. C. 356 (counsel acting for absent solicitor entered grand jury room during their deliberations); State v. Mabin, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 114 Pac. 1122 (presence, during consideration of charges, of counsel for governor, who was not attorney general or county attorney); United States v. Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. 163 Fed. 66; United States v. Rosenthal, 121 Fed. 862 (appearance and examination of witnesses by two attorneys appointed without authority by the attorney general to assist a district attorney in a particular case); United States v. Kilpatrick, 16 Fed. 765 (an examiner of the department of justice entered grand jury room and assisted them in their investigation); Durr v. State, 53 Miss. 425 (attorney employed to prosecute a case, with leave of the court, went into the grand jury room with his witnesses, and drafted bill which the grand jury then returned); Wilson v. State, 70 Miss. 595, 35 Am. St. Rep. 664, 13 So. 225 (attorney employed by one whom defendant was accused of defrauding to aid in prosecution went before grand jury with witnesses, and acted for district attorney in preparing indictment and procuring the same to be found; such attorney not having been selected as assistant district attorney or district attorney pro tem.); People v. Scannell, 36 Misc. 40, 72 N. Y. Supp. 449 (special counsel employed by district attorney appeared and conducted case before grand jury, it being provided by statute that an indictment must be set aside "when a person has been permitted to be present during the session of the grand jury, while the charge embraced in the indictment was under consideration," except according to provisions allowing regularly qualified assistants, etc., to appear).

The court in Miller v. State, supra, said: "Proceeding upon the theory that the attorney who went before the grand jury was as confessed, and the only question before us is, Are the facts proven, and the allegations in the motion which were not controverted, sufficient to set aside the indictment?

Section 6683, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909, is as follows: "The grand jury may at all reasonable times ask the advice of the court or of the district attorney. The district attorney may at all times appear before the grand jury for the purpose of giving information or advice relative to any matter cognizable before them, and may interrogate witnesses before them whenever he thinks it necessary, but no other person is permitted to be present during their sessions, except the members and a witness actually under examination, and no person whomsoever must be permitted to be present during the expression of their opinions or the giving of their votes upon any matter before them." This statute must be construed in connection with the other provisions of law with reference to county attorneys and their deputies, and the attorney general and his deputies. We think the plain meaning and import of this statute is that no one should be permitted to be present during the sessions of the grand jury, except the witnesses and the officers duly authorized by law to so appear. Section 6738, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909, provides that the indictment must be set aside on motion of a defendant for certain specified reasons. But the special grounds for setting aside an indictment contained in this section are not exclusive of other grounds, for it is expressly provided that an indictment must be set aside whenever it appears that it was not found, indorsed, presented, or filed as provided by the statutes of the state. It is true that a substantial compliance with the provisions of the statutes relating to grand juries and the manner in which indictments are to be found and presented is all that the law requires, but, whenever there has been a departure from the provisions of the statutes, which would deprive a defendant of a substantial right or would be dangerous to justice, then an indictment so procured by the state attorney as assistant, with the consent of the court, under the provisions of our statute, it appears to us that the pleas show such action on the part of the attorney in the deliberations of the grand jury in finding the bill as to come within the prohibition of the statute, and reasonably calculated to influence the jury to the prejudice of the accused. When this is affirmatively shown, the decided weight of judicial opinion in this country sustains the view that the indictment should be set aside. If we proceed upon the theory that the attorney who went before the grand jury did so without any sanction of the court, there is still less ground for sustaining the ruling of the court. No case that we have found sanctions the right of private counsel to assume the sole and exclusive charge and management of a case before a grand jury, and not only remain with them during the examination of evidence and their deliberations thereon, but request and urge them to find a true bill. The secrecy of the grand jury secured by our statute, and designed to preserve the freedom and independence of that body, forbids such action, and it could not be tolerated by the courts without impairing the usefulness of the grand inquest."

The court in Wilson v. State, supra, said: "It is a serious mistake to suppose that the right of one accused or suspected of crime to the orderly and impartial administration of the law begins only after indictment. Immunity from prosecutions for indictable offenses, except by presentment by the grand jury, is declared and preserved by the organic law of this and all the other states, and, though, by reason of the secrecy of the proceedings before that body, its action is seldom brought in review, it cannot be doubted that one whose acts are there the subject of investigation is as much entitled to the just, impartial, and unbiased judgment of that body as he is to that of the petit jury on his final trial, nor that it is as essential before the one body as the other that private ill-will or malevolence shall be excluded."

And where a statute empowers the court to appoint special counsel when the prosecuting attorney fails from sickness or other cause to attend court, the court cannot appoint a special counsel to act before the grand jury where the prosecuting attorney is ready and willing to perform his duties, and an indictment found while such counsel was attending the grand jury will be set aside. State v. Heaton, 21 Wash. 59, 56 Pac. 843.

And it has been held that the fact that a paper prepared by private counsel for the prosecution, directing the foreman of the grand jury as to on what points the several witnesses will testify, was sent to the grand jury by the district attorney, is ground for quashing the indictment. The court said: "The district attorney, himself, as the official representative of a prosecution, may appear before the grand jury and examine witnesses for their assistance; but it is not proper for him to suggest what effect should be given to the testimony adduced, nor by any hint to control their deliberations. It is doubtful if private counsel for the prosecution has the same privilege to appear and examine witnesses before the grand jury; although he represents the commonwealth, he does not appear in an official and disinterested capacity. But this matter we do not decide." Com. v. Frey, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 523.

found must be set aside. Prior to statehood, no person could be prosecuted for a felony unless by indictment found by a grand jury. But the grand juries had indicted so many persons where convictions could not be obtained, that the people had in a great measure lost confidence in this institution. In fact, grand juries were by many regarded largely as repositories of malice, cowardice, and perjury, not on account of the men who composed the grand juries, but on account of their secret inquisitorial powers, which enabled cowardly, corrupt, and malicious men to go before a grand jury and prefer charges which they would not dare to make publicly. It gave such characters an opportunity from ambush to shoot their enemies in the back. Although a man so indicted would be acquitted, yet it would place an indelible stain upon his good name, however innocent he might be. So, the constitutional convention endeavored, as far as possible, to substitute in its place proceedings by information in felony cases, where the defendant would have a preliminary trial before an examining magistrate, unless he saw fit to waive such preliminary trial. The purpose of this was to give a defendant, where he demanded it, as far as possible, an opportunity to face his accusers and present his defense in open court, below he would even be placed upon final trial. Had it not been for the fact that cases sometimes arise in which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to institute criminal proceedings without a grand jury, the system doubtless would have been abolished entirely. Therefore § 18 was incorporated in our Bill of Rights, which is as follows: "A grand jury shall be composed of twelve men, any nine of whom concurring may find an indictment or true bill. A grand jury shall be convened upon the order of a judge of a court having the power to try and determine felonies, upon his own motion; or such grand jury shall be ordered by such judge upon the filing of a petition therefor, signed by 100 resident taxpayers of the county; when so assembled such grand jury shall have power to investigate and return indictments for all character and grades of crime, and such other powers as the legislature may prescribe: Provided, that the legislature may make the calling of a grand jury compulsory." From this it is seen that no grand jury can be convened unless upon order of the judge of the district court, either upon his own motion or upon a petition therefor, signed by at least 100 resident taxpayers of the county. While it is true that, when a grand jury has been so convened, it has power to find and return indictments for all character and grades of crime, yet it was intended that grand juries should only be convened in cases of emergency. We cannot ignore these provisions of our Constitution, when we go to determine the policy of the state with reference to prosecutions by indictment. Section 19 of article 7 of our Constitution, among other things, provides: "All prosecutions shall be carried on in the name and by the authority of the state of Oklahoma."

We have heretofore had occasion to pass upon this clause of the Constitution in cases where this language was omitted from the indictments, and we have held that this constitutional provision does not relate to a matter of pleading, but that it secures to each inhabitant of this state a substantial right. In the case of Caples v. State, 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 80, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1033, 104 Pac. 497, this court said: "It is true that the Constitution requires that 'all prosecutions shall be carried on in the name and by the authority of the state of Oklahoma,' but it is nowhere required that this allegation shall appear in the information or indictment. This question was before this court in the case of Arie v. State, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 666, 100 Pac. 33, and we there held that, if it appears from the record that the prosecution was actually conducted in the name and by the authority of the state, the object and purpose of the Constitution is accomplished, even though no such allegation appeared in the information or indictment. Suppose that this allegation was in the information, and the record disclosed the fact that the prosecution was conducted by private parties without authority from the state, would the allegation of the information give the court jurisdiction? We do not profess to be infallible, but to our minds it is clear that the purpose of this provision in the Constitution is to protect the people of this state from private prosecutions which might degenerate into persecutions, and from prosecutions for any other foreign power save that of the state." The case before us is directly in point. Here the record shows that, while the prosecution was nominally being conducted in the name of the state, as a matter of fact it was in the hands of a private attorney, employed by the prosecuting witness. We think that such conduct is a direct violation of the Constitution of this state. If a county attorney can turn a defendant over to the paid counsel of private parties, or if private parties can usurp the powers of a county attorney before a grand jury, where the defendant cannot be heard and has no one to represent him, no man is safe from persecution in Oklahoma, and the abuses of the grand jury system will be perpetuated among us. This is the evil that the people have tried to destroy. The law therefore prohibits all persons from being in the grand jury room except the officers authorized by law to examine witnesses, and the witness to be examined, and the presence of any other person in the grand jury room at any stage of the proceedings, when a witness is being examined, or when the grand jury are considering the advisability of finding an indictment, vitiates the entire proceedings. There is no exception to this rule. The sessions of the grand jury being secret, it is impossible for a defendant to protect himself against danger from this source. Therefore the law protects him by rigidly excluding from the grand jury room all persons except those expressly authorized by law to be present. Fairness and justice are the essential elements of every step taken in the prosecution of criminal causes in Oklahoma. We heartily indorse the statement contained in the case of United States v. Edgerton (D. C.) 80 Fed. 375, which is as follows: "It is beyond question that no person other than a witness undergoing examination and the attorney for the government can be present during the sessions of the grand jury. The rule is inherent in the grand jury system, with all the force of a statutory enactment. The cases where bailiffs and stenographers have on occasions been temporarily present in the grand jury room are only apparent exceptions. The rule in its spirit and purpose admits of no exception. In the present case it is suggested that the only testimony heard while the expert Flynn was present related to the production of certain books of account touching which the expert interrogated the witness who was testifying as to his possession of such books or other documents, and that this could not have prejudiced the defendant. The court cannot know that this suggestion represents the facts. The case as presented is one where an expert was not only present in the grand jury room while a witness was testifying, but took part in the investigation by interrogating the witness. The court cannot inquire as to the effect of this conduct. There must not only be no improper influence or suggestion in the grand jury room, but, as suggested in Lewis v. Wake County, 74 N. C. 194, there must be no opportunity therefor. If the presence of an unauthorized person in the grand jury room may be excused, who will set bounds to the abuse to follow such a breach of the safeguards which surround the grand jury? It is common knowledge that expert witnesses are more likely to testify from interest than any other class. They usually testify to support or overthrow a theory, and frequently, if not usually, after an ex parte investigation, which strongly predisposes them, in favor of the party or cause in whose services they are enlisted. In the case of United States v. Kilpatrick (D. C.) 16 Fed. 765, the court quashed an indictment upon motion upon a case much like the present as to this point."

We know that numerous and respectable authorities can be found holding to the contrary, but an investigation will show that in those cases the constitutional and statutory provisions upon which they are based, with reference to grand juries, are very different from ours. But, even if they were not, we would not hesitate to say that it is unfair, unjust, and illegal to allow any person to be in a grand jury room when witnesses are being examined, unless such person was before said grand jury as a witness, or was there as a regular officer of the law in the discharge of his duties as such. In the case at bar the attorney who appeared before the grand jury was not the deputy county attorney, and he had no appointment from the district judge to act in place of the county attorney on account of the disqualification of that officer. He was merely requested by the county attorney to go before the grand jury. While we are satisfied that neither the county attorney nor the attorney who appeared for him before the grand jury were actuated by improper motives in this case, yet this cannot cause us to sanction a proceeding which is unauthorized by law, is contrary to public policy, and which, if allowed to stand, would establish a precedent repugnant to reason and pregnant with danger to justice and innocence. A county attorney has no right to turn a defendant over to his enemies, after having first armed them with the entire power of the state to be used as they see fit in his prosecution. If such prosecutions were permitted, they would soon become a great scandal, and absolutely odious to a fair-minded and justice-loving people. Honest men against whom naught could be truthfully alleged have been greatly mortified, and have had their good names called in question, by just such proceedings as this, prompted alone by the malice and cowardice of their enemies, when if they had been faced by their accusers, and given the right of cross-examination, those who sought to destroy them through the secret inquisitorial proceedings of a grand jury would have been covered with defeat and infamy. In 1876, when the writer of this opinion was practising law in Texas, a preacher who had some bitter enemies was indicted for stealing hogs. Upon the final trial it was conclusively shown that the parties who had caused his indictment were themselves the thieves. While the preacher was acquitted, yet he carried to his grave the stain upon his name of having been indicted for hog stealing. We are pleased to be able to say that these remarks do not apply to the county attorney of Custer county, or to the attorney who appeared for the private prosecution before the grand jury in this case. We call attention to these matters to illustrate the consequences which might grow out of this precedent if we allowed it to stand. The extreme illustration is always the test of a rule. Fairness and justice demand that a criminal prosecution should at all times be under the direction of a regularly constituted public officer, who is charged by law with the performance of this duty. We desire to say in addition that the county attorney, being disqualified in this case, was without power or authority to appoint any one to represent him. The appointment in such cases should come alone from the district judge, and should be of some member of the bar free from personal or private interest in the matter, who could be depended upon to act with fairness and impartiality as between the state and all of its citizens whose cases might come before the grand jury. Section 1598, Snyder's Comp. Laws of Okla. 1909, provides the only manner of appointing a special county attorney when the regular county attorney or his duly appointed deputy is unable to act, which is as follows: "Each of the district courts, whenever there shall be no county attorney for the county, or when the county attorney shall be absent from the court, or unable to attend to his duties, may, if the court may deem it necessary, appoint by an order to be entered in the minutes of the court some suitable person to perform for the time being the duties required by law to be performed by the county attorney, and the person so appointed shall thereupon be vested with all the powers of such county attorney for that purpose."

We believe that it is the plain meaning of the laws and Constitution of Oklahoma that regularly elected or appointed officers shall conduct all criminal prosecutions. It is true that it is entirely proper and legitimate for counsel to be employed to assist the county attorney in open court in the prosecution of a criminal case, but even then the county attorney should never lose control of the case, and such assistant counsel should discharge only such duties in the prosecution of the cause as are assigned him by the county attorney. But it is highly improper for counsel employed to prosecute a case, to be permitted to go into the grand jury room, where the defendant cannot be heard and has no one to represent him. This duty should be performed alone by the proper officer of the law. The case of Fooshee v. State, 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 677, 108 Pac. 554, does not conflict with the views here expressed. In that case the attorney who appeared before the grand jury was the regularly appointed deputy county attorney of Carter county, and his appointment was a matter of record in the county attorney's office of that county. We therefore hold that the trial court erred in not sustaining the motion made by the defendant to set aside the indictment.

Second. The indictment in this case is defective in not alleging the name of the person from whom the stolen property was received, or that the name of such person was unknown to the grand jury. See Fletcher v. State, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 300, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 581, 101 Pac. 599. It is not necessary, however, for such an indictment to allege from whom or by whom such property was stolen.

Third. Upon the trial of this cause the appellant entered a plea of former acquittal, but did not offer in evidence any testimony reasonably tending to sustain said plea. Upon this issue the court charged the jury as follows: "Gentlemen of the jury, you are further instructed that the defendant has introduced no evidence in support of his plea that he has already been acquitted of the offense charged in this indictment by the judgment of this court rendered at Arapaho on the 1st day of July, 1908. You are therefore instructed that, in your deliberations in this case, you will not consider this defense in arriving at your verdict in this case." Where there is evidence in the record reasonably tending to support an issue, the weight and effect of such evidence is exclusively for the jury, and it would be improper for the court to withdraw it from their consideration; but, where there is no evidence tending to support an issue presented, the court should not submit such issue to the jury. We therefore find that the court did not err in its instructions upon the subject of former acquittal.

For the errors hereinbefore pointed out, this cause is reversed and remanded, with directions to the lower court to sustain the motion to set aside the indictment.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

H. L. BOYES et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

GEORGE A. MASTERS et al.

(— Okla. —, 114 Pac. 710.)

Abatement — right to revive — discretion.

1. The right to revive an action under article 19, chap. 66, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. (Okla.) 1903, does not depend on the discretion of the court or of the judge making the order, but under the condition and within the time therein limited, is a matter of right.

Same — method — supplemental pleading.

2. Article 19 of chapter 66 of said statutes provides a summary remedy for reviving an action, but the remedy thus provided is not exclusive. The court has power

Headnotes by TURNER, Ch. J.

Note. — Exclusiveness of particular statutory method for revival of action.At common law and under Codes.

"By rule of the common law all pending actions abate upon the death of the plaintiff, and the right to revive and continue the same is a statutory creation." Welch v. Lynch, 30 App. D. C. 122.

"Revivor of actions being purely statutory in its origin, the modes provided by the Codes and statutes of the various states are exclusive, and the courts cannot grant such benefit by any other method." 18 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 1128, citing Lyon v. Park, 23 Jones & S. 539. And to the same effect are Welch v. Lynch, supra, and Wilson v. Darrow, 223 Mo. 520, 122 S. W. 1077.

The method of revival of an action at law is therefore determined by the statutes of the particular state where it is pending, and it is the purpose of this note, so far as actions at law are concerned, to consider only the question as to the exclusiveness of any particular statutory method in jurisdictions where, as in Oklahoma, more than one mode is provided.

As pointed out in the opinion in BOYES v. MASTERS, Ohio and Nebraska have statutes very similar to those of Oklahoma, which have been construed as providing co-existing methods of revivor.

The leading case of Carter v. Jennings, 24 Ohio St. 182, is fully set out in the opinion in BOYES v. MASTERS; and to the same effect, as applied to the revivor of proceedings in error, is Black v. Hill, 29 Ohio St. 86.

So, in Pavey v. Pavey, 30 Ohio St. 600, upon the authority of Carter v. Jennings and Black v. Hill, supra, an order was made, under § 39 of the Code, allowing the case to be continued against the represenunder § 4238 of said statute, in the exercise of sound discretion, to allow the action to be prosecuted against the legal representatives of a deceased party defendant, and allow them to be brought in by supplemental petition, pursuant to § 4348 of said statute.

Same — lapse of time — effect.

3. Where, pending an action to foreclose a mortgage, W., the defendant mortgagor, died, leaving him surviving a widow and five children, three of whom were minors, all of whom by attorney appeared, and, after a guardian ad litem had been appointed for said minors, said widow and adult heirs for themselves, and said minors by their said guardian, answered; and where, after judgment in their favor, proceedings in error therein were commenced by plaintiff in the supreme court of Oklahoma territory, pending which said widow, a coexecutor of the will of said W., died, after the submission, but before a decision, of said cause in said court; and where, after mandate to the trial court, plaintiff by suppletative of a deceased defendant in error, although more than a year had elapsed from the death of such defendant to the time of making the application for a revivor.

And in Foresman v. Haag, 37 Ohio St. 143, it was held, on the authority of Black v. Hill and Pavey v. Pavey, supra, that, under § 39, proceedings in error could be revived against the legal representatives of the defendant in error by conditional order, although more than a year had elapsed.

Likewise, the method provided by title 13 of the Nebraska Civil Code for reviving actions by conditional order is not exclusive, but under § 45, providing that "in case of the death or other disability of a party, the court may allow the action to continue by or against his representative or successor in interest," the heirs of the plaintiff in an action to set aside certain conveyances may be permitted to file a petition and prosecute the suit in their own names, upon the death of the original plaintiff, and their admission as parties plaintiff, by order of the court, without complaint from anyone, is, in effect, a revivor of the action in their name by consent of the parties. Rakes v. Brown, 34 Neb. 304, 51 N. W. 848.

So, in Hayden v. Huff, 62 Neb. 375, 87 N. W. 184, an application in the appellate court after the granting of a rehearing, made by the administrator de bonis non of the plaintiff, by supplemental petition in the nature of a bill of revivor, after the death of the plaintiff's administratrix, who died more than a year after her appointment without having made application to have the action revived in her name, and after the action had been stricken from the docket on motion of the defendant, it was held that the Code provision for summary proceedings by a conditional order to revive an action within a year after the appointment of a representative of a deceased mental petition filed sought to bring in the remaining executor of W. and her coexecutors as parties defendant, but was met with a motion to dismiss the cause on the ground of failure to revive against said minor heirs of said W., and that more than one year has expired since the death of said widow; and where by amended supplemental petition plaintiff seeks to bring in said heirs, together with said executor of W., and the coexecutor of said widow, as parties defendant,—held, no question of laches raised, that the court erred in refusing him permission so to do.

Appeal — death of party before judgment — effect.

4. The fact of the death of the defendant in error between the submission and decision of a cause in this court does not impair the validity of a judgment thereinafter rendered, but this court will, on proper showing, set aside the judgment, recall the mandate, and direct the clerk to refile the opinion, and enter judgment in the case party was not exclusive, but that, under § 45, a right to revive, independent of that under the former provision, was given, to which the limitation as to time expressed in the former provision did not apply.

In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Fox, 56 Neb. 746, 77 N. W. 130, an action begun by a widow, as administratrix, to recover for the wrongful death of her husband, in which, after her remarriage and the cessation of her powers as administratrix from that fact, a conditional order of revivor was entered on application of her successor, and in due time made absolute, the court, holding that the right of such successor to proceed with the action was thereafter res judicata, said: "Under our system of practice, where a party dies or his authority as a representative ceases, two methods of revivor coexist. A conditional order of revivor may issue and be served, and the order made final, unless cause be shown against it, or the court may substitute the new party and supplemental pleadings may be filed and summons served. Fox v. Abbott, 12 Neb. 328, 11 N. W. 303; Rakes v. Brown, 34 Neb. 312, 51 N. W. 848. If the former method be pursued, the proper method of traversing the claim of the person in whose name revivor is attempted is by showing cause against the absolute order. An issue is thus tendered, and if the court make the order absolute, that order becomes res judicata as to the right of the person named to proceed with the action, and the issue cannot be again made and tried with the main case."

So, also, in Fox v. Abbott, 12 Neb. 328, 11 N. W. 303, on error from a proceeding for revivor of a judgment after the death of a plaintiff, under a statute providing for such revivor "in the same manner as is prescribed for reviving actions before judgment," holding that the judgment rendered in such revivor proceedings against a part, but not all, of several defendants, after nunc pro tunc, as of the date when the same was submitted.

(March 21, 1911.)

ERROR to the District Court for Noble County to review a judgment refusing to allow plaintiffs to file their supplemental petition in an action to foreclose a mortgage on certain property, executed by defendant Wickard to secure an alleged indebtedness due to plaintiff Boyes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harris & Wilson and Claude Nowlin, for plaintiffs in error:

The order of revival was made by consent of all the parties.

Wilson v. Smith, 22 Gratt. 493; Clark v. Parish, 1 Bibb, 547; Maury v. Fitzwater, 88 Fed. 768.

Actions to foreclose mortgages upon real service on such part of them of a conditional order provided for by the statute as a summary remedy for reviving actions, was unauthorized because the revival of a joint judgment in that mode must be joint in form, the court said: "The chapter providing for a summary revivor of actions is not exclusive. The court undoubtedly has power, under § 45 of the Code, to allow the action to be prosecuted by or against the representatives of a deceased party, in which case supplemental pleadings may be filed and summons served, as in the commencement of an action."

And in Hunter v. Leahy, 18 Neb. 91, 24 N. W. 680, on error from a proceeding by motion to revive a judgment under the same statutory provision, where it was claimed that the right to revive was barred under the Code provision that "an order to revive an action against the representatives or successor of a defendant shall not be made without the consent of such representatives or successor, unless in one year from the time it could have been first made," the court said: "The mode of reviving actions by motion is not exclusive. A party may, after the expiration of a year, revive an action by bill or supplemental petition. . . . We do not think the restriction as to time applies to the revivor of judgments."

The statutes of some states provide methods of revivor which on their face are more clearly coexistent and supplementary. Thus, in New York, the Code of Procedure formerly provided as to the revivor of actions in case of the death or other disability of the party, the court might, on motion at any time within one year thereafter, or afterwards on a supplemental complaint, allow the action to be continued by or against his representative or successor in interest.

And in Bornsdorff v. Lord, 41 Barb. 211, affirming an order denying a motion of the property of a deceased mortgagor should be brought against the administrator or executor of the estate, and the heirs are not even necessary parties.

Bayly v. Muehe, 65 Cal. 345, 3 Pac. 467, 4 Pac. 486; Dickey v. Gibson, 121 Cal. 276, 53 Pac. 704; Finger v. McCaughey, 119 Cal. 59, 51 Pac. 13; McCaughey v. Lyall, 152 Cal. 615, 93 Pac. 681.

A revivor may be had by supplementary pleading after the period within which a summary revivor may be had has expired. In such proceedings, laches, and not limitations, must be shown in order to defeat the right to revive.

Mr. H. B. Martin for defendants in error.

Turner, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On November 10, 1902, H. L. Boyes, one of the plaintiffs in error, sued S. A. Wickard, George A. Masters, and the First National Bank of Canute, Kansas, in the district court of Noble county, on a certain promissory note for $2,564.75, theretofore made, executed, and delivered to plaintiff plaintiff made more than a year after the death of the defendant, for leave to continue the action against the executor of the deceased defendant, by filing a supplemental complaint, the court, construing this Code provision, held that two distinct methods were provided, the one by motion within a year from the death of the deceased party, and the other by supplemental complaint after the expiration of the year, for leave to file which no motion or other application to the court was necessary or proper.

And to the same effect is Roach v. La Farge, 43 Barb. 616, also affirming an order denying a like motion, on the ground that the motion was unnecessary and improper.

Under the present New York Code of Civil Procedure it has been held that the provision of § 760 for the continuance of an action against the representative or successor in interest of a deceased defendant, that if the application be made on the part of the plaintiff, "the court may direct that a supplemental summons issue, and that supplemental pleadings be made," is not exclusive, but under § 758 an action may be revived at the instance of either a plaintiff or a defendant by order,—the provision of § 760 being merely to permit a supplemental summons to be issued at the instance of a plaintiff where the defendant to be brought in is a nonresident, upon whom an order cannot be effectively served out of the state.

Minnesota, South Carolina, and Wisconsin also seem to have had statutory provisions very similar to that of the former New York Code of Procedure, and under such provisions it has been held that a continuance in the name of his personal representative or heirs as parties, more than a year after the death of a party, unless stipulated, can be properly allowed only on supplemental complaint, and not upon motion. Lee v. O'Shaughnessy, 20 Minn. 173, Gil. 157; Arthur v. Allen, 22 S. C. 432.

But no leave of the court is necessary for the filing of a supplemental complaint to revive the action. Arthur v. Allen, supra; Parnell v. Maner, 16 S. C. 348.

Under such a statute it has also been held that the mode of revival by motion within one year is not exclusive, although no complaint was served before the plaintiff died, but any complaint made by his representative is a "supplemental complaint," within the meaning of the statute, whereon the action may be continued after one year from the death of the plaintiff. Plumer v. McDonald Lumber Co. 74 Wis. 141, 42 N. W. 250.

In Stephens v. Magor, 25 Wis. 533, followed in Tarbox v. French, 27 Wis. 651, it was held that the mode of revivor provided by chap. 363, Laws of 1860, was merely cumulative, and that an action could still be revived and continued in the name of the administrator of the deceased plaintiff by an order made upon motion and order to show cause, under § 1, chap. 135, of the Revised Statutes.

In equity.

The methods provided by statutes for continuing a suit in equity on the death of a party are not, as a rule, exclusive of the old chancery methods. Thus, the summary method provided by § 15 of the Colorado Code, for continuing an action by the representative of a deceased plaintiff upon motion, is not exclusive of the chancery remedy by filing a complaint in the nature of a bill of revivor and supplement; and where matters occurring subsequent to the commencement of an action to set aside for fraud a pretended foreclosure of a trust deed necessitate the bringing in of new parties defendant, the latter method of reviving the action is the better procedure. Barlow v. Hitzler, 40 Colo. 109, 90 Pac. 90.

And in Maryland, § 146a, art. 16, supplement to the Code, providing a new and simpler method of reviving a suit in equity, does not abrogate the former mode of reviving a suit by a bill of revivor. Sinclair v. Auxiliary Realty Co. 99 Md. 223, 57 Atl. 664.

So, in Tennessee, it has been held that the by said Wickard and Masters, and to foreclose a certain mortgage upon certain lots in the city of Perry, given plaintiff by Wickard to secure the payment of the same. The first National Bank of Canute, Kansas, was alleged in the petition to have some interest in or lien upon the lots junior to the mortgage of plaintiff, and was made a party defendant. The note and mortgage was attached as exhibits to his petition. Later defendants appeared and demurred, pending which the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, the other plaintiff in error, was, by amended petition, made a party plaintiff. On April 28, 1903, defendants demurred to said amended petition, and the First National Bank of Canute, Kansas, filed its answer thereto. On July 1, 1903, the death of S. A. Wickard was suggested, and the action, by consent, was by the court ordered revived against his heirs, Dan K. Wickard, Dora M. Wickard, Sarah K. Wickard, Jessie B. Wickard, Susan F. Wickard, and Robert M. Wickard, the three last named being minors, and a guardian ad litem appointed for them, who accepted the appointment and was sworn and qualified as such then and there in open court. Later all of said adult heirs for themselves, and said minor heirs by statutory mode of reviving causes in equity by scire facias is not exclusive, but after the time limitation fixed by the statute for reviving a suit by scire facias, the suit stands as if no statute had ever been passed, and may be revived by bill of revivor as in the English chancery practice. Cobb v. Conway, 1 Overt. 294.

And where the parties against whom it is sought to revive are nonresidents, so that they cannot be brought before the court by the process of scire facias, either a bill of revivor or the remedy by motion and order may be resorted to, as the mode of revivor. Foster v. Burem, 1 Heisk. 783.

So, the remedy provided by the statutes of Virginia and West Virginia providing for the revival of chancery causes by scire facias or on motion without notice is not exclusive, but parties entitled to revive may resort to a bill of revivor if they chose. Reid v. Stuart, 20 W. Va. 382; Bock v. Bock, 24 W. Va. 586.

And the summary method of revivor prescribed by title 11 of the Kentucky Code does not impair the right to bring any necessary party before the court by other appropriate means after the time has passed for a summary Code revivor, where a party to an action, who had become a purchaser at a judicial sale therein, dies before the report of the sale has been confirmed. Gardner v. Roberts, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 614 (abstract).

The nonexclusiveness of the statutory mode of revival also appears inferentially in Benson v. Wolverton, 16 N. J. Eq. 110, where, in denying a motion by the defendant for an order to revive a suit in chancery on the death of the sole complainant, under a statute providing for substituting new parties and continuing suits by order, instead of resorting to a bill of revivor, but only at the instance of a plaintiff, the court said, without deciding whether it was a proper case for a revivor in any manner: "It is clear that it is not a case within the provisions of the statute, and if the suit be revived, it can only be by bill of revivor."

So, in Hall v. Hall, 1 Bland, Ch. 130, holding that a statutory mode of revival of suits in chancery provided, in place of bills of revivor, in cases of abatement by the death of a party, could not be resorted to therein, as it was a case of abatement by the marriage of a female plaintiff, the court said: "The act has neither expressly nor impliedly abrogated the mode of reviving a suit by bill of revivor, but has only given this new method of proceeding as an additional mode of attaining that object, which before could only be effected by a bill of revivor."

And in Floyd v. Ritter, 65 Ala. 501, an appeal from a bill in chancery, holding that the mode in which the administrator and heirs of a deceased defendant had been made parties to the cause in the court of chancery was a substantial compliance with a provision of the 102d rule of practice, the court said: "It was, doubtless, very irregular, if conformity to the rules of practice originally prevailing in courts of chancery could now be required. . . . This practice may yet be pursued if parties so elect; or the chancellor may, if he deems it proper, compel parties to pursue it. But the parties, if not otherwise ordered by the chancellor, may revive in the mode pointed out in the 102d rule of practice."

But in Keep v. Crawford, 92 Ill. App. 587, it was held that the abatement act, providing that a suit in equity in which a sole complainant dies may proceed by suggesting the death upon the record, and substituting as complainant the one to whom the cause of action survives, if it did not repeal by implication the previously enacted chancery act, in so far as the abatement act provided a method of procedure different from that of the chancery act, at least excluded from operation the general provision of the chancery acts for procedure according to the usage and practice of courts of equity, in cases not otherwise provided for, as applied to the revival of suits in equity in case of the death of a sole complainant, for which the chancery act made no express method of procedure; and the mode of procedure prescribed by the abatement act excludes and renders improper a bill of revivor, which would have been made the mode of procedure under the general usage and practice of courts of equity in such case. A. C. W.

their said guardian, filed answers to plaintiffs' amended petition, to which plaintiffs replied. Upon the issues thus joined the cause was tried to the court, and judgment rendered and entered in favor of plaintiffs against the defendant George A. Masters for $3,398.29, interest and principal due on said note. At the same time the court found that the mortgage sought to be foreclosed had been paid; that the defendant the First National Bank of Canute, Kansas, and said heirs of S. A. Wickard, deceased, were not indebted to plaintiffs, and judgment was entered accordingly.

After motion for a new trial filed and overruled, plaintiffs commenced proceedings in error in the supreme court of the territory of Oklahoma. There, on September 6, 1905, the judgment of the district court was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Boyes v. Masters, 17 Okla. 460, 89 Pac. 198. After the submission and before the decision of the cause in the supreme court, to wit, on March 19, 1905, Dora M. Wickard died. As soon as the fact of her death became known to plaintiffs, they, on June 3, 1907, after the return of the mandate, suggested her death in the district court, and, it appearing to the court to be true, that she was one of the executors of the last will of S. A. Wickard, that Dan K. Wickard and Sarah (Wickard) Clemens were coexecutors of her last will and testament, and that Dan K. Wickard was then sole executor of the last will and testament of said S. A. Wickard, deceased, it was ordered by the court that Dan K. Wickard and Sarah K. (Wickard) Clemens, as the coexecutors of Dora M. Wickard, be and they were made parties defendant, and ordered served with summons, and plaintiffs were given leave to file a supplemental petition, setting forth their cause of action against said defendants.

On June 7, 1907, pursuant to leave thus granted, plaintiffs filed their supplemental petition against the defendants Dan K. Wickard, as sole executor of the last will of S. A. Wickard, deceased, and against Dan K. Wickard and Sarah K. (Wickard) Clemens, coexecutors of the last will of Dora M. Wickard, deceased, and embodied therein their original amended petition, and prayed judgment against said defendants as in said original and amended and supplemental petitions set forth, and for general relief. After service by publication, on September 16, 1907, defendants' attorney appeared, and to the court in substance stated that theretofore, at the time of the revivor against the heirs of S. A. Wickard, deceased, three of said heirs were minors; that no service of a motion to revive said action had ever been served on them, by reason of which said pretended order of revivor against them was void; that after the death of Dora M. Wickard, said proceeding in the supreme court of the territory of Oklahoma was not thereafter revived in said court; that all subsequent proceedings in said court were void; that at the time of the revivor of the cause in the district court against the heirs of Dora M. Wickard, deceased, more than one year had elapsed from the time of her death, and for that and the further reason that said order of revivor was entered without the consent of the defendants in said action, the same was void; and moved to dismiss the cause at plaintiffs' cost.

On October 11, 1907, plaintiffs brought into court their amended supplemental petition, therein made reference to their petition, amended petition, and supplemental petition, made the contents thereof a part of their amended supplemental petition, and asked leave to file the same. After stating therein that at the time the revivor was had against the heirs of S. A. Wickard, deceased, they believed the attorneys therein appearing for them had authority so to do, and that said revivor was good; that their opinion then was that said minors could not be bound by consent of their attorneys: that since said attempted revivor all of said heirs, except Robert M. Wickard, had become of age and continued to appear in said cause; that neither plaintiffs nor their attorneys knew of the death of Dora M. Wickard until more than one year thereafter; that she died a nonresident, after which her attorneys continued to appear for her in said cause; that, notwithstanding Jessie B. Wickard and Susan F. Wickard have since said attempted revivor appeared as parties defendant in said cause, out of an abundance of caution they are included as such in the amended supplemental petition; that all parties against whom the revivor is sought are nonresidents of the state, and claim no interest in the mortgaged property, except as devisees of said S. A. and Dora M. Wickard, deceased; that George A. Masters is the duly appointed and qualified guardian of the person and estate of Jessie B. Wickard, Susan F. Wickard, and Robert M. Wickard. They prayed that said heirs and Dora K. Wickard, as executor of the last will of S. A. Wickard, and Dan K. Wickard, and Sarah K. (Wickard) Clemens, and George A. Masters, as guardian of said minor heirs of S. A. Wickard, be made parties defendant; that they be required to set up what interest, if any, they have in the property in controversy, and for leave to make service on them and to carry on this cause against said parties as parties in interest, and for judgment as prayed in their original petition. At the time said application was filed, there was filed by defendants a motion to dismiss the cause, both of which were submitted together, but no action was taken thereon until March 27, 1908, at which time they came on for hearing in the district court of Noble county. There, on April 23, 1908, both the application and motion to dismiss were overruled, and plaintiffs bring the case here. As Dan K., Dora M., and Sarah K., Wickard were of age at the time of the death of S. A. Wickard, and the propriety of the subsequent revivor against them by consent being unquestioned, the same will be no further noticed.

It is assigned for error that the court abused its discretion in refusing to permit plaintiffs to file their said supplemental petition. Having heretofore decided in Goldborough v. Hewitt, 26 Okla. 859, 110 Pac. 906, that the fact of the death of a defendant in error between the submission and decision of a cause in this court does not impair the validity of the judgment thereafter rendered, and that this court will, on proper showing, set aside the judgment, recall the mandate, and direct the clerk to refile the opinion and enter judgment in the case nunc pro tunc, as of the date when the same was submitted, we are of the opinion that the death of Dora A. Wickard did not affect the judgment of reversal by the supreme court of the territory of Oklahoma (Boyes v. Masters, 17 Okla. 460, 89 Pac. 198), and hence the controversy before us may be considered eliminated of that fact. Assuming, out of an abundance of caution, as plaintiffs' counsel has done, that, upon the suggestion of the death of S. A. Wickard, the suit was not properly revived in the district court against his minor heirs by consent, and the order of court thereupon entered, and further assuming with counsel for both sides that said heirs and the executors of the last will of said Wickard and Dora M. Wickard, his wife, are necessary parties to the action of foreclosure set forth in the original petition, the only question passed on by the trial court, and which is for us to determine, is whether the summary method of revivor of actions prescribed by article 19 of chapter 66 of Wilson's Revised and Annotated Statutes of Oklahoma is exclusive, and, if not, whether, under §§ 4238 and 4348 of said statute, the court should have permitted by this proceeding a revivor of this action against said heirs and the executors of said Wickard and Dora M., his wife. Section 4238 of Wilson's Revised and Annotated Statutes of Oklahoma provides: "An action does not abate by the death or other disability of a party, or by the transfer of any interest therein during its pendency, if the cause of action survive or continue. In case of the death or other disability of a party, the court may allow the action to continue by or against his representatives or successor in interest. In case of any other transfer of interest, the action may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action."

Article 19, chap. 66, provides in substance for the revivor of the action, when it survives, by a conditional order of court to be made in term, or by a judge if in vacation. It provides a method of service of the order, and, if sufficient cause is not shown against the revivor, the action stands revived. It further provides, in substance, that the order cannot be made except by consent within one year from the time it could have been first made. The right to revive under this article does not depend on the discretion of the court or judge making the order, but, under the conditions and within the time therein limited, is a matter of right. Kilgore v. Yarnell, 24 Okla. 525, 103 Pac. 698. Section 4348 reads: "Either party may be allowed, on notice, and on such terms as to costs as the court may prescribe, to file a supplemental petition, answer, or reply, alleging facts material to the case, occurring after the former petition, answer, or reply." Construing similar statutes, the following cases hold that the method provided in article 19 of chapter 66, supra, is not exclusive of the right of the court to permit it to be prosecuted against the representatives of a defendant, as provided in § 4238, supra, and to revive it by supplemental petition, as provided for in the last section of the statute cited: Carter v. Jennings, 24 Ohio St. 182; Black v. Hill, 29 Ohio St. 87; Fox v. Abbott, 12 Neb. 333, 11 N. W. 303; Rakes v. Brown, 34 Neb. 304, 51 N. W. 848; Hunter v. Leahy, 18 Neb. 81, 24 N. W. 680; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Fox, 56 Neb. 746, 77 N. W. 130.

The leading case on the subject seems to be Carter v. Jennings, 24 Ohio St. 182. That was a suit for the cancellation of a note and mortgage. Subsequent to the filing of the report of the referee, the defendant died, and letters of administration were granted on his estate. After more than one year had expired from the date of his death, plaintiff applied for an order to revive the action against his administrators. The order was granted, as also was leave to plaintiff to file a supplemental petition to revive the action against said administrators. Among the defenses pleaded was that there was no motion for a conditional order of revivor within one year from the time the suit could have been first revived, and that there was no revivor of the same, either actual or conditional, within one year after the appointment of said administrators, and that said administrators did not consent to revive the action. On the hearing the district court found the facts as stated, and that neither plaintiff nor his attorneys had knowledge of the appointment of the administrator until about the time application was first made to revive. The case went to the supreme court on a question reserved. There the court, speaking to title 13, chap. 1, of the Code (2 Swan & C. Rev. Stat.), substantially the same as our article 19, chap. 66, supra, said: "That chapter of the Code provides for reviving the action, where the right of action survives, by a conditional order of the court if made in term, or by a judge if in vacation. The order is to be served in the mode prescribed, and if sufficient cause be not shown against the revivor, the action stands revived. The order cannot be made, except by consent, unless within one year from the time it could have been first made. When, under the provisions contained in the chapter, an action stands revived, the trial is not to be postponed by reason of the revivor, if the action would have stood for trial in case no revivor had become necessary."

Speaking to a section of the Code almost identical with our § 4238, supra, the court said: "Title 3 of the Code treats of the general rules in regard to parties, and of the authority of the court to allow a change of parties, and to require others to be brought in, when necessary to a determination of the controversy. Under this title, § 39 provides, among other things, that an action does not abate by the death of a party during its pendency, if the cause of action survive or continue. 'That in case of the death . . . of a party the court may allow the action to continue by or against his representative or successor in interest.' . . . While we have not found the question free from difficulty, we have arrived at the conclusion that a fair construction of the Code warrants us in laying down the following propositions as applicable to the case: (1) The right to revive an action, under title 13, chap. 1, of the Code, is not dependent on the discretion of the court or of the judge making the order, but, under the conditions and within the time therein limited, is a matter of right. (2) The chapter of the Code above referred to provides a summary remedy for reviving an action, but the remedy thus provided is not exclusive. The court has power, under § 39 of the Code, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to allow the action to be prosecuted by or against the representatives or successor in interest of a deceased party. For this purpose supplemental pleadings may be allowed and process served as in the commencement of an action. (3) The court, in the exercise of this discretion, is governed by the equitable principle which requires reasonable diligence and good faith on the part of those invoking its action; and where the time has elapsed within which an action can be revived by a conditional order, as provided for in title 13, chap. 1, of the Code, the application for leave to continue the suit by supplemental pleading may be granted or refused, according to the nature and circumstances of the case. . . . On the supplemental petition, the action is ordered to be revived against the administrators of Jennings. As to all other matters, the cause is remanded to the district court for further proceeding." Although the court did not speak of it, § 142, chap. 7, title 7, identical with our § 4348, supra, was in force in that jurisdiction at that time. To the same effect is the holding of the supreme court of Nebraska construing similar statutes.

Maxwell's Pleading and Practice, 5th ed. 713, says: "The summary mode of reviving actions provided by the Code is not exclusive. The court has power under § 45 of the Code to allow the action to be prosecuted by or against the representatives or successors in interest of a deceased party. For this purpose supplemental pleadings may be allowed and process served as in the commencement of an action,"—citing Carter v. Jennings, supra; Fox v. Abbott, 12 Neb. 328, 11 N. W. 303.

Section 45 of the Code referred to is substantially the same as our Code; § 4238, supra, and article 19, chap. 66, supra, are substantially the same, if not identical, with title 13 of their Code of Civil Procedure (Neb. Comp. Stat. 1889). Construing said statutory provisions, the court, in Fox v. Abbott, 12 Neb. 328, 11 N. W. 303, said: "Title 13 of the Code provides a summary remedy for reviving actions by a conditional order of the court if made in term time, or by a judge if in vacation. . . . The court undoubtedly has power under § 45 of the Code to allow the action to be prosecuted by or against the representatives of a deceased party, in which case it is a matter of right. (2) The chapter of the Code above referred to provides a summary remedy for reviving an action, but the remedy thus provided is not exclusive. The court has power, under § 39 of the Code, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to allow the action to be prosecuted by or against the representatives or successor in interest of a deceased party. For this purpose supplemental pleadings may be allowed and process served as in the commencement of an action. (3) The court, in the exercise of this discretion, is governed by the equitable principle which requires reasonable diligence and good faith on the part of those invoking its action; and where the time has elapsed within which an action can be revived by a conditional order, as provided for in title 13, chap. 1, of the Code, the application for leave to continue the suit by supplemental pleading may be granted or refused, according to the nature and circumstances of the case. . . . On the supplemental petition, the action is ordered to be revived against the administrators of Jennings. As to all other matters, the cause is remanded to the district court for further proceeding." Although the court did not speak of it, § 142, chap. 7, title 7, identical with our § 4348, supra, was in force in that jurisdiction at that time. To the same effect is the holding of the supreme court of Nebraska construing similar statutes.

supplemental pleadings may be filed and summons served as in the commencement of an action. And this is the practice in Ohio under a similar statute. Carter v. Jennings, 24 Ohio St. 182." To the same effect, see Stephens v. Magor, 25 Wis. 533; also Tarbox v. French, 27 Wis. 651.

We are therefore of opinion that article 19 of chapter 66 is not a method of revivor exclusive of all others; that, as in equity a suit becomes in one way defective by the death of a party, so this cause became defective on the death of Wickard and later upon the death of his wife, but did not abate by reason of § 4238, supra; that, not abating after the remedy afforded by said article was not available by reason of lapse of time, it could only be revived by pursuing the procedure afforded by § 4348, supra, prescribing a remedy concurrent with that prescribed by said article and analogous to that afforded under the old chancery system, which was that on the death of a party, the action not abating, the same could be revived only by a bill of revivor, a bill of revivor and supplement, and by an original bill in the nature of a bill of revivor. *Mite. Eq. Pl. 57 and 61.

To make a supplemental petition the proper procedure to secure the relief theretofore obtainable under those old forms, § 4348, supra, was enacted. Concerning said section the court, in Kimble v. Seal, 92 Ind. 276, said: "This section of the statute is in the spirit of the Code practice abolishing the distinctions in pleading and practice between actions at law and suits in equity, and combines the provisions of the old chancery supplemental bill with the ancient plea of pais darrein continuance. Facts existing at the time of filing a pleading may be made a part thereof by way of amendment. If they have occurred since the filing of the pleading, they can only be made a part thereof by a supplemental pleading. Bicknell, Pr., pp. 108 & 109. See authorities therein cited."

We are also of opinion, the object of the original petition being to foreclose a mortgage on realty, executed by Wickard to secure an alleged indebtedness due to the plaintiff Boyes, that upon his death and the death of his wife, plaintiff had the right and should be permitted to pursue his remedy against their legal representatives, and to that end should have been permitted, no question of laches raised, as here, to bring them in by supplemental petition. The court erred in refusing his permission so to do. We have not been favored with a brief for defendant in error.

reversed and remanded, with directions, to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

HENRY RAINES, Plff. in Err.,

v.

CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carrier — premature embarkation — responsibility.

Where one intending to become a passenger, and while the work of preparing the train on which he intends to take passage is going on, necessitating dangerous switchings and coupling of the cars, of which he has notice, and at a point where the carrier is not accustomed to receive passengers, and without notice to or invitation by any officer or agent of the carrier with authority, enters one of the coaches, and, in attempting to go from one coach to another, is injured by a jolt or impact given to the coaches in making such switchings or couplings, the carrier is not liable to him in damages for his injuries thus sustained.

Headnote by MILLER, J.

Note. — Liability of carrier for injuries to intending passenger who enters car prematurely.

This note is not intended to cover cases of boarding a moving train, as where a person intending to become a passenger attempts to board the train before it had come to a stop. As to negligence of passengers in getting on or off a moving train, see note to Hoyleman v. Kanawha & M. R. Co. 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 741.

The decisions in the cases cited in this note turn largely upon the particular facts and circumstances, and seem to admit of no generalization other than that the high degree of care ordinarily owed by a carrier to a passenger does not obtain in favor of one who, without the carrier's knowledge and in the absence of any custom to that effect, boards a car prematurely, before it is ready for the reception of passengers.

Thus, it was said in Farley v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 47 C. C. A. 156, 108 Fed. 14, that the obligations of a carrier to exercise that high degree of care for the safety of its passengers does not exist with respect to one who, without the knowledge of the carrier, boards a car knowing that ERROR to the Circuit Court for Raleigh County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. A. Lilly and M. F. Matheny, for plaintiff in error:

One intending to take passage on a railway passenger train, who goes to the station a reasonable time before the departure of the train, is from the time of his arrival at the place a passenger.

2 Wood, Railway Law, p. 1046; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Galliher, 89 Va. 639, 16 S. E. 935; Boggess v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 37 W. Va. 297, 23 L.R.A. 777, 16 S. E. 525;

the car is not ready for receiving passengers, and that it is not expected or intended that it should be entered at that time or place. As to the effect of a custom or usage to establish a carrier's liability where a person has entered a train before it was ready, the court said: "The difficulty to a railroad company in exercising a high degree of care towards persons on cars in motion in its switch yards, and the increased liability from obligation to do so, are so manifest that a usage or custom relied on to create the relation of carrier and passenger, and impose on the railroad company this high duty, ought, under such conditions, upon the plainest principles of justice, to be established by evidence which shows, or strongly tends to show, a well-defined, definite, and continuous practice, from which knowledge on the part of the company may be fairly inferred."

In Curry v. Georgia Midland & G. R. Co. 92 Ga. 293, 18 S. E. 422, it was held that the railroad company was not liable for an injury to a person who boarded a train at a place where the conductor had distinctly announced to persons assembled that passengers would not get aboard, but that the train would move up and stop for them at another place.

But the fact that a train is being made up and is not ready for the reception of passengers is not available as a defense where it is customary for passengers to board the train at that time and place, and plaintiff in fact did so at the express invitation, or at least with the implied consent, of the carrier's employees. Wise v. Wabash R. Co. 135 Mo. App. 230, 115 S. W. 452.

A carrier is not liable as such to one who goes upon the train before it is ready to depart, if such person knew, or under the circumstances ought to have known, that it was not ready; but if under the condition and situation of the train, and the actions and conduct of the train officers, viewed in the light of the circumstances surrounding them at the time, the intending passenger was justified in believing, and did honestly believe, that the train when he boarded it was about departing, and it was impracticable for him to get off after discovering his mistake, then he was a passenger, and entitled to his rights as such. Brown v. Scarboro, 97 Ala. 316, 12 So. 289.

Where a carrier receives a person into its car or train before such train is made up, it is bound, in making up its train, to couple its cars and manage and control its cars and engines in such a careful, skilful, and prudent manner as to carry the person so received as a passenger with reasonable safety. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Martin, 111 Ill. 225.

And so, in Miller v. Atlanta & C. Air Line R. Co. 143 N. C. 115, 55 S. E. 439, it was held that an instruction to the jury to the effect that if the plaintiff boarded the rear car of a freight train before it was coupled to the engine, that is, before the train was made up, he boarded such car wrongfully, and for this reason could not recover for his injury, was erroneous, because the liability of the railroad company did not depend exclusively upon whether the car was coupled to the engine when plaintiff got aboard, there being, at least, some evidence that the plaintiff had gone to the car and entered it with the knowledge of the company's servants, if not with their implied consent; and even if then at first to blame for boarding the car, the company might not have exercised the care which the plaintiff's position under the circumstances required,—which questions were for the jury to determine.

The evidence was held sufficient to sustain a finding that one became a passenger, in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Simmons, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 500, 33 S. W. 1096, where it was shown that the cars intended for passengers were standing a short distance from the platform, waiting for the freight train of which they were to be a part to be coupled on; that several men, among them the plaintiff, intending to become passengers, without having purchased tickets, but having money to pay their fare, entered one of these coaches without notifying the conductor, but with the knowledge

Messrs. Simms, Enslow, Fitzpatrick, & Baker, for defendant in error:

Even where an intending passenger holds a ticket, the duty from the carrier to him does not arise until he has come under the charge of the carrier in some way.

The liability of the carrier is not absolute. The passenger assumes the risks ordinarily incident to the coupling of cars.

App. 112, 72 S. W. 81; Choate v. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. 90 Tex. 82, 36 S. W. 247, 37 S. W. 319; Louisville & N. R. Co. v.

of the brakeman. It appeared also that after the switching was completed, the train was to be moved up opposite the platform to receive passengers, and that the ticket office and waiting room were open and some passengers waiting there to take the train.

Contributory negligence.

An intending passenger who boards a train or car before it has been put in readiness to receive passengers is not guilty of negligence which will bar his recovery for an injury received under such circumstances, when his act was in accordance with a custom which has been acquiesced in by the company.

Thus, a recovery for an injury received in boarding a passenger coach attached to a freight train, while the coach was 200 to 400 feet from the station, was allowed in Jones v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 46 App. Div. 470, 61 N. Y. Supp. 721, although it appeared that at the station in question there was more or less shifting of the cars, and when the train was finally made up the conductor had the train pull up to the station and stop for passengers if there were any. The following from the opinion best explains the holding: "In the prevailing opinion of Chief Judge Parker written upon the reversal of the former judgment, it was held that no custom was shown to take passengers on except at the station, and that, without evidence sufficient to authorize a finding of such a custom, the defendant did not owe the duty to use care at that point to protect anyone who might be boarding the train without authority. Upon this trial, however, the plaintiff has produced evidence from which a jury could find that such custom existed, with the acquiescence, if not the encouragement, of the defendant's employees."

It is not negligence per se to enter, with other passengers, a car detached from a train, and in apparent readiness except that it was detached, at the time designated for the departure of the train, and without known objection from the carrier; and one who entered a car under such circumstances was held not guilty of contributory negligence, in Root v. Catskill Mt. R. Co. 33 Fed. 858.

In affirming a recovery against the defendant railroad company for injuries received while the plaintiff was on board one of the company's trains, the court said, in Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Roberts, 88 Miss. 80, 40 So. 481: "Nor do we think that the fact that the passengers boarded the train before the train was ready to start upon its run such negligence as could debar them of recovery. They were prospective passengers, the schedule time for the departure of the train had arrived, the coach was on the track ready for their reception, and they were permitted to board the train with the knowledge and tacit acquiescence of the employees in charge. We think these facts establish the relation of carrier and passenger. At most, it can but be said that in so boarding the train they were guilty of 'mere contributory negligence,' and this is not sufficient to defeat a recovery where the injury is caused by a kicking switch made within a municipality, as was the case in the instance here under review."

It was held in Western Maryland R. Co. v. Herold, 74 Md. 510, 14 L.R.A. 75, 22 Atl. 323, that a woman who entered a car left standing with brakes set, on the grounds of a sanatorium, a few minutes before the time set for it to start, and when no one was in charge of it, but when others were already on board, was not guilty of negligence, as matter of law, which would prevent her recovery for injuries occasioned by the starting of the car when a boy released the brakes, especially where rules against entering the car before notice to do so had never been published or posted, and she had no actual knowledge of them.

It was held in St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Morrow, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 93 S. W. 162, that where an intending passenger was directed by the ticket agent to his train, then standing on the track, but not entirely made up, and was also told

It was plaintiff's duty, if he was a passenger, to have exercised reasonable and ordinary care for his own safety, and when in a safe place, knowing that the engine would recouple to the train at any moment, to have stayed there.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In an action for personal injuries the court below, on its motion directed the jury to find for the defendant, and the jury found accordingly; and to review the judgment of nil capiat thereon, plaintiff brings error to this court.

The correctness of the judgment below depends upon the question whether the evidence adduced before the jury proved, or in an appreciable degree tended to prove, such a case made by the pleadings as entitled plaintiff to have the evidence submitted to the jury on any issuable fact, or whether the facts proven presented but a question of law for the court, as the court below necessarily determined in directing the verdict.

It is alleged and proven that plaintiff sustained the injuries of which he complains at Lester, in Raleigh county, the terminus, so far as passenger traffic is concerned, of a branch line operated by defendant company and connecting with its main line at Prince station. It is also alleged that at the time plaintiff sustained his injury he had become a passenger on the defendant's railway train, and, as such, entitled to all the care and protection which the law imposes upon a carrier of passengers. The court below, however, on certain facts proven, and as to which there is no conflicting evidence, held that at the time plaintiff received his injury, the relationship of carrier and passenger had not begun; that the plaintiff was then a mere intruder, having gone upon the train without the knowledge or invitation of the defendant or of its employees in charge of the train, and before the train had been prepared to receive passengers, which was well known to plaintiff, and at a place where the defendant was not accustomed to receive passengers. In this conclusion we think the court below was clearly right, and that the verdict was properly directed.

The facts are that after the defendant's train had reached Lester, about 10:50 A. M. of the day of the alleged injuries, and as the custom was, after discharging the passengers, the engine had been cut loose and sent around on a loop switch to be brought back in front of and coupled back to the coaches for the return trip. In making its round on the loop, a freight car was encountered which had to be shoved in front of the engine clear around on the main track, and then brought back in front of the engine and set back on the switch out of the way of the train. To do this the custom was, as was well known to plaintiff, to make what is called a running switch, that is, the car was pushed down the main track, and as the engine came back to be hooked up to the train, the car was cut loose before reaching the switch, the switch thrown quickly, and the freight car in this way kicked off or thrown off on the side track. On this occasion plaintiff, who lived but a short distance away, on the arrival of the train that morning, went immediately down to by the porter of the car he entered that it was his train and to go right in, the facts did not call for a charge on assumed risk.

But in Hodges v. New Hanover Transit Co. 107 N. C. 576, 12 S. E. 597, the plaintiff, with other persons, having spent the day at a seaside resort, went to the platform constructed by the defendant for its passengers, from a half to three quarters of an hour before the time their train was to depart, and, in order to avoid the crowds, immediately attempted to board the train, but without invitation or suggestion by defendant's employees. There was no depot or station house to accommodate passengers, but they were allowed as of right to sit and walk on the hotel piazza and in the hotel office. At the time plaintiff went to the cars, lights were burning about the platform and the hotel, but the cars were not lighted nor in readiness for starting, though they stood alongside the platform. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Prior to starting, two signals were to have been given, one fifteen and one five minutes before the time. In attempting to board a car the plaintiff fell and was injured, and the liability of the defendant company therefore was most emphatically denied by the court. The act of the plaintiff was said to have been incautious, imprudent, and grossly negligent. While there is no such suggestion in this case, it would seem that the absence of a proper station for the convenience of waiting passengers might, under some circumstances, be held to justify a passenger in entering his car or train before it was actually in readiness.

the railroad, which was in full view, and without ticket or payment of fare, and, so far as the record shows, without the knowledge or consent of the officers of the train, and before the train had been prepared to receive passengers, and before it had been pulled up to the place where passengers were usually received, and before any announcement by the conductor, as his custom was, calling for passengers to get aboard, entered and took a seat in one of the coaches, followed soon afterwards by two other men. At the suggestion of one of these men, plaintiff left his seat in the car which he had entered followed by the other two men, and started to go into the rear coach. Just as plaintiff stepped upon the platform of the car which he had first entered, in his journey to the rear car, the engine came back, followed closely by the freight car, which the switchman had failed to turn into the switch, and bumped into the passenger coaches in making the coupling, knocking the plaintiff down on the platform, the man immediately behind him falling upon him, the third falling on the second man, and in which fall plaintiff alleges he sustained the injuries complained of. Whether or not the engine as it was driven back in the usual way, or by the added force of the freight car coming in contact with it, gave the passenger coaches any unusual jolt, the evidence is conflicting; but we do not think this point of conflict material; nor do we think it material that it may have been negligence to make running switches as the defendant was accustomed to do, and did do on this occasion, for if plaintiff had not been received as a passenger, the law is that he assumed all the risks of danger incident to the way in which switches and couplings were usually made, before the train was prepared to receive passengers at that point. Besides, if he had remained in his seat in the car which he first entered, he would have sustained no injuries. With knowledge, however, of all the facts which should have put him upon his guard, and knowing that at any moment the engine was liable to be brought back and coupled to the coaches, and without taking any precautions for his own safety, he undertook to enter the coaches and pass from one to the other without notice to or, so far as the evidence shows, knowledge of the train men thereof, and thereby contributed to the injuries sustained.

The proposition cannot be questioned that when one has been received as a passenger the utmost care which human skill, diligence, and foresight can provide to protect him from danger is required of the carrier, and the slightest negligence on the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

carrier's part is regarded gross negligence. This proposition was lastly affirmed in Kennedy v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. — W. Va. —, 70 S. E. 359. But as a proposition of law applicable to this case we think that, where one intending to become a passenger, and while the work of preparing the train on which he intends to take passage is going on, necessitating dangerous switchings and couplings of the cars, of which he has notice, and at a point where the carrier is not accustomed to receive passengers, and without notice to or invitation by any officer or agent of the carrier with authority, enters one of the coaches, and, in attempting to go from one coach to another, is injured by a jolt or impact given to the coaches in making such switches or couplings, the carrier is not liable to him in damages for his injuries thus sustained. Moore, Carriers, 549; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Morrow — (Tex. Civ. App. —), 93 S. W. 162; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Martin, 11 Ill. App. 386; Dewire v. Boston & M. R. Co. 148 Mass. 343, 2 L.R.A. 166, 19 N. E. 523; Choate v. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. 90 Tex. 82, 36 S. W. 247, 37 S. W. 319; Radley v. Columbia Southern R. Co. 44 Or. 332, 75 Pac. 212, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 447; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Green, 81 Ill. 19, 25 Am. Rep. 255; 4 Elliott, Railroads, §§ 1581, 1630. While the cases cited are not exactly parallel, we think they fully support this proposition, and that the principles enunciated therein control this case.

Finding no error in the judgment below, it will be our duty to affirm it, and it will be so ordered.

DOLLAR SAVINGS & TRUST COMPANY

v.

E. T. CRAWFORD et al. Plffs. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 70 S. E. 1089.)

Note — recital of consideration — effect.

1. A recital of the consideration in a note otherwise negotiable in form does not render it non-negotiable.

Same — rights of assignee.

2. The rights of a bona fide assignee of such a note in due course are not affected by the equities of the maker.

Same — notice of consideration — effect.

3. Knowledge by an assignee in due course of a negotiable note, that it was given for the purchase price of a specified quantity of land at a specified price per acre, is not notice to him of failure of title or shortage in quantity.

Same — payable to trustee — effect.

4. The use of the word "trustee" following the name of the payee in a negotiable note does not destroy its negotiability, if the trustee has the right to sell it and receive the proceeds; its only effect is to put the purchaser upon notice concerning the trustee's title and authority in respect to the note.

Same — assignment without recourse.

5. The fact that a note is assigned without recourse casts no suspicion upon the holder's title.

Pleading — note — failure of consideration.

6. Whenever failure of consideration is a proper defense in an action of assumpsit upon a negotiable note, it need not be specially pleaded, but may be proven under the general issue.

Same — application of payment.

7. The holder of a note has the right to apply a partial payment received thereon, first to a discharge of the interest then due, and the balance, if any, to the payment of the principal pro tanto. A memorandum made by him on the note at the time of receiving the partial payment, "Indorsement on principal," followed by the amount received, does not estop him from afterwards applying enough of the payment to discharge the interest then due.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kanawha County sustaining a demurrer to a special plea and directing a verdict for plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Brown, Jackson, and Knight, for plaintiffs in error:

When a purchaser of land, upon taking a bond for title, gives in payment therefor a note expressing on its face that it is so given, the note itself will be notice of his equity in case the title of the land shall prove defective, and an assignee or holder of the note cannot, in case of such defect in the title of the land, recover on the note, though he took it before it became due.

Williams, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff recovered a judgment against E. T. Crawford and W. L. Ashby in the circuit court of Kanawha county on the 20th day of March, 1909, for the sum of $15,411.08, in an action of assumpsit upon a promissory note executed by defendants to Howard Hazlett, trustee, and by him indorsed to plaintiff. To this judgment a writ of error and supersedeas was awarded. Defendants pleaded the general issue, partial payment, and also filed a special plea, setting up failure of consideration. The court sustained plaintiff's demurrer to the special plea; and on the issues joined on the remaining pleas, after hearing the evidence, directed a verdict for plaintiff.

The case has been very carefully briefed, and the points of law relied on are elaborately and ably argued by counsel on both sides. There is no dispute as to facts, and the questions of law are clear cut, and we have only to determine their applicability to the facts in the case.

The first assignment of error relates to the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the special plea. This plea alleged failure of consideration for the note. The note reads as follows:

$35,021.

Wheeling, West Virginia,

April 16, 1904.

Two years . . . after date we promise to pay to the order of Howard Hazlett, trustee, thirty-five thousand and twenty-one 00-dollars, with interest from date until paid, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, in part payment for land . . . in Logan and Boone counties, and upon which a lien has been reserved to secure this note, payable at the National Exchange Bank, Wheeling, West Virginia.

E. T. Crawford.

W. L. Ashby.

The following indorsements appear on the back of the note, viz.: "This note does not begin to bear interest until May 20, 1904. Howard Hazlett, Trustee." "Wheeling, W. Va., April 29, 1905, for value received, assigned, and transferred to the Dollar Savings & Trust Company, of Wheeling, without recourse. Howard Hazlett, Trustee." "Balance due on principal $13,030.90." "Indorsement of principal, May 7, 1906, $26,000."

The special plea avers that the note was executed as part of the purchase price for an undivided one-half interest in 30,018 acres of land purchased of Howard Hazlett, trustee, in Logan and Boone counties, at the price of $7 per acre; that after defendants' purchase of the land, they caused a survey of it to be made, and ascertained that it contained only 27,545.41 acres, thus making a shortage in quantity of 2,472.59 acres; that by virtue of this shortage they were entitled to set off against the note, as of May 20, 1904, the time said note began to bear interest, the sum of $8,654.06; that being a sum representing one half the shortage at $7 an acre. The contract of sale by Hazlett, trustee, and D. F. Frazee, trustee, to Crawford and Ashby, dated February 20, 1904, and also the deed from Hazlett, trustee, dated April 16, 1904, which conveys to Crawford and Ashby the undivided half interest in said land, and which was made pursuant to the contract of sale, are made exhibits with the plea. The plea also contains the following additional averments: "And these defendants further show that the said note was afterwards assigned by said Hazlett, trustee, to the plaintiff without recourse, and with full notice to the plaintiff of the consideration and conditions of said note, and that the said plaintiff at the time of said assignment and transfer had notice that said note was given pursuant to said contract and deed for land at $7 per acre, and was subject thereto and contingent upon the acreage aforesaid, passed by said deed, being equal to 30,018 acres, and that these defendants had full right to set off against said note $3.50 per acre for each acre said tract was short of or less than 30,018 acres."

It is stubbornly urged by counsel for defendants that the recital in the note that it was "in part payment for land in Logan and Boone counties, and upon which a lien has been reserved to secure this note," was sufficient to put plaintiff upon inquiry which, if pursued, would have led to a discovery of defendants' equities. But the plea does not allege that plaintiff actually knew, when the note was assigned to it, that the consideration had in part failed, nor does it allege that anyone knew at that time that there was a shortage. The demurrer admits the truth of the averments, but they are not sufficient to charge plaintiff with notice, or to put it upon inquiry respecting defendants' equities against Hazlett, trustee. Plaintiff knew that the note was given in part payment for land,—the note so informed it; and grant that it knew all the facts which the plea alleges it knew, and also that it knew all the facts that would be disclosed by a reading of both the contract and the deed exhibited with the plea, still they are not sufficient to disclose that there was a shortage in the quantity of land. The contract is not for a supposed or estimated quantity of land, subject to be corrected or modified by future survey; but it was made for the sale of a definite quantity,—a specified number of acres. Is it not reasonable, then, to presume that the contracting parties had satisfied themselves concerning the quantity of land before making the contract and the deed? Does the recital in the contract and deed that the land contains 30,018 acres convey any notice that there is a shortage? Certainly not; it is rather an assurance that it does contain the quantity, than that it does not. The plea does not aver that anyone, not excepting defendants themselves, knew when the note was assigned to plaintiff that there was a shortage. Therefore, so far as it appears from the plea and its exhibits, there is nothing to indicate that plaintiff knew, or could have ascertained by any amount of diligent inquiry, short of having an actual survey made of the land, and there was or would be a shortage.

Unless the note is rendered non-negotiable, either by the recital of the consideration or by the fact that it is payable to, and assigned by, Hazlett in the capacity of trustee, and the defense of equities thereby let in, there is nothing in the plea or its exhibits which is sufficient to affect plaintiff with such notice as to let them in. The note is payable at the National Exchange Bank, and is negotiable in form.

The recital of the consideration for which it was given does not render it non-negotiable; neither does it put plaintiff upon notice of defendants' equities, there being nothing to indicate a failure of the consideration, either in whole or in part.

The equities between the makers and the payee are secret or latent, and there is nothing to affect the assignee with notice of their existence. A negotiable note, reciting that it is for the purchase price of a horse, a house, or lands, does not render it uncertain, and is no notice whatever to the assignee that the payee's title to the property will fail. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 797; 7 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 947. In fact, we know of but one court which has taken a different view, and that is the supreme court of North Carolina, in the case of Howard v. Kimball, 65 N. C. 175, 6 Am. Rep. 739. But that decision has been criticized by text writers, and seems to be generally regarded as unsound; it is not followed by other courts. Daniel, in his excellent work on Negotiable Instruments, vol. 1, § 797, says: "The mere statement of the consideration in a bill or note does not put the holder upon inquiry whether or not it really passed, or has failed in any respect. It is rather assuring than otherwise, for it is evidence, if the note be genuine, that it was given for value; and the specification of what value can no more challenge the holder's investigation than the omission of such specification. In legal effect it does not qualify the paper in any manner."

The true rule applicable in the case of an indorsee who has acquired the paper in regular course, and the maker of a note, as to the effect to be given to a recital of the consideration, is briefly stated in 7 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 947, as follows: "If the purchaser knows at the time of his purchase that the consideration for which the note was given has failed, if he is informed that the validity of the consideration is a question yet to be tested, or if he knows or has legal constructive notice that the consideration is illegal, he cannot be considered a bona fide holder. But a failure of the consideration, in whole or in part, after a bona fide transfer, does not affect the character of the purchaser, although he had full knowledge of the original consideration for which the note was given." See also, 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 305.

Counsel for defendants cite Studebaker Mfg. Co. v. Dickson, 70 Mo. 272. But that case differs materially from the case in hand. As in this case, that was an action brought by the assignee of negotiable paper, and the defense was failure of consideration. But in that case it appears that before the note was assigned, the indorsee received the following telegram from the maker: "The note mentioned will be good if consideration for which it was given has not been misrepresented; this is not tested yet." The court there properly held that the plaintiff "thereby became chargeable with notice that the validity of the note was a question which remained to be tested, and, if it was procured by fraud or by misrepresentation, he could not enforce it." But in the case which we are reviewing nothing appears which was sufficient to arouse the least suspicion of a failure of consideration; and, consequently, nothing which would call for an investigation. Furthermore, it is not made to appear that, if an investigation had been made at the time the note was assigned, it would have led to a discovery that a shortage existed in the land. It required a survey of the land to ascertain this. Whether the survey was made before or after the note was assigned to plaintiff the plea does not aver. Nothing appears in the pleadings or in the evidence, to indicate that anyone knew at the time the note was transferred that there was an actual shortage.

The fact that the note was made payable to Hazlett in the capacity of trustee, and that it was so assigned by him, does not affect its negotiability, nor oblige the purchaser to inquire into the matter of its consideration. According to nearly all the authorities, the most that could be required of the purchaser in such case is the exercise of proper diligence to ascertain the authority of the trustee to sell the note and to receive the proceeds. Further than this we do not see that its negotiability is affected by its being made payable to a trustee. Hazlett's authority to dispose of the note is not questioned. Perry, Tr. § 225. Such words as "trustee," "agent," "executor," etc., are generally held to be merely descriptio personæ. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 271 & 301; 7 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 563, and numerous cases cited in note. In Fox v. Citizens' Bank & T. Co. — Tenn. —, 35 L.R.A. 678, 37 S. W. 1102, it is held: "The addition of the word 'trustee' to the name of the payee of a note does not destroy its negotiability." 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Third Nat. Bank v. Lange, 51 Md. 138, 34 Am. Rep. 304, is the only authority to which our attention has been called which holds a contrary doctrine. But that case seems to stand by itself, as does the case of Howard v. Kimball, supra, from North Carolina, which holds the converse of the other proposition, above discussed, that the recital of the consideration in a negotiable note is not notice to the assignee in due course, of original equities.

Hazeltine v. Keenan, 54 W. Va. 600, 102 Am. St. Rep. 953, 46 S. E. 609, does not decide the question of negotiability. It goes no further than to hold that the designation of the payee as attorney is sufficient to put the purchaser on notice that other persons were interested in the fund, and to put him upon inquiry respecting the right of the payee to sell the note. This is in line with the majority of adjudicated cases. The effect of such holding is, no doubt, to restrict, in a measure, the free circulation of such commercial paper, but we do not understand that it is thereby rendered non-negotiable. It does not follow that because a note is made payable to a person as trustee, it is not of the class known as negotiable paper. The rights of the assignee in due course of such a note depend upon the authority of the trustee to sell it and to receive the proceeds. If we have such authority the note is negotiable; otherwise it is not. Because, having no right to sell, he can confer no title on his assignee. We do not think any of the authorities, outside of the court of Maryland, in Third Nat Bank v. Lange, supra, go further than to hold that the use of words which show the fiduciary character of the payee puts the purchaser upon inquiry respecting the payee's right to sell. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 795a; Fox v. Citizens' Bank & T. Co. 35 L.R.A. 678. In a footnote the annotator says: "The little authority there is on this question is almost unanimous in support of the rule adopted in Fox v. Citizens' Bank & T. Co. The exception is the Maryland case of Third Nat. Bank v. Lange, supra, which held that a note given to a person as trustee is not negotiable." Davis v. Garr, 6 N. Y. 124, 55 Am. Dec. 387; Downer v. Read, 17 Minn. 493, Gil. 470; Bush v. Peckard, 3 Harr. (Del.) 385; Westmoreland v. Foster, 60 Ala. 448; Chadsey v. McCreery, 27 Ill. 253; Pierce v. Robie, 39 Me. 205, 63 Am. Dec. 614.

But Hazlett's right to sell the note is not questioned; hence the word "trustee," following his name, is only descriptio per- sona, and does not in any sense affect plaintiff's title, or put it upon inquiry as to equities. The fact that the note was assigned without recourse casts no suspicion upon plaintiff's title. 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 276.

There was no error committed in sustaining the demurrer to defendants' special plea; it avers no matter that is a defense to plaintiff's action. But even if the defense of failure of consideration could have been made, it would have been proper to prove it under the general issue of nonassumpsit. 4 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 355; 4 Minor, Inst. 3d ed. 770; Morgantown Bank v. Foster, 35 W. Va. 357, 13 S. E. 996; Blessing v. Miller, 102 Pa. 45; Dawes v. Peebles' Sons (C. C.) 6 Fed. 856; 2 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 135; Mason v. Eldred, 6 Wall. 231, 18 L. ed. 783; Craig v. Missouri, 4 Pet. 410, 7 L. ed. 903, opinion by Marshall, Ch. J.

Mr. Peterson, president of the Dollar Savings & Trust Company, testified that he advised with Joseph Speidel and Henry M. Russell, members of the executive committee for the bank, in regard to purchasing the note; that he was advised by them that the note was good; that Mr. Russell told him that the note was negotiable in form, and that he (Russell) knew that two other notes which had been given for the purchase money on the land had been paid. It is argued in brief, but upon what evidence we do not know, unless it be upon the evidence of Mr. Peterson as to what Mr. Russell told him, that Mr. Russell and Mr. Speidel were interested in the proceeds of the note, and that the land deal was in fact by the bank itself under cover of the trust. There is no evidence to support such theory. Mr. Peterson was asked the question whether Mr. Hazlett was not acting as trustee in the transaction for Henry M. Russell, Joseph Speidel, and others, and he replied that he did not know; that he made no inquiry of Mr. Hazlett. But if it had been proven that Russell and Speidel were interested in the land deal, that fact could not affect the rights of the bank, even if the advice of Russell had been given in bad faith, as to which there is not the slightest evidence. If a director have knowledge of a matter which affects the bank's interest, but which it is to his interest to conceal, it is not notice to the bank. First Nat. Bank v. Lowther-Kaufman Oil & Coal Co. 66 W. Va. 505, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 511, 68 S. E. 713.

There was paid on the note, on May 7, 1906, $26,000, and the following memorandum was indorsed on it: "Balance due on principal $13,030.90. Indorsement of principal, May 7, 1906, $26,000." It is in 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sisted that this establishes an election by the bank to apply the payment to the principal, rather than to the interest then due, and that it is bound by such election. We do not think so. Mr. Peterson, who is the only witness for either party, testified that the memorandum was in the handwriting of the note clerk, and that, in point of fact, the money had been applied on interest and principal. Plaintiff evidently had a right to so apply it. It was not bound by the memorandum made on the note by its clerk. Moreover, there was only one debt to which the payment could be applied, and consequently there was no occasion for election. Donally v. Wilson, 5 Leigh. 329; Smith v. Lawson, 18 W. Va. 242, 41 Am. Rep. 688, opinion by Judge Green. There was no agreement as to how the payment should be applied, and plaintiff had a right to apply enough of it to discharge the interest then due, and the balance to reduce the principal.

The law and the evidence was with the plaintiff, and there was no error in the court's instruction to the jury to find for it, and no error in refusing to set the verdict aside.

The judgment will be affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY EX REL. JOSEPH SELLIGMAN.

Succession tax — Constitution.

Note. — Constitutionality of succession taxes.

Rule of uniformity and equality.

Those provisions found in almost all, if not all, the Constitutions of the several states, requiring uniformity and equality of taxation, seem to have furnished the weapon of attack upon the validity of inheritance taxation more frequently than any other constitutional provision. It may, however, be laid down as a general rule that the states may tax the privilege of succeeding to the property of the Same — property tax.

5. A collateral inheritance tax is not upon property, so as to be subject to constitutional provisions governing such taxes, by reason of the fact that it is made a certain per centum on the value of the estate, so that the property pays it.

Same — discrimination.

former owner upon his death, discriminate between relatives and between these and strangers, and give exemptions, and are not precluded from this power by the constitutional provision just referred to: A proposition that finds support not only in nearly all of the cases reviewed herein, but also Re Benton, 234 Ill. 366, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 458, 84 N. E. 1026, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 107; Union Trust Co. v. Wayne Probate Judge, 125 Mich. 487, 84 N. W. 1101; Re Touhy, 35 Mont. 431, 90 Pac. 170; Re McPherson, 104 N. Y. 306, 58 Am. Rep. 507, 10 N. E. 685; Re Morris, 138 N. C. 259, 50 S. E. 682; Dixon v. Ricketts, 26 Utah, 215, 72 Pac. 947; State v. Clark, 30 Wash. 439, 71 Pac. 20.

One phase of the question of the constitutionality of inheritance taxation,—that of the validity of the classification of inheritances or gifts for the purpose of such a tax, on the basis of amount, is discussed in the note to State ex rel. Foot v. Bazille, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 732. From the authorities there reviewed, it may be laid down as a general proposition that an inheritance tax law providing for an increased rate of taxation upon inheritances as the amount of the inheritances increased does not violate the constitutional provision as to uniformity and equality. Since the preparation of that note the same conclusion was reached in Nunnemacher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 711, where the law in question, in fixing the amount at which the rate of taxation would increase, provided that the excess only over such amount should be liable for the increased rate.

The South Dakota supreme court went even further than the case last cited, and in Re McKennan, — S. D. —, 130 N. W. 33, reversing their former opinion in the same case, 24 S. D. post, 606, 126 N. W. 611, declared that the imposition of increased rates of taxation upon the whole amount taken, whenever a portion of a decedent's estate passing to a successor exceeded a certain amount, and not merely upon the excess over the amount fixed, was not unconstitutional as being unequal taxation, though it might give recipients of sums slightly above the division line a less net estate than those whose shares were just under the division line.

In State ex rel. Slabaugh v. Vinson-haler, 74 Neb. 675, 105 N. W. 472, it was held that the power of the legislature to impose inheritance taxes was not invalidated by a constitutional provision that revenue be secured "by levying a tax by valuation, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property and franchises."

And in Tyson v. State, 28 Md. 577, an inheritance tax law was held not to be in conflict with that clause of the Declaration of Rights that all persons ought to contribute their proportion to the public taxes, according to his actual worth in real or personal property.

But in Re Pell, 171 N. Y. 48, 57 L.R.A. 540, 89 Am. St. Rep. 791, 63 N. E. 789, reversing 60 App. Div. 286, 70 N. Y. Supp. 196, it was held that an inheritance tax law imposing a tax on remainders or reversions which vested prior to a certain date, but which should not come into possession until after the passage of the act, thus leaving the estate which vested after that date untaxed, and discriminating among the owners thereof by imposing different rates on some than on others, was invalid, as not bearing equally upon the entire class to which the property belonged.

—discrimination between relatives.

Nor will these constitutional provisions as to uniformity and equality invalidate reasonable discriminations among relatives, APPPEAL by the executor of Armilda U. Booth, deceased, from a judgment of the Chancery Branch of the Second Division of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County affirming a judgment of the County Court which assessed a collateral inheritance tax upon property passing under her will. Affirmed.

or between relatives and strangers.

In Bilings v. People, 189 Ill. 472, 59 L.R.A. 807, 59 N. E. 798, affirmed in 188 U. S. 97, 47 L. ed. 400, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 272, it was held that an inheritance tax law discriminating between life tenants with remainder to lineal descendants, and life tenants with remainder to collateral heirs or strangers, by making the first liable to the tax and exempting the second, was not unconstitutional for lack of uniformity.

And in State ex rel. Fath v. Henderson, 160 Mo. 190, 60 S. W. 1093, it was held that an inheritance tax law laying a tax upon collateral successions only, and exempting transfers to lineals, both ascending and descending, and to husband, wife, and adopted children, did not make an unlawful or arbitrary classification, and hence did not violate the constitutional rule of uniformity, prescribing the same taxes upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, such tax being in fact uniform upon the entire class upon which it was levied, which was all that the Constitution required.

So, in Re Wilmerding, 117 Cal. 281, 49 Pac. 181, it was held that a statute imposing a tax upon inheritances of the children of a deceased brother or sister, while the inheritances of the surviving brothers and sisters were exempt from the tax, did not contravene the state Constitution because applicable to only a special class of persons arbitrarily selected from others standing in the same relation to the subject of the law, though another statute provided that, in cases of intestacy, the estate of the decedent should in certain instances "go in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of the decedent, and to the children of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation."

And the constitutionality of discrimination in inheritance tax legislation between relatives and strangers, and between different classes of relatives, was upheld in the following cases: Magoun v. Illinois Trust Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

On the other hand, in Curry v. Spencer, 61 N. H. 624, 60 Am. Rep. 337, a statute imposing a tax upon all successions except those to husband or wife, children or grandchildren of the decedent, was held to be invalid, as violative of those provisions of the state Constitution limiting the power of the legislature to impose taxes to "proportional and reasonable assessments, rates and taxes upon all the inhabitants and residents within the said state, and upon the estates within the same," and declaring that every inhabitant was bound to contribute only his share of taxation. The court added that if the tax was to be regarded as a tax on property, it was open to the objection of unequal and double taxation, and that if it was to be regarded as a tax of a civil right or privilege, it was discriminating and disproportional. It was also declared, in reply to the argument that the law should be sustained because its object was to defray the cost of probate courts, that, if the legislature deemed it expedient to defray the expense of probate courts by a tax upon the recipients of estates therein adjudicated, such tax should be proportional, and constitute only the just share of those upon whom it was imposed, and that it could not lawfully make discriminations, and cast the burden upon one class of beneficiaries, and exempt all other classes from its operation, and that it could not, therefore, for purposes of taxation, exempt legacies and successions to husband, wife, and descendants, and include only those to collaterals and strangers.

But the Constitution of New Hampshire was changed in 1903, and property passing by will or inheritance was specifically designated as a source of revenue. Accordingly, in Thompson v. Kidder, 74 N. H. 89, 65 Atl. 392, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 948, a statute taxing all successions except those to certain relatives of the deceased, and those for charitable, educational, religious, and public purposes, was held not to be violative of other provisions of the Constitution requiring equality and uniformity in taxation.

Nor do these provisions as to uniformity and equality prevent exemptions.

In Nettleton's Appeal, 76 Conn. 235, 56 Atl. 565, it was held that an inheritance tax law was not unconstitutional because, in imposing death duties, it made an arbitrary difference between estates of $10,000 and those of a greater amount, so that a legatee of an estate of $10,000 paid no tax, but a legatee of an estate of more than $10,000 was taxed. The court said that such result was "a mere incident to the operation of a law enacted solely for the purposes of taxation, and clearly within the legislative power of taxation, and is not an attempt, either in form, substance, or purpose, to exercise that power of favoring some persons and punishing others, at the mere will of the legislature, which the Con- 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) stitution excludes from the grant of legislative power."

And in the following cases the exemptions from inheritance taxes of estates not exceeding a certain sum in value, but not exempting that sum in large estates, were held not to violate the constitutional requirement of equality and uniformity: Minot v. Winthrop, 162 Mass. 113, 26 L.R.A. 259, 38 N. E. 512; Gelsthorpe v. Furnell, 20 Mont. 299, 38 L.R.A. 170, 51 Pac. 267; State v. Alston, 94 Tenn. 674, 28 L.R.A. 178, 30 S. W. 750; Re Hickok, 78 Vt. 259, 62 Atl. 724, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 578.

So, in Re Fox, 154 Mich. 5, 117 N. W. 558, a statute exempting from an inheritance tax those lineal heirs inheriting personal property of less than $2,000 in value, and taxing the entire inheritance to such heirs, without an exemption, where its value exceeded that sum, was held not to violate the Federal and state constitutional requirement of uniformity.

And in Re Morris, 138 N. C. 259, 50 S. E. 683, the exemption from liability for inheritance taxes of persons receiving less than a certain sum was declared not to be unconstitutional.

And in State ex rel. Fath v. Henderson, 160 Mo. 190, 60 S. W. 1093, an inheritance tax law was held not to be unconstitutional because it exempted property bequeathed or devised to educational, charitable, and religious institutions.

So, in Re Speed, 216 Ill. 23, 108 Am. St. Rep. 189, 74 N. E. 809, an inheritance tax law exempting from the tax property devised to the use of religious, educational, or charitable corporations was held not to be violative of the constitutional rule of uniformity of taxation, because it did not extend the exemption to foreign corporations.

On the other hand, in State ex rel. Frye v. Bazille, 87 Minn. 500, 94 Am. St. Rep. 718, 92 N. W. 415, it was held that the constitutional provision requiring uniformity and equality of taxation applied to inheritances exactly as it did to other property, and that the statute which taxed transfers of property to collaterals to the full value when such transfers exceeded $5,000, while it taxed transfers to lineals only upon the excess over and above such amount, was unconstitutional and void.

And in Drew v. Tift, 79 Minn. 175, 47 L.R.A. 525, 79 Am. St. Rep. 446, 81 N. W. 839, an inheritance tax statute allowing a larger exemption to lineals than to collaterals was held to be invalid where the Constitution of the state authorized only one uniform exemption to all persons and corporations.

And in the following Pennsylvania cases, it was held that the exemption of a specified amount in all estates, from liability for inheritance taxation, by a statute imposing a tax upon all personal property passing by will or by the intestate laws, after deducting debts and costs of administration, violated that constitutional provision which required all taxes to be uniform upon the same class of subjects: Cope's Estate, 191 Pa. 1, 45 L.R.A. 316, 71 Am. St. Rep. 749, 43 Atl. 79; Hagy's Estate, 191 Pa. 26, 43 Atl. 1101; Graff's Estate, 191 Pa. 28, 43 Atl. 1101; Portuondo's Estate, 191 Pa. 28, 43 Atl. 1102, affirming 20 Pa. Co. Ct. 209; Lacy's Estate, 191 Pa. 56, 43 Atl. 1102; D'Almbert's Estate, 191 Pa. 66, 43 Atl. 1101; Smith's Appeal, 191 Pa. 67, 43 Atl. 1103; Bell's Estate, 191 Pa. 68, 43 Atl. 1100; Blight's Estate, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 459.

And in Black v. State, 113 Wis. 205, 90 Am. St. Rep. 853, 84 N. W. 522, it was held that a statute authorizing an inheritance tax where the whole estate was of a specified amount or more, but not authorizing such tax where the estate was less than that amount in value, the beneficiaries being in the same class, and the tax being levied without regard to the amount received by the individual beneficiary, was unconstitutional as being an arbitrary and unlawful discrimination between beneficiaries of the same class.

525, 79 Am. St. Rep. 446, 81 N. W. 839, an inheritance tax statute was held invalid because it laid a tax upon the entire devise, bequest, or distributive share, if of the specified value, but not upon the excess above a fixed specified exempted sum, as required by the Constitution of that state.

In State ex rel. Russell v. Harvey, 90 Minn. 180, 95 N. W. 764, a statute taxing inheritances was declared to be unconstitutional because it made the rate of taxation in the case of collateral heirs and strangers double the amount limited in the Constitution.

In Drew v. Tift, supra, and State ex rel. Frye v. Bazille, 87 Minn. 500, 94 Am. St. Rep. 718, 92 N. W. 415, an inheritance tax statute making personal inheritances alone liable for the tax was held to be invalid where the Constitution of the state provided for a tax upon all inheritances of every kind and description.

On the other hand, in Re Morris, 138 N. C. 259, 50 S. E. 682, an inheritance tax law was held not to be unconstitutional merely because it imposed such tax on personal property only.

Due process of law.

In Cahen v. Brewster, 203 U. S. 543, 51 L. ed. 310, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 215, affirming 115 La. 377, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1181, 39 So. 37, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 871, it was held that a Louisiana inheritance tax law imposing a tax on all successions not finally closed and administered upon, and on all successions thereafter opened, did not deprive universal legatees under the will of a person who had died before the enactment of the law, of their property without due process of law, though under the Louisiana Civil Code the ownership of the property passed to such legatees upon the death of the testator.

Mr. Isaac Morrison also for appellee.

Settle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mrs. Armilda U. Booth, a childless widow and resident of Jefferson County Kentucky, died in December, 1906, leaving a will by which legacies of various amounts were bequeathed to her collateral kindred and to strangers. The executor appointed by the will, on December 24, 1906, duly qualified as such, and has since had charge of the estate. Shortly thereafter, and before the payment of any of the legacies bequeathed by the will, the commonwealth of Kentucky, on relation of the county held that a statute which vested the interest of the state in a succession tax at the time of the decedent's death did not take property without due process of law, where it provided for an appraisal after notice to all persons known to be interested, and afforded them an opportunity to be heard before the tax could be collected.

And in Billings v. People, 189 Ill. 472, 59 L.R.A. 807, 59 N. E. 798, affirmed in 188 U. S. 97, 47 L. ed. 400, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 272, it was held that an inheritance tax law which discriminated between life tenants with remainder to lineal descendants, and life tenants with remainder to collateral heirs or strangers, by imposing the tax on the first, and excluding the second from its operation, was not unconstitutional as depriving the class affected of their property without due process of law.

And in Re Speed, 216 Ill. 23, 108 Am. St. Rep. 189, 74 N. E. 809, affirmed in 203 U. S. 553, 51 L. ed. 314, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 171, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 157, an inheritance tax law exempting from its provisions property devised to religious, educational, or charitable corporations, and not extending such exemption to nonresident corporations, was held not to violate the due process provision of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

And in State v. Hamlin, 86 Me. 495, 25 L.R.A. 632, 41 Am. St. Rep. 569, 30 Atl. 76, it was held that an inheritance tax law which provided for an appraisal of the estate subject to the tax upon application to the probate court by anyone interested in the estate, and gave that court jurisdiction to hear and determine all questions that might arise, subject to appeal as in other cases, satisfied the requirement of due process of law.

And in Union Trust Co. v. Wayne Probate Judge, 125 Mich. 487, 84 N. W. 1101, a succession tax law was held not to be unconstitutional as taking property without due process of law, because it did not provide for personal notice and opportunity to resist the assessment, upon the ground that it was not taking the property of the legatee, but was only imposing a condition upon the acquisition of property.

In Gelsthorpe v. Furnell, 20 Mont. 299, 39 L.R.A. 170, 51 Pac. 267, it was held that a succession tax did not take property without due process of law, when it was imposed upon all property which passed by will or intestate laws except when the estate was less than a specified sum.

And in Gelsthorpe v. Furnell, supra, an inheritance tax statute was held not to take property without due process of law, where it made provision for notice to the persons interested, and an opportunity was given to be heard in relation to the value of the property and the amount of the tax.

And in Re Vanderbilt, 50 App. Div. 246, 63 N. Y. Supp. 1079, affirmed without opinion in 163 N. Y. 597, 57 N. E. 1127, and in Re Potter, 51 App. Div. 212, 64 N. Y. Supp. 1013, an inheritance tax law taxing the exercise of the power of appointment derived from the disposition of property made before the passage of the act, as though the property belonged absolutely to the donee of the power, was held not to take property without due process of law.

In Hostetter v. State, 26 Ohio C. C. 702, reversed on other grounds in 72 Ohio St. 448, 74 N. E. 650, an inheritance tax statute was held not to take property without due process of law, though it gave the probate court power to order an appraisal of the property of a deceased for the purpose of fixing the tax to which the same was liable, without giving notice to the executors or next of kin, where other sections thereof provided for a review of all matters before such court and for an appeal, and where, by general law, certain courts had jurisdiction to enjoin the illegal levy of tax assessments, and to entertain actions to recover them back when collected.

On the other hand, in Ferry v. Campbell, 110 Iowa, 290, 50 L.R.A. 92, 81 N. W. 604, a collateral inheritance tax law which failed to provide for any notice to the per-attorney of Jefferson county, filed in the Jefferson county court a statement against the executor of the will of Mrs. Booth, claiming for the commonwealth an inheritance tax of 5 per cent upon the face value of each legacy in excess of $500 bequeathed by her will; the demand for its payment being based upon the provisions of article 19 of the revenue act of 1906 (Acts 1906, chap. 22, p. 240). The executor filed a demurrer to the statement, mainly upon the ground that the act was unconstitutional; but in argument upon the demurrer certain questions of construction were also raised. The county court overruled the demurrer, thereby upholding the constitutionality of the act, but construed it to impose a tax of 5 per cent upon the net value of each legacy passing to each legatee over the sum of $500.

An appeal was taken to the circuit court by both the executor and the commonwealth, and that court, concurring in the construction given the statute by the county court, entered judgment imposing the tax as that court had done; and from the latter judgment the executor has appealed, thereby bringing the case to this court for final adjudication. The questions upon which the decision of this court is asked are: First, does the act in question violate any provision of the state Constitution? Secondly, if the act is not unconstitutional, does the exemption in the 1st section refer to the entire estate of the decedent, or to each legacy? Thirdly, is the tax upon the sons interested was held to be unconstitutional as taking property without due process of law.

Equal protection of the laws.

In Billings v. Illinois, 188 U. S. 97, 47 L. ed. 400, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 272, affirming 189 Ill. 472, 59 L.R.A. 807, 59 N. E. 798, an Illinois statute taxing certain life estates when the remainder is to lineal descendants of the decedent, but not when the remainder is to collateral heirs or strangers to the blood, was held not to be unconstitutional, as violating the equal protection of the laws clause of the 14th Amendment.

In Campbell v. California, 200 U. S. 87, 50 L. ed. 382, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 182, affirming 143 Cal. 627, 77 Pac. 674, a California inheritance tax statute was held not to deny the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to the brothers and sisters of a decedent, though it subjected them to the burden of an inheritance tax, and did not impose any taxation on such strangers to the blood of the decedent as the wife or widow of a son or the husband of a daughter of the decedent.

In Cahen v. Brewster, 203 U. S. 543, 51 L. ed. 310, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 215, affirming 115 La. 377, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1181, 39 So. 37, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 871, it was held that a Louisiana statute imposing a tax on all successions not finally closed and administered upon, and all successions thereafter opened, thus exempting successions which had been closed, did not make an arbitrary classification which amounted to denial of the equal protection of the laws.

In Re Speed, 216 Ill. 23, 108 Am. St. Rep. 189, 74 N. E. 800, affirmed in 203 U. S. 553, 51 L. ed. 314, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 171, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 157, an inheritance tax law exempting from the tax property devised to religious, educational, or charitable corporations, and not extending such exemption to nonresident corporations, was held not to violate that provision of the natural constitution forbidding a state to deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, since a foreign corporation was not a person within the jurisdiction of the state, within the meaning of that provision.

In Beers v. Glynn, 211 U. S. 477, 53 L. ed. 290, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 186, affirming 186 N. Y. 549, 79 N. E. 1110, it was held that a New York statute imposing a tax upon certain bequests of personalty by a nonresident decedent owning both real and personal property within the state was not unconstitutional as denying equal protection of the laws, though there was no provision for such tax where the only property belonging to the decedent situated within the state was personalty.

In Humphreys v. State, 70 Ohio St. 67, 65 L.R.A. 776, 101 Am. St. Rep. 888, 70 N. E. 957, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 233, it was held that an inheritance tax exempting charitable institutions from the operation of its provisions, but not exempting foreign corporations of such nature, even though some of their charitable work was carried on within the state, was not repugnant to the provision of the United States Constitution, 14th Amendment, against the denial of the equal protection of the laws, or to a similar provision in the Ohio Bill of Rights.

In Gelsthorpe v. Furnell, 20 Mont. 299, 39 L.R.A. 170, 51 Pac. 267, the court declared that it was unable to see how an inheritance tax statute which it was called upon to consider denied to persons within the state the equal protection of the laws.

Impairing obligation of contract.

In Orr v. Gilman, 183 U. S. 278, 46 L. ed. 196, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 213, it was held that a succession tax, not being a direct tax upon property, but a charge upon a privilege exercised or enjoyed under the laws of the state, did not, when imposed in cases where the property passing consisted of securities exempt from taxation by statute, impair the obligation of a contract, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States.

In Chanler v. Kelsey, 205 U. S. 466, 51

net amount actually received by each legatee, or upon the face of his legacy?

The 1st section of the act in question imposes the tax and specifies its objects. The remaining sections indicate the means by which the provisions of the 1st section are to be carried into effect. The 1st section reads as follows: "All property which shall pass, by will or by the intestate laws of this state, from any person who may die seized or possessed of the same while a resident of this state, or, if such decedent was not a resident of this state at the time of death, be within this state, or any interest therein, or income therefrom, which shall be transferred by deed, grant, sale, or gift made in contemplation of the death of the grantor or bargainor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after such death, to any person or persons, or to any body politic or corporate, in trust or otherwise, or by reason whereof any person or body politic or corporate shall become beneficially entitled, in possession or expectancy, to any property, or to the income thereof, other than to or for the use of his or her father, mother, husband, wife, lawful issue, the wife or widow of a son, or the husband of a daughter, or any child or children adopted as such in conformity with the laws of the commonwealth of Kentucky, and any lineal descendant of such decedent born in lawful wedlock, shall be, and is, subject to a tax of $5 on every $100 of the fair cash value of such property, and at a proportionate

L. ed. 882, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 550, affirming 183 N. Y. 543, 76 N. E. 1093, it was held that a New York statute rendering liable to an inheritance tax the exercise by will of the power of appointment, conferred by a deed executed prior to the passage of such statute, did not impair the obligation of a contract.

In Re Vanderbilt, 50 App. Div. 246, 63 N. Y. Supp. 1079, affirmed without opinion in 163 N. Y. 597, 57 N. E. 1127, and in Re Potter, 51 App. Div. 212, 64 N. Y. Supp. 1013, it was held that an inheritance tax law did not constitute a contract between the state and a citizen that, if he should die while the law was in full operation and unchanged, his property might be disposed of by him without the imposition of any further or other tax upon any rights or interests acquired under his will, and that therefore a statute taxing the exercise of the power of appointment under the will of one who died before its passage, as if the property belonged absolutely to the donee of the power of appointment, was not invalid as impairing the obligation of a contract.

Privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states.

In Re Johnson, 139 Cal. 532, 96 Am. St. Rep. 161, 73 Pac. 424, an exemption of nieces and nephews of the deceased from a collateral inheritance tax, when residents of the state, was held to be constitutional and valid, overruling Re Mahoney, 133 Cal. 180, 85 Am. St. Rep. 155, 65 Pac. 389, in which it was held that such exemption was in conflict with § 2, art. 6, of the United States Constitution, providing that citizens of each state should be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several states. In the later case, however, it was held that such provision of the United States Constitution would extend such exemption of nephews and nieces to all citizens in sister states, leaving as liable for the burden of the tax the property of all other nephews and nieces, aliens, and citizens of the United States not citizens of any particular state.

In Re Speed, 216 Ill. 23, 108 Am. St. Rep. 189, 74 N. E. 809, affirmed in 203 U. S. 553, 51 L. ed. 314, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 171, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 157, and in Humphreys v. State, 70 Ohio St. 67, 65 L.R.A. 776, 101 Am. St. Rep. 888, 70 N. E. 957, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 233, an inheritance tax law exempting from the tax property devised to religious, educational, or charitable corporations, and not extending such exemption to nonresident corporations, was held not to be in conflict with that provision of the Constitution of the United States declaring that the citizens of each state should be entitled to all privileges and immunities of the several states, since a corporation is not a citizen, within the meaning of that provision.

In State v. Hamlin, 86 Me. 495, 25 L.R.A. 632, 41 Am. St. Rep. 569, 30 Atl. 76, it was held that an inheritance tax law which applied equally to citizens of the state of its origin and of other states was not in conflict with that provision of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, that no state should make or enforce any law abridging the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the United States.

14th Amendment in general.

In Orr v. Gilman, 183 U. S. 278, 46 L. ed. 196, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 213, it was held that a New York statute taxing the exercise of the power of appointment derived from the disposition of property made either before or after the passage of the act, as though the property belonged absolutely to the donee of the power, and had been bequeathed or devised to him by will, infringed none of the provisions of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution, although construed by the highest court in the state to apply to the exercise by a son among his children of a power of appointment given him in the will of his father, who, under the law as it stood at the time of his death, had a legal right to transfer the property to such appointee without any limitation imposed upon the exercise of that right.

In Wallace v. Myers, 4 L.R.A. 171, 38 Fed. 184, a tax on gifts, legacies, and col-rate for any less amount, to be paid to the sheriff or collector of the proper county, as hereinafter defined, for the general use of the commonwealth; and all administrators, executors, and trustees shall be liable for any and all taxes until the same shall have been paid as hereinafter directed: Provided, that the first $500 of every estate shall not be subject to such duty or tax." Counsel for appellant insist that the act is violative of the state Constitution, because of the alleged absence from that instrument of a provision authorizing the imposition of an inheritance tax; that the act is in conflict with that provision of the Constitution which requires that all taxes shall be uniform; and finally, that its operation will result in discrimination, as well as inequality, which, it is claimed, makes it obnoxious to the provisions of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

The present Constitution of the state declares that the legislature may by general laws provide (1) for the levy and collection, for state, county, and municipal purposes, of an annual ad valorem tax on all property (§§ 171, 172); (2) a tax on incomes, licenses or franchises (§ 174); (3) license fees on franchises, stock used for breeding purposes, the various trades, occupations, and professions; and (4) "a special or excise tax." (§ 181). It may also be remarked that § 171 of the Constitution declares that "taxes shall be levied and collected for public purposes lateral inheritances operating alike on all property and persons similarly situated, made by a judicial officer after notice and opportunity to be heard, was held not to conflict with the provisions of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Conflict of state and Federal powers.

In Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747, it was held that though the transmission of property by death was exclusively subject to the regulating authorities of the several states, it was not beyond the power of Congress to levy a tax on inheritances or legacies, nor was it an interference by the national government with a matter which fell alone within the reach of state legislation.

In Plummer v. Coler, 178 U. S. 115, 44 L. ed. 998, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 829, affirming 30 Misc. 19, 62 N. Y. Supp. 1024, it was held that the New York statute imposing a tax upon the transfer of a decedent's property was not rendered unconstitutional because, when applied to property consisting of United States bonds, its remote effect was to impair the borrowing power of the national government.

In Snyder v. Bettman, 190 U. S. 249, 47 L. ed. 1035, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 803, it was held that Congress had the power to tax the transmission of property by legacy to states or their municipalities, and that the exercise of that power did not conflict with the proposition that neither the Federal nor the state government could tax the property or the agencies of the other, since the taxes imposed were not upon property, but upon the right to succeed to property; and that therefore the act of Congress of June 3, 1898, imposing a tax upon a bequest to a municipality for public purposes, was not unconstitutional as imposing a tax upon an agency of the state.

Local or special law.

In Re Magnes, 32 Colo. 527, 79 Pac. 853, an inheritance tax law was held not to be a local or special law within the meaning 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of that provision of the Constitution forbidding the legislature to pass local or special laws changing the law of descent.

In Montague v. State, 54 Md. 487, an act by which an exemption from a succession tax was extended to property passing from a deceased wife to a surviving husband, in all cases where the tax had been theretofore claimed of, but not actually paid by, the husband of any decedent, was held not to be a local or special law, within the meaning of the constitutional provision forbidding the legislature from passing such laws releasing persons from their debts or obligations to the state.

On the other hand, in Cope's Estate, 191 Pa. 1, 45 L.R.A. 316, 71 Am. St. Rep. 749, 43 Atl. 79, it was held that an act amending or supplementing the laws regulating succession to estates of decedents, which imposed a burden on so much of any estate only as was in excess of $5,000, and left the law unchanged as to the residue, violated that provision of the Constitution which forbade the passing of any local or special law changing the law of descent or succession.

Attention may here be called to State ex rel. Sanderson v. Mann, 76 Wis. 469, 45 N. W. 526, 46 N. W. 51, though the court declared that the tax sought to be imposed was not a succession tax, in which a statute providing that, in counties having more than a stated number of inhabitants, a certain percentage of all estates of decedents should be paid to the county treasurer for the use of the county, was declared to violate a constitutional provision prohibiting the enactment of any special laws for the assessment or collection of taxes, there being as a matter of fact but one county to which the act was applicable.

Jurisdiction of probate courts.

In Union Trust Co. v. Wayne Probate Judge, 125 Mich. 487, 84 N. W. 1101, an inheritance tax law was held not to be unconstitutional as conferring duties not judicial upon the judge of probate.

In State ex rel. Gage v. Probate Ct. 112

only. They shall be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax; and all taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws."

But, after all, the power of the legislature to tax is an inherent, rather than a conferred, power, although the legislative department of our state government, like the executive department and judicial department, is a creature of the Constitution. Thus, in § 29 of that instrument, it is said: "The legislative power shall be vested in a house of representatives and a senate, which together shall be styled the general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky." The words "the legislative power," as here employed, are a comprehensive phrase, meaning all powers that appertain to or are usually exercised by a legislative body. Perhaps it would more accurately express our meaning to say that the power to tax is incident to, or arises from, the "legislative power," with which § 29 of the Constitution clothed the general assembly in creating that department of the state government. It cannot, therefore, be successfully maintained that the authority of the legislature to impose taxes is wholly derived from §§ 169 to 182, inclusive, of the Constitution, which relate to revenue and taxation. On the contrary, we think the provisions of those sections are, in the main, limitations upon the power of the legislature, making mandatory

Minn. 279, 128 N. W. 18, the court overruled the contention that the inheritance tax act of that state was unconstitutional because the proceedings prescribed by it in the probate court amounted to the levying, assessment, and collection of taxes, and the Constitution limited the probate court to jurisdiction over estates of deceased persons and persons under guardianship. It was declared that there could be no doubt that such jurisdiction included other matters necessarily connected with the administration of estates, and necessarily included the ascertainment of the inheritance taxes to which decedents' estates were liable.

In Nunnemacher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 711, it was held that an inheritance tax law was not rendered unconstitutional by submitting to the court such matters as the fixing of the value of the property and the amount of the tax.

Miscellaneous cases.

In Mager v. Grima, 8 How. 493, 12 L. ed. 1170, affirming 12 Rob. (La.) 584, a Louisiana statute imposing a tax on legacies when the legatee was neither a citizen of the United States nor domiciled in that state was held not to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

In State ex rel. Fath v. Henderson, 160 Mo. 190, 60 S. W. 1093, a statute was held not to be unconstitutional merely because it appropriated the money raised thereby in an inverse order to that laid down in the Constitution.

In Re Tuohy, 35 Mont. 431, 90 Pac. 170, it was held that an inheritance tax law providing that the tax should be levied and collected upon the increase of all property arising between the date of death and the date of distribution was not, when applied to mines and mining claims, violative of the constitutional provision requiring all such property to be taxed at the price originally paid the United States therefor, since the tax was not upon the property itself, but upon the privilege of taking the same.

In State ex rel. Slabaugh v. Vinsonhale, 74 Neb. 675, 105 N. W. 472, it was held that the power of the legislature to provide for taxation upon inheritance was not denied by a constitutional provision enumerating the subjects of taxation, but omitting inheritance taxes.

In Nunnemacher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 711, it was held that inheritance taxation was not prohibited by that provision of the Constitution that the legislature should provide for an annual tax sufficient to defray the expenses of the state for each year.

In Chambe v. Durfee, 100 Mich. 112, 58 N. W. 661, an inheritance tax law was held to be unconstitutional because it attempted to dispose of the proceeds of the tax in a different way than that prescribed by the Constitution.

Attention may be called to Fatjo v. Pfister, 117 Cal. 83, 48 Pac. 1012, in which a statute requiring a certain fee to be paid upon the filing of a petition for letters testamentary or of administration or guardianship, and requiring an additional sum for each additional $1,000 of appraised valuation in excess of $3,000, was held to violate that provision of the Constitution requiring all property in the state to be taxed in proportion to its value, since it imposed an extraordinary tax upon the property to which it applied, in addition to the equal and uniform tax to which alone all property in the state was liable, the court declaring that it was not at all analogous to an inheritance tax as was contended, inasmuch as it applied to estates of minors and incompetents as well as to decedents, and, as to the estate of decedents, it applied to an insolvent estate as well as to a solvent one.

And in State ex rel. Davidson v. Gorman, 40 Minn. 232, 2 L.R.A. 701, 41 N. W. 948, a statute prescribing, as a condition precedent to the settlement of estates of deceased persons, the payment of a "probate duty," which the court declared to be a tax "in the general and precise meaning of the word," it being graded in the imposition of certain taxes, and forbidding or regulating the imposition of others.

We are told by Mr. Cooley in his work on Taxation (chapter 1) that, "the power of taxation is an incident of sovereignty, and is possessed by the government without being expressly conferred by the people. It is a legislative power, and when the people, by their Constitutions, create a department of government upon which they confer the power to make laws, the power of taxation is conferred as part of the more general power. . . . Everything to which the legislative power extends may be the subject of taxation, whether it be person or property, or possession, franchise, or privilege, or occupation, or right. Nothing but express constitutional limitation upon legislative authority can exclude anything to which the authority extends from the grasp of the taxing power, if the legislature in its discretion shall at any time select it for revenue purposes; and not only is the power unlimited in its reach as to subjects, but in its very nature it acknowledges no limits, and may be carried even to the extent of exhaustion and destruction, thus becoming in its exercise a power to destroy. If the power be threatened with abuse, security must be found in the responsibility of the legislature that imposes the tax to the constituency which must pay it. The judiciary can afford no redress against oppressive taxation, so long as the legislature, in imposing it, . . . violate no express provision of the Constitution. The necessity for imposing it addresses itself to the legislative discretion, and it is or may be an urgent necessity, which will admit of no property or other conflicting right in the citizen while it remains unsatisfied." Cooley, Taxn. 3d ed. chaps. 1, 2, p. 7.

We fail to find in that part of our Constitution respecting revenue and taxation any declaration that the power of the legislature to impose taxes is expressly limited to such taxes as are therein mentioned. We do, however, find that § 181, in explicit terms, authorizes the imposition of a "special or excise tax;" but the legislature, without this express authority, could have imposed such a tax under the general legislative power before mentioned; there being no provision of the Constitution forbidding it. State ex rel. Schwartz v. Ferris, 53 Ohio St. 314, 30 L.R.A. 218, 41 N. E. 579; State ex rel. Taylor v. Guilbert, 70 Ohio St. 229, 71 N. E. 636, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 25. As the privilege or right to take property by inheritance or devise is not a natural or inherent right of persons, but is a creature of the law, it is subject to regulation by statute; and accordance with the valuation of the estate to be probated, was held void because violative of those provisions of the state Constitution requiring equality and uniformity of taxation, and the dispensation of justice "freely and without purchase, completely and without denial."

In the following cases, inheritance tax statutes were, with little or no discussion, declared to be constitutional: Re Stanford, 126 Cal. 112, 45 L.R.A. 788, 68 Pac. 462; Re Damon, 10 Cal. App. 542, 102 Pac. 684; Walker v. People, 192 Ill. 106, 61 N. E. 489; Stauffer's Succession, 119 La. 66, 43 So. 928; State v. Dalrymple, 70 Md. 294, 3 L.R.A. 372, 17 Atl. 82; Crocker v. Shaw, 174 Mass. 266, 54 N. E. 549; Re McPherson, 104 N. Y. 306, 58 Am. Rep. 502, 10 N. E. 685; Re Embury, 19 App. Div. 214, 45 N. Y. Supp. 881; Dixon v. Ricketts, 26 Utah, 215, 72 Pac. 747; Beals v. State, 139 Wis. 544, 121 N. W. 347; State v. Pabst, 139 Wis. 561, 121 N. W. 351.

The following cases, cited in RODMAN v. COM. as approving the conclusions expressed in Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594, and State v. Hamlin, 86 Me. 495, 25 L.R.A. 632, 41 Am. St. Rep. 569, 30 Atl. 76, did not refer to the question here discussed:

United States v. Fox, 94 U. S. 315, 24 L. ed. 192, in which the court "deemed the sole question" for its consideration to be 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the validity of a devise to the United States of real estate situated in the state of New York, no reference whatever being made to inheritance taxes.

Clapp v. Mason, 94 U. S. 589, 24 L. ed. 212, in which the specific holding was that a succession tax could not be imposed on property which did not vest in possession of the legatee until after the date when the repeal of the act imposing the tax went into effect.

Schoolfield v. Lynchburg, 78 Va. 366, in which the question was whether or not the authority to tax inheritances had been delegated to the defendant city, and was answered in the negative.

Power to impose tax retrospectively.

Another phase of the constitutionality of inheritance taxation,—that of the power to impose a succession tax retrospectively,—is treated in the note to Levy's Succession, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1180, where the cases decided up to that time will be found reviewed. Since the preparation of that note, the power of the legislature to impose a succession tax retrospectively was denied in Re Chapman, 133 App. Div. 337, 117 N. Y. Supp. 670, citing Re Pell, 171 N. Y. 48, 57 L.R.A. 540, 89 Am. St. Rep. 791, 63 N. E. 789, which will be found reviewed in the note referred to.

As to nature of inheritance taxes, see note to Re McKennan, post, 606.

the imposition of a tax as incident to the right is authorized under our governmental system, when not expressly forbidden by the state Constitution. Many authorities might be cited in support of this proposition, and our attention has been called to but one case that questions its correctness, viz., Nunnenmacher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.)121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 711. Yet in that case the tax upon an inheritance was held to be valid upon the sole ground that it could not be considered an unreasonable interference with that right. The right of property, however, is an inherent or inalienable right of the citizen, and "consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of his acquisitions, without control or diminution, save only of the laws of the land." 1 Bl. Com. p. 138. But we venture to say that, among the absolute rights of individuals enumerated by Blackstone, no mention is made of a right to inherit property from another. All estates derived upon the death of another have been created by law, and are for that reason always subject to regulation by statute; indeed, frequent changes by legislative enactment have been and will doubtless yet be made in the law of descent and distribution. It is patent, therefore, that the guaranty in the Bill of Rights, and other provisions of the Constitution, with respect to the right of acquiring and protecting property, does not include the mere privilege, right, or expectancy of inheritance.

While express constitutional authority for the enactment by the legislature of the act under which the tax in question is sought to be collected was unnecessary, if the tax comes within the meaning of the words "special or excise tax" appearing in § 181 of the Constitution, it may then be said that instrument expressly authorized its imposition by the legislature. Although the state of Kentucky has had an existence of more than a century as a commonwealth, no effort, prior to the enactment of the present statute, has ever been made by her legislature to impose an inheritance tax upon her people. Therefore the novelty of the questions raised by the objections made to the statute, and the total absence of judicial light from previous decisions of this court, compel us to look for guidance to those of the courts of other states, and of the Federal courts, in which such laws have been construed and enforced. Perhaps a majority of the states of the Union impose an inheritance tax in one form or another. In some of these states the tax falls upon all persons, whether lineal descendants, collaterals, or strangers. In other states the tax is paid by collaterals alone, or by collaterals and strangers; the latter, of course, taking the estate by devise. In some states the tax rate is uniform; in others, estates of less than a given value are exempt from the tax; in still others, the tax is imposed according to a graded rate, without regard to uniformity. We have been cited to no case in which there was a failure by the court to uphold an inheritance tax like that imposed in this state. The Constitutions of many of the states in which an inheritance tax is imposed are, in respect to questions of taxation, in meaning, if not in terms, closely akin to the Constitution of this state, and even a closer resemblance will be found to exist between the inheritance tax statutes of these states and that of this state; indeed, two or more of them are almost identical with ours, that the inheritance tax shall be paid by the persons or class designated upon all property passing to them by will or otherwise, and in every instance the courts, in construing the statutes, have held that the tax was not a tax upon property, but a "privilege," "special," or "excise tax."

In State v. Hamlin, 86 Me. 495, 25 L.R.A. 632, 41 Am. St. Rep. 569, 30 Atl. 76, a statute practically identical with that of this state was attacked upon the same constitutional grounds here urged; but it was held by the supreme court of that state that it did not violate a provision of the Constitution of that state, which required all taxes assessed upon personal and real estate to be apportioned and assessed equally according to the just value thereof. With respect to the character of the Maine inheritance tax, the court said: "The tax provided for in the statute under consideration is clearly an excise tax. Scholey v. Rew, 23 Wall. 346, 23 L. ed. 101. The whole tenor and scope of the act is one of excise, and not a tax upon property, as that term is used in the Constitution. It is not laid according to any rule of proportion, but is laid upon the interests specified in the act, without any reference to the whole amount required to be raised for public purposes, or to the whole amount of property in the state liable to be assessed for public purposes. It is true that the act contains some language indicating a tax upon property; but it should be construed according to its essential principle, object, and effect. Substance, and not form or phrase, is the important thing. . . . The tax under this statute is, once for all, an excise or duty upon the right or privilege of taking property by will or descent, under the law of the state. It is uniform in its rate as to the entire class of collaterals and strangers, which satisfies the constitutional requirement of uniformity. . . . The Constitution guarantees to the citizen the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property (article 1, § 1), which includes also the right of disposal. But the guaranty ceases to operate at the death of the possessor. There is no provision of our Constitution, or that of the United States, which secures the right to anyone to control or dispose of his property after his death, nor the right to anyone, whether kindred or not, to take it by inheritance. Descent is a creature of statute, and not a natural right. 2 Bl. Com. pp. 10-13; Strode v. Com. 52 Pa. 181."

In Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594, the constitutionality of the Illinois statute, which is worded precisely as the Kentucky statute, was upheld. In that case substantially every objection was made to the statute that is urged in the instant case; but, after an exhaustive consideration of these objections and a critical review of the decisions of various state courts, the Supreme Court announced the following conclusions: First; An inheritance tax is not one on property by devise or descent. It is the creature of the law, and not a natural right or privilege; "and therefore the authority which confers it may impose conditions upon it. From these principles it is deduced that the states may tax the privilege, discriminate between relatives, and between these and strangers, and grant exemptions, and are not precluded from this power by the provisions of the respective state Constitutions requiring uniformity and equality of taxation."

The conclusions expressed in Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank and State v. Hamlin, supra, are approved by the following cases: United States v. Perkins, 163 U. S. 625, 41 L. ed. 287, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073; Strode v. Com. 52 Pa. 181; Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Gratt. 422, 73 Am. Dec. 367; Schoolfield v. Lynchburg, 78 Va. 368; State v. Dalrymple, 70 Md. 298, 3 L.R.A. 372, 17 Atl. 82; Clapp v. Mason, 94 U. S. 589, 24 L. ed. 212; Re Merriam, 141 N. Y. 479, 36 N. E. 505; State v. Alston, 94 Tenn. 674, 28 L.R.A. 178, 30 S. W. 750; Re Wilmerding, 117 Cal. 281, 49 Pac. 181; Minot v. Winthrop, 162 Mass. 113, 26 L.R.A. 250, 38 N. E. 512; Gelsthorpe v. Furnell, 20 Mont. 299, 39 L.R.A. 170, 51 Pac. 267; Scholey v. Rew, 23 Wall. 331, 23 L. ed. 99; Mager v. Grima, 8 How. 490, 12 L. ed. 1168; United States v. Fox, 94 U. S. 315, 24 L. ed. 192; Plummer v. Coler, 178 U. S. 117, 44 L. ed. 999, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 829; Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747; State ex rel. Garth v. Switzler, 143 Mo. 287, 40 L.R.A. 288, 65 Am. St. Rep. 653, 45 S. W. 245; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 337. We think the numerous authorities, supra, answer every substantial objection made to the inheritance tax statute under consideration. For they clearly present the theory on which taxation on the devolution of estates at the death of their owners is based, and thereby uphold the validity of the statute, by demonstrating that the tax thereby imposed is not one on property, but one on the privilege or right of succession thereto, and that it is not obnoxious to any provision of the state or Federal Constitutions requiring uniformity or equality of taxation, or because its enforcement may result in discrimination between relations, or between relations and strangers.

It is, however, insisted for appellant that, as the tax is a certain per centum of the value of the estate, and the property pays it, it is therefore a tax on the property itself. This argument is answered by the opinion in Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Gratt. 422, 73 Am. Dec. 367, as follows: "But this is by no means a necessary logical conclusion. The intention of the legislature was plainly to tax the transmission of property by devise or descent to collateral kindred, and to require that a party thus taking the benefit of a civil right secured to him under the law should pay a certain premium for its enjoyment; and, as it was thought just and reasonable that the amount of the premium should bear a certain proportion to the value of the subject enjoyed, it is fixed at a certain per centum upon the value of the whole estate transmitted." The provisions with respect to equality and uniformity in taxation found in § 171 of the Constitution apply to a direct tax on property. They do not limit the power of the legislature as to the objects of taxation, but are more especially intended to prevent an arbitrary taxation of property according to kind or quality, without regard to value. We are, however, unable to see that the inequality and want of uniformity complained of by appellant exist in the statute under consideration, for every person not of the class exempted by the act from the payment of the tax, who takes from the estate of a decedent by succession or devise, pays a tax for the privilege, and this tax is proportioned to the value of the interest which he acquires. Nor does the exemption, where the estate is of the value of $500 or less, constitute inequality or unjust discrimination. Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 288, 42 L. ed. 1040,

In Minot v. Winthrop, 162 Mass. 113, 26 L.R.A. 264, 38 N. E. 512, it is said in reference to a complaint of inequality urged against an inheritance tax statute: "The tax imposed by the statute we are considering is said to be unequal because it is not imposed upon all estates and upon all heirs, devisees, legatees, and distributees. To make a distinction between collateral kindred, or strangers in blood and kindred in the direct line, in reference to the assessment of such a tax, either by exempting the kindred in the direct line, or by imposing on collaterals and strangers a higher rate of taxation, has the sanction of nearly all states which have levied taxes of this kind. It has a sanction in reason, for the moral claim of collaterals and strangers is less than that of kindred in the direct line, and the privilege is therefore greater. The tax imposed by this statute is uniformly imposed upon all estates and all persons within the description contained in it, and the tax is not plainly and grossly oppressive in amount." In State v. Hamlin, 86 Me. 495, 25 L.R.A. 632, 41 Am. St. Rep. 569, 30 Atl. 76, it is said: "The constitutional requirement of uniformity is satisfied by a tax on the transmission of property by will or descent to strangers and collaterals, when it is uniform in its rate as to the entire class affected, although other classes of persons are exempted from the tax." So, if the rule as to uniformity should be applied to the statute under consideration, we should say that it conforms to the rule; for it only requires the same means and methods to be applied impartially to all the constituents of a class, to the end that the law shall operate equally and uniformly upon all persons in similar circumstances, both in the privilege conferred and the liabilities imposed. In other words, the tax is uniform on what it is laid,—the value of the succession, after deducting the exemption on which no tax is laid. It is upon so much of the legacy received as exceeds $500. No legacy of $500 or less is taxed at all, and each legacy over $500 is taxed equally as to the excess.

It is insisted for appellee that, as the inheritance tax in question is a "special or excise tax," the rule as to uniformity does not apply to it. On the other hand, appellant contends that the tax is not an "excise tax," in the meaning of that term as defined by Phlen on Public Finance and other text writers. While it is true that "excise" has been defined to be an inland duty or impost levied upon articles of manufacture or sale, and also upon licenses to pursue certain trades or to deal in certain commodities, it is nevertheless a term of very general signification, meaning tribute, custom tax, tollage, or assessment, and in recent years the courts have so enlarged its meaning as to declare that an inheritance tax is an excise tax; indeed, it is so denominated in practically every case included in the list previously cited. While not more conclusive than similar statements in many of these cases, the following excerpt from State ex rel. Garth v. Switzler, 143 Mo. 287, 40 L.R.A. 288, 65 Am. St. Rep. 653, 45 S. W. 245, aptly supports the proposition last stated: "As already remarked, no doubt longer exists that it is competent for the legislature to levy a tax upon the succession of estates. It is quite universally held that such a tax is not a tax upon property, in the ordinary sense, but is in the nature of an excise or bonus, exacted by the state upon the privilege or right to inherit or succeed to an estate." But, in view of our conclusion that the act imposing the tax does not violate the provisions of the Constitution with respect to uniformity of taxation, it is not necessary to decide whether or not the rule as to uniformity applies to a special or excise tax such as this. Therefore that question is not decided.

It is further contended by appellant that the effect of the act is to tax property otherwise exempt from taxation; and as an instance in point, it is said that, in a companion case submitted with this, a religious institution of learning receiving a devise is sought to be taxed thereon, although its property is by law exempt from taxation. The answer to this complaint must be a restatement of the proposition that the tax is not imposed upon the property, but on the right of succession. Bonds of the United States are by act of Congress exempt from taxation; but in the cases of Plummer v. Coler, 178 U. S. 115, 44 L. ed. 998, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 829, and Wallace v. Myers (C. C.) 4 L.R.A. 171, 38 Fed. 184, a state inheritance tax upon legacies of such bonds was sustained upon the principle above stated.

We think the county and circuit courts gave correct answers to the questions of construction raised by appellant. Manifestly the provision of the act declaring "that the first $500 of every estate shall not be subject to such duty or tax" refers to the estate passing by will to the collateral relative or stranger, or under the statute of descent and distribution to the collateral relative, and not to the estate of the testator or decedent, or, in other words, that an estate passing by will to the collateral or stranger, or under the statute to the collateral, which is valued at $500 or less, shall not be subject to the tax. The tax is upon the individual, and can be imposed only when the particular interest in the decedent's estate passing to him exceeds $500. The tax is not, therefore, imposed on the estate of the decedent, but upon the beneficiaries' right of succession to his property. Nor does the fact that the executor or administrator is required by the act to pay the tax make it a tax against the estate of the testator or decedent, for it also requires him to deduct it from the estate passing to the legatee or collateral heir. Re Hoffman, 143 N. Y. 327, 38 N. E. 311; Re Howe, 112 N. Y. 103, 2 L.R.A. 825, 19 N. E. 513; Re Cager, 111 N. Y. 343, 18 N. E. 866. In the case at bar the exemption in the first section of the act should be allowed each legacy; and, as held by the court below, and said in State ex rel. Garth v. Switzler, 143 Mo. 287, 40 L.R.A. 288, 65 Am. St. Rep. 669, 45 S. W. 245: Where it is "that the tax is upon the succession, it is computed, not on the aggregate valuation of the whole estate of the decedent considered as the unit for taxation, but on the value of the separate interest into which it is divided."

We do not find that the cases of George Schuster & Co. v. Louisville, 124 Ky. 189, 89 S. W. 689, and Hager v. Walker, 128 Ky. 1, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 195, 129 Am. St. Rep. 238, 107 S. W. 254, militate against the conclusions expressed in this opinion. In the Schuster case the court had under consideration the amendment to the Constitution providing a system of assessment of personal property differing from the ad valorem system provided by § 171, and held, in substance, that it was not the object of the amendment to allow any exemption of personal property from taxation imposed upon all property uniformly by § 171, and, further, that the amendment, in authorizing a different mode of assessment of personal property from that theretofore provided for, did not, either expressly or by implication, permit a disregard of the rule imposed by § 171, requiring uniformity in taxes upon all property. In the case of Hager v. Walker, it was held by the court that a certain section of the revenue act of 1906, imposing a license tax upon agents of real estate, was invalid, because it graded the license according to the class of the city in which the licensee lived, exempting altogether real estate agents residing outside of an incorporated city. The license tax was declared invalid, not because it lacked uniformity, but upon the ground of unreasonable and unconstitutional discrimination between citizens, based upon no valid reason, and 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

because the tax was not imposed by "general law," as required by the Constitution. The court, however, expressly held that the provision in § 171 of the Constitution, requiring that the tax rate upon property be uniform, does not directly and specifically apply to license taxes authorized by § 181 of the Constitution. The act was obnoxious to the Constitution because, in imposing a license tax upon a particular occupation, it attempted to exempt from its provisions and burdens certain persons engaged in the occupation, for no other reason than that they did not live in incorporated cities. The exemption was manifestly an unreasonable discrimination against the persons taxed, and in violation of § 3 of the Bill of Rights, which declares that "no grant of exclusive, separate, public emoluments or privileges shall be made to any man or set of men, except in consideration of public services."

It follows from what we have said that in our opinion the act imposing the inheritance tax is not unconstitutional or otherwise invalid. Therefore it is not our province to question the policy of the legislature in enacting it, or to refuse to sanction its enforcement.

Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

RE ESTATE OF HELEN G. McKENNAN,
Deceased.

E. A. SHERMAN, Exr., etc., of Helen G. McKennan, Deceased, et al, Appts.,
v.

Inheritance tax — how supported.

1. An inheritance or succession tax is a tax upon the exercise of the right to transmit property, and is based upon the right of Note. — Nature of inheritance tax.

The authorities are unanimous upon the proposition that an inheritance tax is neither a property nor a personal tax, and in all the cases herein cited it is so declared; and though, as will hereafter appear, there is some little conflict as to what the tax is really levied upon, the overwhelming weight of authority supports the rule that such tax is a bonus in the nature of an excise or duty exacted by the state for the privilege granted by its laws of inheriting or succeeding to property on the death of the owner. The distinction sought to be made by Judge Whiting in the opinion delivered by him upon the first hearing in RE McKENNAN, between the right to in-taxation, and not upon the right to regulate the succession of property.

Tax — designated object — application to inheritance tax.

2. A constitutional provision that no tax shall be levied except in pursuance of a law which shall distinctly state the object of the same to which the tax shall be applied has no application to an inheritance or succession tax.

Same — application of exemptions.

3. A constitutional exemption from taxation of property of the state and that devised to religious or charitable purposes does not apply to an inheritance or succession tax upon the transmission of property to the state or a religious body.

Same — constitution — voidness of exemption — effect.

4. A constitutional provision avoiding all laws exempting certain classes of property from taxation has no application to an exemption from a succession tax of property herit or to succeed or to transmit, and the exercise of such right, has been specifically made in no other case, though there are a few opinions, the language of which, if taken literally, would seem to lend support to such distinction. It may be safely said, however, that in none of the cases did the practical results depend upon any such refined distinction; and hence the cases which employ language indicating that it is the right to succeed or the right to transmit, or that it is the passing of property, that is the subject of the tax, cannot be regarded as authority for or against Judge Whiting's view.

In Scholey v. Rew, 23 Wall. 331, 23 L. ed. 99, and in Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747, it was declared that an inheritance tax was not a direct tax upon property nor a capitation exaction, but was an excise tax or duty imposed by the state upon the right to become the successor of the owner of property upon his death.

In Knowlton v. Moore, supra, the court said: Inheritance taxes "are universally deemed to relate, not to property eo nomine, but to its passage by will or by descent in cases of intestacy, as distinguished from taxes imposed on property, real or personal, as such, because of its ownership and possession. In other words, the public contribution which death duties exact is predicated on the passing of property as the result of death, as distinct from a tax on property disassociated from its transmission or receipt by will or as the result of intestacy." The court sketched the history of these taxes, and then went on to say: "Thus, looking over the whole field, and considering death duties in the order in which we have reviewed them,—that is, in the Roman and ancient law, in that of modern France, Germany, and other continental countries, in England and those of her colonies where such laws have been enacted, in the legislation of the United States and the several states of the Union,—the following appears: Although different modes of assessing such duties prevail, and although they have different accidental names, such as probate duties, stamp duties, taxes on the transaction or the act of passing of an estate or a succession, legacy taxes, estate taxes, or privilege taxes, nevertheless tax laws of this nature in all countries rest in their essence upon the principle that death is the generating source from which the particular taxing power takes its being, and that it is the power to transmit, or the transmission from the dead to the living, on which such taxes are more immediately rested."

transmitted to a widow and certain heirs, since such tax is not one on property.

Same — provision as to uniformity.

5. A succession tax, not being a tax on property, is not affected by a constitutional provision that all taxes shall be uniform upon all real and personal property according to its value in money.

Statute — adoption — effect of construction.

6. The courts of a state adopting a statute from another state are not bound by any constitutional construction placed upon the statute by the courts of the latter state, although it was made before such adoption.

tion of the United States and the several states of the Union,—the following appears: Although different modes of assessing such duties prevail, and although they have different accidental names, such as probate duties, stamp duties, taxes on the transaction or the act of passing of an estate or a succession, legacy taxes, estate taxes, or privilege taxes, nevertheless tax laws of this nature in all countries rest in their essence upon the principle that death is the generating source from which the particular taxing power takes its being, and that it is the power to transmit, or the transmission from the dead to the living, on which such taxes are more immediately rested."

In Nettleton's Appeal, 76 Conn. 235, 56 Atl. 565, and in Gallup's Appeal, 76 Conn. 617, 57 Atl. 699, an inheritance tax was declared to be neither a tax upon property nor upon persons, but to be "an indirect tax or duty of the kind known as death duties; that is, an exaction to be paid to the state upon the occasion of death, and the consequent transfer of ownership in the property of the decedent, through the intervening custody and administration of the law, to the persons designated by the law, through the statutes regulating wills, descents, and distribution."

And in Hopkins's Appeal, 77 Conn. 644, 60 Atl. 657, the two cases last cited were declared to have settled that the Connecticut inheritance tax law did not provide for the taxation of any property left by the decedent, nor of any person interested in his estate, but that it did impose an exaction by the state to be collected from the property left by a deceased person while in its custody, prescribed upon the occasion of his death and the consequent devolution thereof by force of its laws.

In State v. Alston, 94 Tenn. 674, 23 L.R.A. 178, 30 S. W. 750, the court declared that an inheritance tax was not a tax upon property, but upon "the right or privilege tax as relationship becomes remote, or as the property taken increases in amount, does not violate a constitutional provision that all taxation shall be equal and uniform.

Same — increased rates — entire amount taken.

8. The imposition of increased rates of taxation upon the whole amount taken whenever a portion of a decedent's estate taken by a recipient exceeds certain amounts, and not merely upon the excess above the amount fixed, is not unconstitutional as being unequal taxation, although it may result in giving recipients or sums only slightly above the division line a less net estate than would be received by those whose shares were just under the division line.

of acquiring it by succession. "It is a condition upon which the person may take the estate of a deceased relative by inheritance, or testator by his will. It is a retention by the state of a part of a deceased person's property, which the state may take to meet its necessities, and which in certain cases it may take in toto, as in cases of escheated property. It is not a tax upon the right of alienation, but on the privilege of receiving by inheritance or will or otherwise at the death of a former owner."

And in State ex rel. Garth v. Switzler, 143 Mo. 287, 40 L.R.A. 280, 65 Am. St. Rep. 653, 45 S. W. 245, it was declared to be "quite universally held that such tax is not a tax upon property in the ordinary sense, but is in the nature of an excise or bonus exacted by the state upon the privilege or right to inherit or succeed to an estate."

"It is said that the tax is 'not a tax on the person who transmits, or the person who receives, but it is a tax on the right of transmission.' . . . The tax, . . . under the decisions of this and other courts, is a tax upon the transfer, transaction, or right to receive property. . . . The theory of an inheritance tax is that it is not one on property, but upon the right to succession." Bullen's Estate, 143 Wis. 512, 128 N. W. 109.

In Re Inheritance Tax, 23 Colo. 492, 48 Pac. 535, the court declared that, although designated as a tax in the statute, an inheritance tax was not a tax upon property, but was "rather a contribution which the state levies for itself as a condition upon which the title to property shall pass upon the death of its owner."

In People v. Koenig, 37 Colo. 283, 85 Pac. 1129, 11 A. & E. Ana. Cas. 140, the court declared that the tax or duty laid by the statute before it for construction was "upon the receipt of some beneficial interest 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) in property" passing by will or under the intestate laws of the state.

In Strode v. Com. 52 Pa. 181, the court below, whose judgment was affirmed, propounded itself the question whether the inheritance tax sought to be imposed on bonds of the United States was imposed on the bonds or on the owner of them, and declared that the collateral inheritance tax was a bonus exacted from the collateral kindred and others as the condition on which they might be permitted to take the estate left by a deceased relative or testator.

In Clymer v. Com. 52 Pa. 185, the court below, whose judgment was affirmed by the supreme court, declared that an inheritance tax was not to be viewed as a tax assessed upon the property of the deceased, but was a restriction upon the right of acquisition by those who, under the law regulating the transmission of property, were entitled to take as beneficiaries.

And in Mixer's Estate, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. 409, the court declared the collateral inheritance tax not to be a tax in the ordinary sense of the word or the meaning of the Constitution, but to be "rather in the nature of a taking or retention of a part of that which the state, if it saw proper, might claim and keep in toto."

The language used in most of the cases heretofore cited supports the rule enunciated in the beginning of this note, that an inheritance tax falls upon the privilege of succeeding to the property of the deceased person; but it must be admitted that the results thereof did not depend upon any distinction between the privilege of succeeding and that of transmitting, and that in none of the cases, except State v. Alston, was the attention of the court called to any such distinction. There are, however, a few cases in which it was specifically decided that it was upon the privilege of succeeding that an inheritance tax was levied.

In Gelsthorpe v. Furnell, 20 Mont. 299, 39 L.R.A. 170, 51 Pac. 267, the court said:

The will of one Helen G. McKennan was, on the 13th of October, 1906, admitted to probate by the county court of Minnehaha county. The provisions of such will were set forth in certain findings of fact made by such county court, which findings will be hereinafter referred to. It appears that in September, 1907, the executor of, and trustee under, the above-mentioned will, learning that the county court was about to appoint an appraiser under the provisions of the above-mentioned law, in order to have the property of the estate appraised for the purpose of assessing the tax under such law, presented to such court a petition setting forth the facts hereinafter stated, and, claiming that, under such facts, the property of such estate was exempt from taxation under said inheritance tax law, asked the court to refrain from the appointment of an appraiser, and also asked the court to adjudge that certain lands conveyed to the city of Sioux Falls and to the First Congregational Church were not part of such estate. The court, in pursuance of such statute, issued a citation to all the parties interested, asking them to show cause why such property should not be appraised and the inheritance tax imposed upon such property. In answering such order, the interested parties raised, among others, the questions hereinafter discussed. A stipulation as to the value of the several parts of the estate was entered into, and thus the necessity for appointment of ap-

"The most exact rule is that which regards the tax as upon the right to receive property, rather than the right to dispose of it."

To the same effect is Lacy v. State Treasurer, — Iowa, —, 121 N. W. 179, in which it was held that an inheritance tax was not on the right to give or grant, but upon the right to receive.

But in the following cases, too, in which the tax was declared to be a tax not upon property, but upon the right or privilege of taking or succeeding to property upon the death of the former owner, it does not appear that any such distinction was considered: Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594; Wallace v. Myers, 4 L.R.A. 171, 38 Fed. 184; Re Hite, — Cal. —, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1167, 113 Pac. 1072; Re Macky, 46 Colo. 79, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1207, 102 Pac. 1075; Re Speed, 216 Ill. 23, 108 Am. praiser was waived. The said county court appraised the estate, and made findings of facts and conclusions of law.

Such findings of fact, so far as they are material, are, in substance, as follows: The deceased left a will which had been duly admitted to probate. An executor had been appointed, had qualified, and letters had issued to him. On September 6, 1906, the said Helen G. McKennan, in contemplation of death, had made and executed to the First Congregational Church of Sioux Falls, South Dakota, a warranty deed to certain lands therein described, which deed was duly acknowledged and delivered in escrow, with definite and irrevocable instructions in writing that the same, immediately upon her death, be delivered to the grantee. She died on September 29, 1906. The deed was at once delivered and placed of record. Such church was a religious corporation, and the conveyance so made was made and received with the purpose and intent that such property should be used exclusively for religious and charitable purposes. The church society had since sold such lands for $5,000, and had used the proceeds in the construction

There are some cases, however, which have designated an inheritance tax as a tax upon the right to transfer property by will or by descent and distribution; and in these also the form of expression appears to have been accidental, rather than premediated. United States v. Perkins, 163 U. S. 625, 41 L. ed. 287, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073; Plumber v. Coler, 178 U. S. 115, 44 L. ed. 998, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 829; Murdock v. Ward, 178 U. S. 139, 44 L. ed. 1109, 20 Sup. Ct. And in Minot v. Winthrop, 162 Mass. 113, 26 L.R.A. 259, 38 N. E. 512, the tax was declared to be "on the privilege of taking or transmitting property" at the death of the owner; while in State v. Clark, 30 Wash. 439, 71 Pac. 20, it was said to be "an impost or excise on the right to pass the estate, and the privilege of the devisee to take."

In the following groups of cases, the language taken literally tends to support Judge Whiting's view, but it must be remembered that the sole question the courts had in mind was whether an inheritance tax was a tax upon property, which here also was decided in the negative:

of a church building for such society, which building was used exclusively for religious purposes. Said land so conveyed was and now is of the value of $5,000. On said September 6, 1906, in contemplation of death, said Helen G. McKennan made and executed to the city of Sioux Falls, South Dakota, a deed to a certain tract of land, such deed conditioned that said land was to be used and kept as a public park for the benefit of the public, but with power on the part of the city to sell such part of the tract as should seem to it necessary for the purpose of improving the remainder. This deed was also placed in escrow under the same conditions as the deed above mentioned, and in the same manner was delivered and placed on record. Certain parts of said last-mentioned land have been sold under the power contained in such deed. The value of the land was and is $17,000. At the time of her death said Helen G. McKennan left property, real and personal, other than above mentioned, to the value of $32,000, some $5,000 of which was money on hand. Certain claims have been filed against the estate, which claims are in litigation, and not yet adjudicated. The will provided that, after the payment of legacies and debts, the remainder of the property should be devised to one Sherman, who was the executor, to be held by him in trust, to be sold and converted, and the proceeds therefrom paid over to certain trustees, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining a public hospital in the city of Sioux Falls, South Dakota, which said trust was one exclusively for charitable purposes.

As conclusions of law, the court found that the property conveyed to the church society was subject to tax on the valuation of $4,900 at the rate of 4 per cent; that the property conveyed to the city was subject to a tax on a valuation of $15,000 at the rate of 6 per cent; that the real estate devised in trust was subject to a tax on a valuation of $31,380, subject to a reduction by allowance of further claims, such tax to be at a rate of 8 per cent; that the church society was liable for the payment of the tax against the property conveyed to it; that the city was liable for the tax on its property; and the executor and trustee in his official capacity liable for tax on the residue. Decree was entered in conformity with such findings and conclusions; said decree containing a direction and an order to the church society and to the city to pay the tax to the county treasurer, and a direction and order to the trustee to retain the tax on the residue until the claims against the estate should be adjudicated.

The city, church society, executor, and trustees appealed to the circuit court upon questions of both law and fact. In the circuit court it was stipulated that the case be determined upon the findings made by the county court, which findings were, in accordance therewith, adopted by the circuit court. The court made conclusions similar to those of the county court, except that it directed the sale of the lands conveyed to the city for the payment of the tax, and further provided, in relation to the tax upon the residue in the hands of the executor and trustees, that, if the claims thereafter allowed should reduce the net amount in his hands below $20,000, but in excess of $10,000, they should pay the tax at a rate of 6 per cent, and, if reduced to $10,000, at a rate of 4 per cent, and a decree was entered in accordance with such findings and conclusions, from which decree appeal was taken to this court.

Several assignments of error are found in the record herein, nearly all of which are based upon the alleged unconstitutionality of the law herein involved. Several grounds of unconstitutionality are set forth, rendering it necessary to consider fully the said law.

Our law is, in a general way, similar to those of many other states; but it appears to have been copied after that of the state of Illinois. The parts material for our consideration in discussing the assignments hereinafter discussed provide for a division of the beneficiaries into three classes: First, those closely related to the deceased, and as to this class the rate of tax shall be $1 on every $100 of the clear market value of the property received by each person, with a proviso that, in case of estates of $20,000 or less transferred to the widow of the deceased, or of $5,000 to any one of the other parties named in such class, the same shall be exempt from such tax, and in any case there shall be such exemptions allowed from the estate passing to such parties; second, those persons more remotely related to the deceased, and, as to this class, the tax shall be $2 on every $100 of the clear market value of the property received by each person, with a proviso that there shall be an exemption from such tax in favor of each of said persons of $500; third, all beneficiaries not included in either of the others, and, as to this class, the law provides that the rate shall be as follows: "On each and every $100 of the clear market value of all property, and at the same rate for any less amount, on all estates of $10,000 and less, $4; on all estates of over $10,000, and not exceeding $20,000, $6; on all estates over $20,000, and not exceeding $50,000, . . . $8; and on all estates over $50,000, $10. Estates of the clear market value of $100, transferred to each of the parties mentioned in the last-named class, shall be exempt."

Before entering upon a discussion of the propositions raised by appellants' assignments, it is well to consider briefly the intrinsic nature of this method of raising revenues. The interpretation of, and construction to be put upon, the class of legislation now before us, has demanded the attention of the courts in probably the great majority of the states, as well as that of the Federal courts. This has been true especially in the more recent years, which fact might lead one to suppose that this is some new method of taxation. Such however, is far from the fact. An investigation shows that such method of raising revenue has been recognized and enforced for centuries, and especially in European countries; and that in this country it is found in state legislation as far back as the early part of the nineteenth century. Though it has not generally been resorted to by the states until quite recently, the Federal government has had legislation of this nature for nearly or quite a half century. No extensive historical review can serve any useful purpose herein; but to those interested therein, we would call attention to the case of Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747, wherein will be found a most interesting and exhaustive history of such legislation, together with a very exhaustive interpretation and construction of the Federal law, which law, as interpreted by the court in said case, is identical with the law at bar so far as theory of classification and progression in rates are concerned. Historically considered, it is enough to say that long before the establishment of the Constitution of this state, what were known as "probate fees," "death dues," "inheritance taxes," and "succession taxes" were generally recognized as proper and lawful sources of revenue. In fact, it must be conceded as thoroughly established that there is vested in the state, through its legislature, absolute power over all matters of taxation, save and except as the power of such legislature may be restricted by the people through the Constitution, or by some power delegated to the Federal government. Without such restrictions there would be no limit whatever upon methods of taxation, either in relation to the classes of property or other objects of taxation, the classification of such objects of taxation, the rates levied, or any of the matters becoming vital in view of the constitutional provisions, state and Federal. Re Watson, 17 S. D. 486, 97 N. W. 463, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 321; State ex rel. Schwartz v. Ferris, 53 Ohio St. 314, 30 L.R.A. 218, 41 N. E. 579.

It therefore follows as a necessary result that, in the interpretation of any law of our state relating to taxation, which is attacked as unconstitutional, every intendment must be in favor of its validity. As was well said by the court in the case of Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Gratt. 422, 73 Am. Dec. 367: "It has always been considered to be a most delicate office for a judge to undertake to pronounce an act of the legislature to be unconstitutional and void. It is substantially to repeal the obnoxious law, and thus in effect to exercise a power properly belonging to another department of the government. 'The question (says Judge Marshall) whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the Constitution is at all times a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case.' 'It is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its acts to be considered as void. The opposition between the Constitution and the law must be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other.'" Certainly, no court should declare any law unconstitutional simply because it conflicts with the views of the judges on its advisability or necessity. Com. ex rel. Dy-sart v. M'Williams, 11 Pa. 70. "But whether a statute is 'contrary to the genius of a free' people is a question for the legislator, not the judge. It cannot be annulled upon supposed natural equity, the inherent rights of freemen, or any general and vague interpretation of a provision of the Constitution beyond its plain and obvious import." Davis v. State, 3 Lea, 378. On the other hand, courts must not ignore the plain provisions of the Constitution, but should recognize that it is to the courts alone that the people can look to preserve for them those rights which have been guaranteed to them through restrictions placed upon legislation by such Constitution.

Much has been said and written in relation to the nature of the tax now in question. It has even been intimated that it is not a tax, but a mere condition imposed upon the right to receive an inheritance or to succeed to property, incident to the power to regulate transmission and succession; but this is certainly not true. State ex rel. Schwartz v. Ferris and Knowlton v. Moore, supra. Most of the decisions speak of it as a tax on the right to inherit or succeed to property. State ex rel. Schwartz v. Ferris, supra; Drew v. Tift, 79 Minn. 175, 47 L.R.A. 525, 79 Am. St. Rep. 446, 81 N. W. 839; Gelsthorpe v. Furnell, 20 Mont. 299, 39 L.R.A. 170, 51 Pac. 267; Re Fox, 154 Mich. 5, 117 N. W. 558; State ex rel. Foot v. Bazille, 97 Minn. 11, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 732, 106 N. W. 93, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1056. It seems clear to us that this is incorrect, that it is not a tax upon the right to inherit or to succeed, nor upon the right to transmit, but a tax upon the exercise of such right,—upon the transmission of property. To illustrate: Every person owning property has the inherent right to sell such property, and every other person has the inherent right to purchase same. These rights are subject to regulation, but they could not be taxed unless considered as property, and, if property, must be taxed as such. Yet the Federal government has in quite recent years, by its act to raise revenue for the Spanish War, imposed a tax, not on land, not on right to sell or purchase land, but upon the transfer of land, upon the exercise of the right to sell and buy. Considered as a tax, either upon the land or upon the right to buy, sell, or own, it would clearly have been unconstitutional, not being properly apportioned among the states.

Most courts follow the old common-law doctrine that the so-called right to transmit property or to inherit or succeed to same is but a privilege granted by statute. Only one court, that of Wisconsin, holds it to be an inherent right. Nunemacher Case, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 711. Courts holding it to be a statutory privilege, as well as the supreme court of Wisconsin in the above case, have held such a tax legal, though the Wisconsin court, in the case of Beals v. State, 139 Wis. 544, 121 N. W. 347, were confronted with the proposition that if it was an inherent right, it was not taxable. Treating it as the taxation of the exercise of the privilege or right, or, even more correctly, the taxation of the transmission of property, it is readily seen that it becomes absolutely immaterial whether we consider the transmission of, or succeeding to, property an inherent right or a statutory privilege. A corporation acquires its right to do business by the charter received. A natural person has an inherent right to do such business. If the state determines to tax the exercise of such right, it does so as to both the person and the corporation, utterly disregarding the nature or source of the right. That taxes of the nature under consideration are upon the transmission of property is held in Re Hickok, 78 Vt. 259, 62 Atl. 724, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 578; United States v. Perkins, 163 U. S. 625, 41 L. ed. 287, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073; Knowlton v. Moore, supra. This charge imposed on transmission of property is clearly a tax, and has nothing to do with, and is not at all dependent for its validity upon, the right to regulate the succession of property. Knowlton v. Moore, supra.

Appellants' first contention is that the law under consideration, being chapter 54 of the Session Laws of 1905, is void, in that it does not comply with § 8 of article 11 of the state Constitution, which provides that "no tax shall be levied except in pursuance of a law which shall distinctly state the object of the same to which the tax only shall be applied." Article 11 of the Constitution is entitled "Revenue and Finance," and relates to the ordinary methods of raising the revenues necessary for maintenance of government. Other states have articles in their Constitutions similar to article 11, supra, and sections similar to § 8 thereof. Has such section and article any relation to, or bearing upon, tax legislation of the nature under consideration? We think not. There is certainly inherent in this method of raising revenue good reason why the law should not provide for the application of such revenues. This source of revenue must necessarily be one uncertain as to its returns, and it can hardly be thought that the framers of our Constitution intended that the revenue derived from sources such as those provided for by this law, or by taxes on franchises, occupations, etc., should be relied on to meet those appropriations upon which the state must rely for existence. Regardless, however, of this, we are fully satisfied that § 8 of article 11 should be construed in connection with the other sections of such article, and that, when so construed, it clearly refers to the ordinary property tax, a tax which, at the time it is levied, can be levied with knowledge as to the probable amount of revenues that will be derived therefrom, and can thus well be rendered ample to meet the uses to which the same shall be applied. This question was raised in the case of Re McPherson, 104 N. Y. 315, 58 Am. Rep. 502, 10 N. E. 685, wherein an inheritance tax law was in question. The constitutional provision in New York contained in their article relating to revenues is, in substance, the same as § 8, supra. It provides specifically that the law must state the object to which the tax is to be applied. In New York, as in this state, the law directs the money to be paid "for the use of the state" with no further direction. The New York court enters into a very full discussion of this matter, and, among other things, says, in relation to the contention now under consideration: "It is always uncertain upon whom it will fall, and how much revenue it will produce. It would have been impossible for the legislature, perhaps years in advance, to specify the particular objects to which the tax should be applied, and we are of opinion that this section of the Constitution was intended to apply to the annual recurring taxes known at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and imposed generally upon the entire property of the state."

Appellants' second contention is that the conveyances to the Congregational Church and to the city of Sioux Falls, South Dakota, are exempt from the levy of an inheritance tax by force of self-executing provisions of the Constitution. Section 5 provides that the property of the United States, the state, county, and municipal corporations shall be exempt from taxation. Section 6 provides for the exemption of property used exclusively for religious and charitable purposes. Section 7 provides that all laws exempting other property from taxation shall be void. These sections are all found in article 11 of our Constitution, and they clearly relate to property exemptions. As we have already said, this is not a tax in any sense whatever, upon property, but a tax upon the transmission of property, so that the legislature is in no manner controlled by these sections in the imposing of taxes of the kind under consideration. It is the uniform holding of the courts that constitutional provisions relating to taxation of property in no manner bear upon taxation other than that of property. Re Watson, 17 S. D. 486, 97 N. W. 463, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 321; Nunnemacher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 711; Re Fox, 154 Mich. 5, 117 N. W. 558.

Appellants' third contention is that the statute provides for an exemption to the widow and other heirs enumerated in § 1 of the law, contrary to the above-mentioned § 7 of article 11 of our Constitution. What we have stated in reference to the second contention answers this. No property is exempted.

Appellants' fourth contention is that "the statute is void in that it violates § 2 of article 11 of the Constitution, which provides that all taxes to be raised in this state shall be uniform on all real and personal property according to its value in money, . . . so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his or her or its property; and § 17 of article 6, which provides that no tax or duty shall be imposed without the consent of the people, . . . and all taxes shall be equal and uniform." It must be conceded that this contention raises a serious question, not so far as § 2 of article 11 is concerned, for that section, like §§ 5, 6, and 7, supra, of the same article, relates only to property taxation, but as regards the effect of § 17 of article 6 of the Constitution. While the decisions of other courts have passed upon almost every conceivable question relating to legislation of the nature under consideration, yet they are either based upon statutes materially different, or else the constitutional provisions differ, from those of this state. In this state we have not only the usual provisions for equality and uniformity of taxation as found in the revenue articles of the other Constitutions, but we have, as § 17 of article 6 of our Constitution, being the article setting forth the Bill of Rights, the following: "No tax or duty shall be imposed without the consent of the people or their representatives in the legislature, and all taxation shall be equal and uniform." We have made a very thorough investigation to ascertain whether or not this provision was to be found in the Bill of Rights of any other state, and, in so far as we can ascertain after an examination of the Constitutions of practically every state in the Union, no state has any provision of this nature, other than such as is found in the revenue article of its Constitution, save and except the state of Oregon, which, in its present Constitution, adopted in 1857, has a § 32 of its Bill of Rights, a section identical to our section above quoted, except it uses the term "legislative assembly" for "legislature." In the present Constitution of Massachusetts, which was adopted in 1780, there occurs, in the Bill of Rights, a section similar to our section above, omitting therefrom the clause, "and all taxation shall be equal and uniform." The Massachusetts section was copied into the Bills of Rights in the several states of New Hampshire, Maryland, Maine, and North and South Carolina. These appear to be the only provisions to be found relating to taxation outside of the revenue articles, save and except as the general declarations guarding the equal rights of citizens, found in various Constitutions, may bear upon the matter of taxation. The state of Oregon has an inheritance tax law passed in the year 1903, but the same differs from ours in certain material particulars; it being similar, in those particulars, to the Wisconsin law construed in the Nunemacher Case, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 711. The Oregon statute does not seem to have received any construction by the courts of such state.

It will be seen that our statute divides parties receiving property by inheritance or succession into three classes: Those closely related to the former owner, those more remotely related, and those not included in either of the foregoing classes. It also provides for the last class a progressive rate dependent upon the value of the property transmitted. Cases are not lacking declaring any attempted classification unlawful. And authorities are to be found holding that a progressive tax based upon value of property transmitted is unconstitutional. On the other hand, there are many cases sustaining classification based upon kinship, and also sustaining progression as to rates within such classes; but the courts are divided as to the rule for progression. Kochersperger v. Drake, 167 Ill. 122, 41 L.R.A. 446, 47 N. E. 321; Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594; Nunemacher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 711; Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Gratt. 422, 73 Am. Dec. 367; State ex rel. Taylor v. Guilbert, 70 Ohio St. 229, 71 N. E. 636, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 25; Nettleton's Appeal, 76 Conn. 235, 56 Atl. 565; Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747; Re Fox, 154 Mich. 5, 117 N. W. 558. All taxes of this nature are levied upon the value of the property transmitted, and the statutes universally provide for the allowance of a certain amount from such valuation as exempt from the tax; such exemptions varying usually according to rules based upon kinship between recipient of property and the former owner. Statutes are uniformly upheld, where, like that of this state, they provide that such exemptions shall be allowed regardless of amount of property transmitted to the party receiving the property. Re Wilmerding, 117 Cal. 281, 49 Pac. 181; State ex rel. Taylor v. Guilbert, 70 Ohio St. 229, 71 N. E. 636, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 25. But where transmission of small legacies is exempt from taxation, and, when the property transmitted is above the exemption, no part is exempted, the law is held invalid. Drew v. Tift, 79 Minn. 175, 47 L.R.A. 525, 79 Am. St. Rep. 446, 81 N. W. 839; State ex rel. Schwartz v. Ferris, 53 Ohio St. 314, 30 L.R.A. 218, 41 N. E. 579.

It is insisted by the appellants that, even conceding that the rulings of the Federal courts and those of the other states are correct in sustaining classification based upon a proper basis, and conceding that kinship of recipient is a proper basis for such classification, further conceding that the rulings of such courts sustaining some feature of progressive taxation or of exemptions, are correct, yet those decisions are entitled to no consideration, because not controlled by a constitutional provision such as found in our Bill of Rights. And, inasmuch as the courts of other jurisdictions have uniformly held, as hereinbefore noted, that restrictions in the revenue articles of their Constitutions had no application to taxation of this nature, and that, therefore, the rule of equality therein provided for did not control the legislature or courts, it is apparent that there is much weight to such claim of appellants, if we hold that the section in our Bill of Rights does apply to such taxation. We consider this not an open question in this state. In Re Watson, 17 S. D. 486, 97 N. W. 463, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 321, this court held that the revenue article of the Constitution had no application to an occupation tax, which was the tax then under consideration. The question arose as to whether the classification provided for by the statute before the court conflicted with the rule requiring equality in taxation. The court said: "In many jurisdictions an answer to this inquiry has been avoided on the ground that the rule is applicable only to ad valorem taxes on property. Such position cannot be taken in this state. The clause, 'and all taxation shall be equal and uniform,' found in the Bill of Rights, cannot be ignored. Constitutions are supposed to be prepared with much care and deliberation. It will not do to assume that such important instruments contain any idle or meaningless phrases. On the contrary, it must be presumed that every word was advisedly selected, inserted for a purpose, and intended to have its due weight in determining what organic principles have been established. In this state, then, taxes on occupations must be equal and uniform." Certainly the said constitutional provision applies to an inheritance tax as well as to an occupation tax.

What, then, is the effect of this provision of our Constitution? The supreme court of Oregon has held that it does not prevent classification, but that, when there is classification, everything within a class must be governed thereby. Crawford v. Linn County, 11 Or. 482, 5 Pac. 738. And this has also been held by this court. Re Watson, supra. It is well also to note the difference in wording between the two constitutional provisions. That found in Bill of Rights is "all taxation shall be equal and uniform." It will be noticed that this clause in no manner restricts the legislature in the methods or rules for assessments and levies which it must follow in legislating. It leaves with the legislature to determine the methods to be followed in order to render taxation uniform and equal. But the revenue article of the Constitution reads: "Taxes . . . shall be uniform on . . . property, according to its value in money, . . . so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property." Such provision absolutely prohibits any distinctions, between classes, in rates of levy, whether such distinction were attempted upon a classification of persons, merely as persons, or upon the difference in ability to pay.

We are therefore of the opinion that our Constitution permits under the Bill of Rights, not only classification, but progression within classes, provided such classification and progression are based upon proper foundation, and result in substantial uniformity and equality. Classification "must always rest upon some difference which bears a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect to which the classification is proposed, and can never be made arbitrarily and without any such basis.

. . . But arbitrary selection can never be justified by calling it classification. The equal protection demanded by the 14th Amendment (Federal Constitution) forbids this. . . . No duty rests more imperatively upon the courts than the enforcement of those constitutional provisions intended to secure that equality of rights which is the foundation of free government.

. . . In all cases it must appear, not only that a classification has been made, but also that it is based upon some reasonable ground,—some difference which bears a just and proper relation to the attempted classification,—and is not a mere arbitrary classification." On the other hand, in imposing taxes or duties of the nature now under consideration, there can only be equality where there is classification; in fact, absolute equality is an impossibility in this as in all taxation. As was said by this court in Re Watson, 17 S. D. 486, 97 N. W. 463, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 321: "To determine the extent of contribution in each individual case, with equality and uniformity, is the design of every wise and just system of taxation. But so long as no two persons in the state are surrounded by precisely the same circumstances and possessed of precisely the same ability to bear the burdens of taxation, no absolutely equal or just system of collecting revenues will be evolved. 'Perfectly equal taxation,' it has been said, 'will remain as unattainable good so long as laws and government and men are imperfect.' Grim v. Weissenberg School Dist. 57 Pa. 437, 98 Am. Dec. 237. Perfect equality is not possible. So, we construe the clause requiring all taxation to be equal and uniform as meaning, with reference to taxes on occupations, that the burden imposed shall fall alike on all persons who are in substantially the same situation,—a rule generally recognized, even in the absence of an express constitutional requirement as to uniformity. Within the boundaries of this limitation lie broad fields of legislative discretion, which should not be invaded by the courts. In seeking to secure equality and uniformity, the legislature may tax some trades, and not others; it may,—indeed, must—classify occupations for the purpose of taxation; and the more exhaustive its system of arrangement, the more nearly similar will be the situation of all who are embraced within any designated class."

Whether we consider taking of property by succession a right or a privilege, it is founded upon ideas of right and justice deepseated in the heart of every normal person. Certainly there is no inequality in the law of succession, that gives a widow a greater exemption than is given to the son of a deceased person; or in the law that says property shall pass to near relatives in preference to those distant. In order to pass upon the question of equality, we must first determine the situation of the parties between whom it may be claimed an unlawful distinction has been drawn. It is certainly a greater privilege for a person having no natural claims upon the deceased to inherit his property, than it is for the wife or the child, that has perhaps helped to acquire such property, and who would, during the life of deceased, have been legally bound to support him if he was in need of support. It may well be said that it is against public policy to allow large fortunes to be held together by their transmission undivided upon death of owner,—that it is a menace to the welfare of the country. This being true, it is then a greater privilege or right to take a large inheritance than a small, greater not merely in proportion to the value of the inheritance, but increasing out of such proportion, so that it can well be said that it is a greater privilege to take the second $10,000 of an estate than the first $10,000 thereof. Such matters as the above could certainly be considered by the legislature in determining what legislation would result in true "uniformity and equality." And under the rules hereinbefore quoted, as laid down in Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Gratt. 422, 73 Am. Dec. 367, and Davis v. State, 3 Lea, 378, it is certainly not for us to overturn the work of the legislature unless some feature of it must necessarily result in lack of uniformity or inequality. We have no hesitancy in pronouncing the classification based on kinship constitutional. Not so, however, the method for progression from transmissions of less to those of greater value.

An examination of the authorities will reveal that two methods of progression are provided for in the statutes of the several states: One, that found in this state, wherein the higher rate, in case of transmission of a greater devise or bequest, is levied upon the whole value of property transmitted; the other, like that found in the Wisconsin statute, where the increased rate applies only to the excess in value of property transmitted, over the amount subject to the next lower rate. The difference can readily be seen by changing the section of our statute, hereinbefore quoted, so that it would provide that the first $10,000 in value should be subject to rate of 4 per cent, the excess of $10,000 up to $20,000, 6 per cent, the excess of $20,000 up to $50,000, 8 per cent, and all excess over $50,000, 10 per cent. Must our statute, in its application, result in inequalities not consistent with any reason or theory upon which progression is allowable? It seems to be quite uniformly held by the courts that one fact to be urged in support of a progressive tax, progressing as the amount transmitted increases, is that the recipient of the larger amount is able to pay a larger rate of tax than the recipient of a smaller amount. Conceding this to be a reasonable claim, can it be said that the increased ability to pay of a devisee receiving $20,000 over that of one receiving $10,000 comes from the receipt of his first $10,000? Certainly not, the increased ability to pay comes solely from the receipt of the second $10,000. It is ridiculous to say that a man who receive a devise or legacy of $10,001 is as well able to pay a tax of $594.06 as is the man who receives $10,000 to pay $396. We have never discovered any method of making $1 pay $198.06.

As we have hereinbefore stated, another basis for a progressive tax, and one that seems to us the more reasonable, is the fact that, it being against public policy to allow large estates to be held together by transmission after death of owners, it is a greater privilege to inherit a larger than a smaller estate, which privilege increases in ratio greater than the increase in value of property inherited. But, as was said regarding the ability to pay as basis for progression, if one person receives $20,000 and another $10,000, it was no greater privilege for the first to receive his first $10,000 than for the second; the increased privilege is all found in the receiving of the extra $10,000, and it is the exercise of this extra privilege, the transmission of the extra $10,000, that should receive the extra burden of taxation.

It must be conceded that, if the legislature can fix rates of taxation, it can increase such rates, and upon grounds of public policy it might place a limit in value above which all transmissions would go to the state. As rates would be raised, the inequalities in a law like ours becomes more apparent, as will appear from the following illustrations: Conceding that the state could pass a law taxing transmissions as follows: First $10,000, 10 per cent; excess $10,000 to $20,000, 20 per cent; excess $20,000 to $30,000, 30 per cent; excess $30,000 to $40,000, 40 per cent; excess $40,000 to $50,000, 50 per cent; excess $50,000 to $60,000, 60 per cent; excess $60,000 to $70,000, 70 per cent; excess $70,000 to $80,000, 80 per cent; excess $80,000 to $90,000, 90 per cent; excess $90,000, 100 per cent. Under such a law transmissions would net: $10,000, $9,000; $20,000, $17,000; $30,000, $24,000; $40,000, $30,000; $50,000, $35,000; $60,000, $39,000; $70,000, $42,000; $80,000, $44,000; $90,000 and all above, $45,000. It will be seen that under the above system there must always be an increase in net benefit wherever there is a greater transmission. Suppose the law to apply the greater rate, as the law under consideration does, not merely to the excess, but to the whole transmission, then, taking the above amounts and rates, we would find that the transmissions would net as follows: $10,000, $9,000; $20,000, $16,000; $30,000, $21,000; $40,000, $24,000; $50,000, $25,000; $60,000, $24,000; $70,000, $21,000; $80,000, $16,000; $90,000, $9,000; $90,001 or any sum greater net recipient $0. If further illustration of unsoundness of this plan of progression is needed, it is to be found in the following, in which we use higher rates than the law provides simply to make the unsoundness of the plan more apparent: Suppose the law made a rate of 25 per cent if estate did not exceed $10,000, and 50 per cent if above $10,000. A party dying possessed of $25,000, desiring to leave $7,500 net to each of two friends, could do so by leaving to each $10,000. He would have left $5,000. But let us suppose he desired to give one $7,500 net and the other $8,000 net: it would be absolutely impossible for him to give the extra $500. In fact, if he left his second friend over $10,000, such party would get net less than the one who got $10,000, unless he was left the whole balance of $15,000, when the two would net the same. From the $15,000 the second party would net the same as though he were left $10,000. If to the second were left $11,000, he would net $5,500 to the other's $7,500. Certainly such classification cannot be justified. And we must remember that the underlying theory or plan is the same as in our law, and, if such a law as ours is constitutional, laws like the above illustrations must be held constitutional; the only difference being one of degree, as will be seen by taking two bequests to friends under law now before us, one bequest of $10,000, the other of $10,100. The first nets $9,804, the other $9,500, or $204 extra tax for transmission of $100 more property. If one bequest were $50,000, the other $50,001, the first would pay $3,992 tax, the second $4,990.10. Thus, the recipient of the second bequest would pay $988.10 tax for privilege of receiving $1. To say that there is equality in our law would be like saying there was equality in a city ordinance under which the consumer of less than 1,000 cubic feet of gas a month would pay 90 cents per 1,000 feet, while the consumer of over 1,000 feet would pay 60 cents per 1,000, not merely on the excess over the first 1,000 feet, but on the whole amount consumed; resulting in one paying 90 cents for 1,000 feet, the other 66 cents for 1,100 feet. No possible working of a normal mind could evolve any argument, or advance any reasons, to uphold such legislation, as against an attack upon the ground of producing unreasonable inequalities. Drew v. Tift, 79 Minn. 175, 47 L.R.A. 525, 79 Am. St. Rep. 446, 81 N. W. 839; State ex rel. Schwartz v. Ferris, 53 Ohio St. 314, 30 L.R.A. 218, 41 N. E. 579.

But it is urged that our statute is copied after that of Illinois, and that the supreme court of that state has upheld it (Kochersperger v. Drake, 167 Ill. 122, 41 L.R.A. 446, 47 N. E. 321), and that the decision of that court has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594. It is claimed that the holdings of these courts are of controlling force. Certainly, if it were a mere interpreting of words of the statute, the adoption of the Illinois statute, after it had been interpreted by the court of that state, would be presumed to carry with the adoption the interpretation put upon the words thereof. It must be remembered, however, that the courts of one state are not bound by any constitutional construction placed upon a law by the courts of the states from which the law came,—and this even if the Constitutions were the same, and in this case the Constitutions vary greatly. An examination of the Magoun Case shows that the Federal court simply adopted the construction of the law, so far as the state Constitution was concerned, placed upon such law by the state court, and in no manner passed upon the question now before us. It will be found that nearly or quite every case upholding a law similar to ours quotes the Magoun and Drake Cases as authority for such decisions, and, further, that they are in states without such constitutional restrictions as contained in our Bill of Rights. The legislature of Colorado had presented to it a request for their views upon the Illinois law, and they expressed the same forcibly in Re Inheritance Tax, 23 Colo. 492, 48 Pac. 535; this opinion being after decision of Drake Case by nisi prius court, and before decision by the Supreme Court. The Colorado court said: "Although an inheritance tax law of some kind is in force in very many states of the Union, the statute of the state of Illinois, from which this bill is mainly taken, is one of the most objectionable acts upon the subject to be found; and a nisi prius judge of that state has recently declared it to be invalid, because it conflicts with certain constitutional provisions of that state." It is true that the legislature of Colorado passed this law, and the supreme court of that state upheld it in Re Magnes, 32 Colo. 527, 77 Pac. 853; but the court based their decision upon the Illinois cases and the Magoun Case, and did not enter into any discussion of their own, merely quoting the reasons given in the Magoun Case: "First, an inheritance tax is not one on property, but on the succession; second, the right to take property by devise or descent is a creature of the law, and not a natural right, and therefore the authority which confers it may impose conditions upon it. From these principles it is deduced that the state may tax privileges, discriminate between relatives, and grant exemptions, and is not precluded from this power by the provisions of the respective state Constitutions requiring uniformity of taxation." If we read the case of Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 4 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747, aright, the Federal Supreme Court has, in that case, virtually overruled the Magoun Case on second reason quoted, and laid down the rule that the fact the state has the right to control the transmission of property by devise or succession has nothing whatever to do with the power of the state to tax transmission of property, any more than the power to create corporations, and to give them the right to do business, would empower a state to disregard its Constitution in taxing such business; or any more than the power to tax transfers of property, or issuance of check, etc., under Spanish War act, rested upon any right to transfer property or issue check given by state.

The case of Knowlton v. Moore construed the Federal inheritance tax law, which law, so far as classification and progression are concerned, is in principle like the law before us, and such law was upheld. But a reading of such decision clearly indicates that, if the Federal Constitution had contained a clause like that quoted from our Bill of Rights, the decision would have been the reverse. The Federal law was attacked as unconstitutional, and we quote the following from the decision of the court: "The contention is that because the statute exempts legacies and distributive shares in personal property below $10,000, because it classifies the rate of tax according to the relationship or absence of the relationship of the taker to the deceased, and provides for a rate progressing by the amount of the legacy or share, therefore the tax is repugnant to that portion of the first clause of § 8, art. 1, of the Constitution, which provides: 'The duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.' The argument to the contrary, whilst conceding that the tax devised by the statute does not fulfil the requirement of equality and uniformity, as those words are construed when found in state Constitutions [the underscoring is ours], asserts that it does not thereby follow that the taxes in question are repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, since the provision in the Constitution that 'duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States,' it is insisted, has a different meaning from the expression 'equal and uniform,' found in state Constitutions. In order to decide these respective contentions, it becomes at the outset necessary to accurately define the theories upon which they rest. On the one side, the proposition is that the command that duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States relates to the inherent and intrinsic character of the tax; that it contemplates the operation of the tax upon the property of the individual taxpayer, and exacts that, when an impost, duty, or excise is levied, it shall operate precisely in the same manner upon all individuals; that is to 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

say, the proposition is that 'uniform throughout the United States' commands that excises, duties, and imposts, when levied, shall be equal and uniform in their operation upon persons and property in the sense of the meaning of the words 'equal and uniform,' as now found in the Constitutions of most of the states of the Union. The contrary construction is this: That the words 'uniform throughout the United States' do not relate to the inherent character of the tax as respects its operation on individuals, but simply requires that whatever plan or method Congress adopts for laying the tax in question, the same plan and the same method must be made operative throughout the United States; that is to say, that wherever a subject is taxed anywhere, the same must be taxed everywhere throughout the United States, and at the same rate. The two contentions then may be summarized by saying that the one asserts that the Constitution prohibits the levy of any duty, impost, or excise which is not intrinsically equal and uniform in its operation upon individuals, and the other that the power of Congress in levying the taxes in question is by the terms of the Constitution restrained only by the requirement that such taxes be geographically uniform." Following the above is a discussion covering over twenty pages to show that the clause in the Federal Constitution required uniformity between places, and not between individuals. Certainly, the Federal court would not have entered into such a comprehensive review of the constitutional clause, both as regards its history and meaning, if it had not believed, as was conceded by those defending the law, that the statute did "not fulfil the requirements of equality and uniformity, as those words are construed when found in state Constitutions." If such court had believed that it was immaterial, so far as that case was concerned, whether the Federal constitutional provision referred to place or person, it would certainly have said so. We therefore repeat that, if the Federal Constitution had contained the clause found in our Bill of Rights, and the same referred to persons (as it does in the state Constitution), the court, in Knowlton v. Moore, supra, would not have sustained the Federal law.

We are satisfied that with a classification such as found in our statute, and a rule of progression such as is found in the Wisconsin law, and which is followed in some other states, a statute would be constitutional.

Appellants attack the statute upon the ground that it is defective in its provisions pertaining to property transferred in contemplation of death, in that it fixes no personal liability on part of grantee for the taxes, it creates no lien on the property for the tax, and provides no proper remedy for recovery of judgment for taxes. The statute is certainly indefinite and ambiguous, if not clearly defective, in these features. Inasmuch as new legislation will be necessary, without dictating as to the nature of such legislation, we would suggest that, if it is to provide for taxation upon transmission of property in contemplation of death, it should clearly and distinctly provide: For personal liability for such taxes on the part of the grantee; for a lien upon the property to secure such tax, such lien to rest on the property when same is held by the grantee or any other party, not an innocent purchaser for value and without notice; and for an action, in a court of competent jurisdiction, to recover judgment and enforce the lien.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and said court is directed to enter judgment in favor of the appellants.

Haney, J., dissenting.

A petition for rehearing having been granted, McCoy, J., on February 23, 1911, handed down the following additional opinion:

This is an appeal from the circuit court of Minnehaha county involving the constitutionality of the inheritance tax law of this state as contained in chapter 54, Sess. Laws 1905. The cause is now before this court upon rehearing. Decision and judgment of this court were entered May 10, 1910, reversing the judgment of the lower court, and which decision appears in 24 S. D. —, 126 N. W. 611. A general statement of the facts will be found in the former decision.

Prior to her death, Helen G. McKennan disposed of her property by certain deeds and a will. The trial court, in substance, made the following findings of fact and conclusions of law: On September 6, 1906, the said Helen G. McKennan, in contemplation of death, made and executed to the First Congregational Church of Sioux Falls a warranty deed to certain lands therein described, which deed was fully acknowledged and delivered in escrow, with definite and irrevocable instructions in writing that the same, immediately upon her death, be delivered to the grantee. She died on September 29, 1906. The deed was at once delivered and placed of record. Such church is a religious corporation, and the conveyance so made was made and received with the purpose and intent that such property should be used exclusively for religious and charitable purposes. The church society has since sold such lands for $5,000, and has used the proceeds in the construction of a church building for such society, which building was used exclusively for religious purposes. Said land so conveyed was of the value of $5,000. On the 6th day of September, 1906, in contemplation of death, Helen G. McKennan made and executed to the city of Sioux Falls a deed of a certain tract of land, such deed conditioned that said land was to be used and kept as a public park for the benefit of the public, but with power on the part of the city to sell such part of the tract as should seem to it necessary for the purpose of improving the remainder. This deed was also placed in escrow under the same conditions as the deed above mentioned, and in the same manner was delivered and placed of record. Certain parts of said land have been sold under the power contained in said deed. The value of the land was $17,000. At the time of the death of Helen G. McKennan, she left property, real and personal, other than above mentioned, to the value of $32,000, some $5,000 of which was money on hand. Certain claims have been filed against the estate, which are in litigation and which are not yet adjudicated. The will provided that, after the payment of legacies and debts, the remainder of the property should be devised to one Sherman, who was the executor, to be held by him in trust, to be sold and converted, and the proceeds therefrom paid over to certain trustees for the purpose of constructing and maintaining a public hospital in the city of Sioux Falls, which said trust was one exclusively for charitable purposes.

As conclusions of law, the court found that the property conveyed to the church society was subject to tax on the valuation of $4,900 at the rate of 4 per cent; that the property conveyed to the city was subject to a tax on a valuation of $15,900 at the rate of 6 per cent; that the real estate devised in trust was subject to a tax on a valuation of $31,380, subject to a reduction by allowance on further claims, such tax to be at a rate of 8 per cent; that the church society was liable for the tax on its property, and the executor and trustee in his official capacity liable for the tax on the residue. Decree was entered in conformity with such findings and conclusions; said decree containing a direction and an order to the church society and to the city to pay the tax to the county treasurer, and a direction and order to the trustee to retain the tax on the residue until the claims against the estate should be adjudicated.

Section 1, chap. 54, Laws 1905, provides:

"That all property, real, personal, and mixed, which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state, or according to the provision of any statutes in this state, from any person who may die seised or possessed of the same while a resident of this state, or, if decedent was not a resident of this state at the time of his death, which property, or any part thereof, shall be within this state; or any interest therein or income therefrom which shall be transferred by deed, grant, sale, or gift made in contemplation of the death of the grantor or bargainor or giver, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after such death, to any person or persons, or to any body politic or corporate, in trust or otherwise, or by reason whereof any person or any body politic or corporate shall become beneficially entitled, in possession or expectancy, to any property or income thereof,—shall be and is subject to a tax at the rate hereinafter specified, to be paid to the treasurer of the proper county for the use of the state; and all heirs, legatees, and devisees, administrators, executors, and trustees shall be liable for any and all such taxes until the same shall have been paid as hereinafter directed." This statute also then divides those by whom such taxable estates are received into three general classes, viz.: (1) Near relations; (2) distant relations; (3) strangers; with a different rate of taxation upon the value of the estate transmitted to each class. As will be observed, the basis of this classification is relationship. It will also be observed that under this classification near relations pay a tax of 1 per cent of the net value of the estate transmitted and received, after deducting the provided-for exemption; distant relations pay a tax of 2 per cent of the net value of the estate transmitted and received, after deducting the provided-for exemption; strangers pay taxes varying from 4 to 10 per cent of the net value of the estate transmitted and received, after deducting the exemption. It will also be observed that, as between these different classes, there is not uniformity or equality of the per cent or rate of taxation, but each class pays a different rate and a tax different in amount, even though the estate transmitted to an individual within each class might be of the same value. Again, this statute in question subdivides the third class (strangers) into four subclasses, viz.: (1) Estates of the value of $10,000 or less, paying a tax of 4 per cent of the net value of the estate transmitted, less the exemption; (2) estates over $10,000, and not exceeding $20,000, paying a tax of 6 per cent; (3) estates over $20,000, and not exceeding $50,000, paying a tax of 8 per cent; (4) estates over $50,000 paying a tax of 10 per cent. These four subclasses are not based on relationship, but purely and solely on the progressive amount or graduated value of the estate transmitted to each individual receiver thereof. As between these four different classes, there is the same lack of uniformity and equality in rate or per cent of taxation that exists between the three prior mentioned classes based on relationship.

All courts and all governments conceive that the transmission of property occasioned by death, although differing from tax on property as such, is nevertheless a usual subject of taxation. It is the succession or transmission or receipt of property occasioned by death that is subject to the tax. It is the privilege of succeeding to or inheriting the property of a deceased person, and not the property itself which is thus transmitted, that is taxed. In the consideration of this subject, the distinction between an inheritance tax as such and a property tax as such must at all times be kept in view. Constitutions, statutes, arguments, and reasoning applicable to a property tax are not always germane or applicable to the consideration of an inheritance tax. It seems to be generally held that the provisions of a Constitution, such as § 2, art. 11, of our state Constitution, have no applicability to or effect upon an inheritance tax law such as the one now under consideration, but that such provisions relate solely to property taxation. Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747; Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594; Re Fox, 154 Mich. 5, 117 N. W. 558; 12 Current Law, p. 2081; Nunnenmacher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 711; State ex rel. Taylor v. Guilbert, 70 Ohio St. 229, 71 N. E. 636, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 25; Re Watson, 17 S. D. 486, 97 N. W. 463, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 321.

The legislature of this state had the undoubted right to create the inheritance law contained in chapter 54, Laws 1905, unless prohibited by some Federal or state constitutional provision (Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 292, 42 L. ed. 1042, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594; Rodman v. Com. 130 Ky. 88, ante, 592, 113 S. W. 61), and we must look to some other constitutional provision than that relating to property taxation to find the constitutional prohibition, if any such exists. It is contended that § 17, art. 6, contained in the Bill of Rights in our state Constitution, which provides that "no tax or duty shall be imposed without the consent of the people, . . . and all taxation shall be equal and uniform," prohibits the statute in question; and that this statute is in conflict with this section of our state Constitution. We are of the opinion that this contention is not well founded. While it is no doubt true that § 17, art. 6, is broad enough to comprehend and applies to inheritance laws, still we are constrained to the view that the equality and uniformity comprehended within the meaning of this constitutional provision have been satisfied in the statute in question, and that this view is substantiated and borne out by the weight of authority. To start with, it is not the question whether some better, more advisable, or more equal and uniform law might have been created and passed, but solely the question whether this statute is invalid by reason of its being in conflict with § 17, art. 6, of the Constitution. In the case Re Fox, 154 Mich. 5, 117 N. W. 558, the supreme court of Michigan, when construing a very similar inheritance tax law in connection with constitutional provisions of that state, said: "But every Constitution in the Union is founded upon the principle 'that all men are equal before the law, and that life, liberty, and property are secured to all alike.' Such principle, however, is no broader in its scope and effect than the provisions of the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution, and no law which can be sustained under such provisions of the Federal Constitution can be held . . . to violate either the letter or the spirit of our state Constitution." That clause of the 14th Amendment reading, "nor shall any state . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," is as broad and comprehensive in scope and effect as the language of § 17 of our Bill of Rights, reading, "and all taxation shall be equal and uniform," can possibly be. Equality and uniformity when relating to the same subject are similar terms and mean the same thing, whether in a state or Federal Constitution. This clause of the 14th Amendment in a way was expressly aimed at state Constitutions and state legislative enactments with reference to equality and uniformity of state laws generally. Bell's Gap R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 134 U. S. 232, 33 L. ed. 892, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 533. The equality and uniformity of inheritance, succession, and other kindred laws are within the scope and purview of the 14th Amendment. 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. pp. 608, 618. It is said, and evidently truly, that chapter 54, Laws 1905, was modeled after a similar statute in force in the state of Illinois. The Illinois statute first makes three classes liable to the payment of the tax based on relationship,—(1) near relatives, (2) distant relatives, (3) strangers,—the same as our statute, and then again subdivides the third class (strangers) into subclasses based solely on the progressive value of the inheritance received by each individual by the same method of progression as employed in our statute. The supreme court of Illinois in passing on the constitutionality of the statute in that state in the case of Kochersperger v. Drake, 167 Ill. 122, 41 L.R.A. 446, 47 N. E. 321, said: "A tax which affects the property within a specific class is uniform as to that class, and there is no provision of the Constitution which precludes legislative action from assessing a tax on that particular class. By this act of the legislature, six classes of property are created heretofore absolutely unknown. In those classes of property, depending upon the estate owned by one dying possessed thereof, which the state may regulate as to its descent and the right to devise. The tax assessed on classes thus created is absolutely uniform on the classes upon which it operates, and under the provisions of the statute is to be determined by valuation, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property inherited; and is not inconsistent with the principle of taxation fixed by the Constitution, and is clearly within the sections of the Constitution quoted. No want of uniformity with one living who owns property can be urged as a reason why the statute makes an inconsistent rule. No person inherits property or can take by devise, except by the statute; and the state, having power to regulate this question, may create classes, and provide for uniformity with reference to classes which were before unknown. Laws of this character have been sustained in Pennsylvania, New York, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and other states. They have been held invalid in New Hampshire and Ohio, and some other states. We are not disposed to enter into an analysis of these cases, and a consideration of the principles on which they have been decided. The broad principle presented is that the legislature may create new classes of property with reference to estates, under which they may regulate the right to inherit or devise and take under devise, and, such right existing, such classes may be created, and, as created, may be uniform, and the assessment by valuation, when declared to operate equally on the right of succession to such classes, is not a violation of the provisions of the sections of article 9 of the Constitution of the state of Illinois." In Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, supra, the constitution-ality of the same Illinois statute was before the Supreme Court of the United States, wherein it was held that this Illinois statute in no way conflicted with the 14th Amendment. The court said: "But neither case can be said to be contrary to the rule of equality of the 14th Amendment. That rule does not require, as we have seen, exact equality of taxation. It only requires that the law imposing it shall operate on all alike under the same circumstances. . . . It is not unequal in operation because it does not levy the same percentage on every dollar, does not fail to treat 'all alike under like circumstances and conditions, both in the privilege conferred and the liabilities imposed.'"

The state of Michigan has also a very similar inheritance tax law, also divided into classes based on relationship, and again subdivided in subclasses based on the progressive value of the estate received by the individual in any particular class. That statute was also held not to be in conflict with the 14th Amendment in Re Fox, 154 Mich. 5, 117 N. W. 558. The court said: "This statute creates two main classes; the first being composed of lineal heirs and near relatives, . . . and the second of distant relatives and strangers. The former is again divided into two subclasses dependent upon the amount of the estate received. Classifications based upon relationship and also upon the amount transferred have been sustained in the Federal courts, and in our own and many other state courts. If the constituents of each class or subclass are affected alike by the statute, the rule of equality prescribed by constitutional provisions, and defined by the courts in construing those provisions, is satisfied. Tested by this rule, it is evident that the statute under consideration meets the constitutional requirements. . . . There is equality within the classes, and that is all that is required." The state of Wisconsin also has a very similar inheritance tax law, which divides the recipients of the inheritance into classes based on relationship, and again subdivides them into subclasses based on the progressive increasing value of the inheritance. Several similar statutes of Wisconsin were first held to be unconstitutional as lacking uniformity and equality, but in Nunnemacher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 711, the Wisconsin statute is held not to be in conflict with the constitutional provisions requiring uniformity and equality. In that case the supreme court of Wisconsin said: "That, so far as the taxation of property is concerned, there can be no classification which will interfere with substantial and practical uniformity of rate, . . . and that in the clause [in the Wisconsin Constitution], 'the rule of taxation shall be uniform,' if applicable to excise taxation at all, means no more than the general equality clause of the Constitution, or 'the equality protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. Taxation of privileges and occupations manifestly cannot be uniform in the sense in which property taxation may be uniform. Property may be all reduced to its money value, and a uniform rate levied upon it all; but, when occupations, privileges, or property transfers are to be taxed, there is no common ground upon which they can meet, no standard by which their relative value or worth can be measured or compared, and hence uniformity of taxation, or even equality of taxation, as applied to excise taxes, must necessarily mean taxation which does not discriminate, but which operates alike on all persons similarly situated. In other words, proper classification may be made, and the different rate applied to each class."

The state of Minnesota has a similar inheritance tax law with classes based on relationship, and also subdivided into classes based on the progressive values of the estates inherited. In State ex rel. Foot v. Bazille, 97 Minn. 11, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 732, 106 N. W. 93, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1056, the supreme court of Minnesota adopted the reasoning of the Illinois supreme court in the United States in the Magoun Case, construing the Illinois statute, and holding that where there is equality between the classes established by an inheritance tax law, that the constitutional requirements of equality and uniformity are satisfied.

The inheritance law of Ohio has had a history somewhat analogous to that of Minnesota and Wisconsin,—first held unconstitutional, afterwards held valid. In State ex rel. Taylor v. Guilbert, 70 Ohio St. 229, 71 N. E. 636, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 25, the supreme court held that an excise inheritance tax which operates uniformly throughout the state, and operates equally upon all persons standing in the same category, does not deprive any of the equal protection of the law.

This court in the case of Re Watson, 17 S. D. 486, 97 N. W. 463, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 321, has passed upon the precise question. In that case this court said: "The clause, 'and all taxation shall be equal and uniform,' found in the Bill of Rights, cannot be ignored. . . . What is meant by 'equality and uniformity' in this connection? The legislature is not commanded to tax all occupations. To levy the same amount of tax on each trade, occupation, or business in the state would be manifestly impracticable and unjust. No more effectual method of defeating the real purpose of the rule could be devised. Every person, natural and artificial, whether possessing property or not, enjoys the protection of the government, and should contribute to its support. To determine the extent of contribution in each individual case, with equality and uniformity, is the design of every wise and just system of taxation. But so long as no two persons in the state are surrounded by precisely the same circumstances, and possessed of precisely the same ability to bear the burdens of taxation, no absolutely equal or just system of collecting revenues will be evolved. 'Perfectly equal taxation,' it has been said, 'will remain an unattainable good so long as laws and government and men are imperfect.' . . . Perfect equality is not possible. So, we construe the clause requiring all taxation to be equal and uniform as meaning, with reference to taxes on occupations, that the burden imposed shall fall alike on all persons who are in substantially the same situation,—a rule generally recognized, even in the absence of an express constitutional requirement as to uniformity."

Decisions of similar effect exist in many other states. See 1 Cooley, Taxn. pp. 72, 73; Tiedeman, Pol. Power, p. 282; People ex rel. Farrington v. Mensching, 187 N. Y. 8, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 625, 79 N. E. 884; State v. Applegarth, 81 Md. 293, 28 L.R.A. 812, 31 Atl. 961; Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 4 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747; Campbell v. California, 200 U. S. 87, 50 L. ed. 382, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 182; Union Trust Co. v. Wayne Probate Judge, 125 Mich. 487, 84 N. W. 1101; Nettleton's Appeal, 76 Conn. 235, 56 Atl. 565; Re Magnes, 32 Colo. 527, 77 Pac. 853; State v. Alston, 94 Tenn. 674, 28 L.R.A. 178, 30 S. W. 750; Crawford v. Linn County, 11 Or. 482, 5 Pac. 738. From all these decisions, although, with the exception of Re Watson and Nunnemacher v. State, construing Constitutions differing from ours, but still construing the question of the meaning of the words "equality and uniformity" in connection with excise taxation, we are compelled and constrained to gather therefrom that the constitutional rule of equality and uniformity is satisfied with reference to inheritance and excise laws, when there is equality and uniformity between each and every individual within or constituting any particular specified class; that there is equality and uniformity within the classes created by the law is all that is required; otherwise, under any other construction, it would be impossible to have any classified inheritance law at all based on the progressive value of the inheritance, under the Constitution of this 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) state, as it would be an utter impossibility to classify any such law without inequality and lack of uniformity as between the different classes. The very idea of classification comprehends inequality and lack of uniformity. No matter what the form or basis of the classification, it would still logically be subject to the same objection as to inequality and lack of uniformity. There is no constitutional provision in this state expressly prohibiting a progressive or graduated inheritance law, or prohibiting classification with reference thereto. By the use of the word "duty" in § 17 of the Bill of Rights, an excise law is comprehended, if consented to by the people through the legislature, and that the same shall be equal and uniform in its operation, but this equality and uniformity is satisfied by equality and uniformity within each class specified by the legislature. Such is the direct holding in Re Watson and in the Nunnemacher Case. In the latter case the court said that the clause "the rule of taxation shall be uniform," if applicable to excise taxation at all, means no more than the general equality clause in the Constitution, or the equal protection of the law guaranteed by the 14th Amendment, and hence we conclude that § 17, art. 6, of our Bill of Rights, is no broader in scope and effect as to equality and uniformity as applied to excise taxation, than is the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, and that the decisions on that subject applicable to one are applicable to the other. It is clear from all these decisions that the legislature may make any proper classification of recipients of inherited estates, for the purposes of such taxation, that it chooses, so long as there is equality and uniformity between those within and constituting each separate class. It also necessarily follows that, if the legislature has the right to classify on some proper recognized basis, it is not within the judicial province of the courts to say what such classification shall be, so long as the legislature is within the limits of such proper basis. In other words, the courts will not "race opinions" with the legislature as to which might create the better law. It seems to be everywhere conceded that relationship constitutes a proper basis for such classification. It is contended that the subclassification of strangers under the statute in question, whereby those receiving $10,000 and less pay 4 per cent of the value of the estate received, and those receiving over $10,000, and not exceeding $20,000, pay 6 per cent, and those receiving over $20,000, and not exceeding $50,000, pay 8 per cent, and those receiving over $50,000 pay 10 per cent, is an arbitrary and unreasonable classification, without any reasonable justification therefor. Every individual receiving an estate falling in any one of these four classes would pay precisely the same rate and amount of tax on an estate of like value, so that the burden would fall alike on all similarly situated. This seems to be the test of the rule as to equality and uniformity of classification. It seems also to be generally held that the power to classify the recipients of inherited estates is subject to the rule that the classification must not be so purely arbitrary and unnatural as to have no reason to justify it; that is, it must be devoid of all reasonable grounds on which to rest in order to invalidate such classification. Re Watson, supra; Re Keeney, 194 N. Y. 281, 87 N. E. 428; People ex rel. Farrington v. Mensching, 187 N. Y. 8, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 625, 79 N. E. 884, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 101. The basis of the classification of this portion of the statute in question, as will be observed, is purely and solely the progressive rate in amount of the value of the estate inherited. In Knowlton v. Moore, the Supreme Court of the United States, in construing the inheritance provision of the Spanish-American War tax of 1898, speaking through Mr. Justice White, said: "Lastly, it is urged that the progressive rate feature of the statute is so repugnant to fundamental principles of equality and justice that the law should be held to be void, even although it transgresses no express limitation in the Constitution. Without intimating any opinion as to the existence of a right in the courts to exercise the power which is thus invoked, it is apparent that the argument as to the enormity of the tax is without merit. It was disposed of in Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 293, 42 L. ed. 1037, 1042, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594. The review which we have made exhibits the fact that taxes imposed with reference to the ability of the person upon whom the burden is placed to bear the same have been levied from the foundation of the government. So, also, some authoritative thinkers and a number of economic writers contend that a progressive tax is more just and equal than a proportional one. In the absence of constitutional limitation, the question whether it is or is not is legislative, and not judicial. The grave consequences which it is asserted must arise in the future, if the right to levy a progressive tax be recognized, involves in its ultimate aspect the mere assertion that free and representative government is a failure, and that the grossest abuses of power are foreshadowed unless the courts usurp a purely legislative function. If a case should ever arise where an arbitrary and confiscatory exaction is imposed, bearing the guise of a progressive or any other form of tax, it will be time enough to consider whether the judicial power can afford a remedy by applying inherent and fundamental principles for the protection of the individual, even though there be no express authority in the Constitution to do so. That the law which we have construed affords no ground for the contention that the tax imposed is arbitrary and confiscatory is obvious." It will be observed from this quotation that the decision in the Magoun Case is approved, which construes the Illinois statute where the progressive rate is classified on the same basis and by the same methods as the law of this state. Again, in this connection, we emphasize the statement that there is no constitutional provision in South Dakota, expressly or otherwise, prohibiting such classification; that § 17 of our Bill of Rights means substantially the same thing, and has no broader scope and effect than the 14th Amendment. In the Magoun Case the appellant claimed that "the progression is likewise unnecessarily arbitrary, if we take the view that the tax is levied on the amount received. . . . Under such an assumption, those taking the larger amounts are required to pay a larger rate on the same sums upon which those taking smaller sums pay a smaller rate; that is to say, one who receives a legacy of $10,000 pays 3 per cent, or $300, thus receiving $9,700 net, while one receiving a legacy of $10,001 pays 4 per cent on the whole amount, or $400.04, thus receiving $9,600.96, $99.04 less than the one whose legacy was actually $1 less valuable."

This is precisely the claim made on behalf of the appellant in the case at bar. But the unsoundness and fallacy of this claim is fully exposed in this case. Speaking through Mr. Justice McKenna, the court said: "The reasoning of appellant is based on the view that the tax is one on property, instead of one on the succession, as held by the supreme court of the state. Being on the succession, the court further held, as we have seen, that the latter is to be regarded as new property, and the $20,000 and other property not taxed are not therefore exemptions. In this view the Illinois court is in harmony with the majority of other courts of the country. We concur in the reasoning. It is true that the amount of the exemption is greater in the Illinois law than in any other, but the right to exempt cannot depend on that. Whether it shall be $20,000 as in Illinois law, or $10,000 as in that of Massachusetts, or other amounts as in other laws, must depend upon the judgment of the legislature of each state, and cannot be subject to judicial review. If such review could ascertain the factors of judgment, and could apply them with indisputable wisdom to the different conditions existing, it would be outside of its province to do so. That manifestly is a legislative, not a judicial, function. The first and second classes, therefore, of the statute, depend on substantial distinctions, and their classifications are not arbitrary. Nor do the exemptions of the statute render its operation unequal within the meaning of the 14th Amendment. 'The right to make exemptions is involved in the right to select the subjects of taxation, and apportion the public burdens among them, and must consequently be understood to exist in the lawmaking power, wherever it has not in terms been taken away. To some extent it must exist always; for the selection of subjects of taxation is of itself an exemption of what is not selected.' . . . The provisions of the statute in regard to the tax on legacies to strangers to the blood of an intestate need further comment. . .

. There are four classes created, and manifestly there is equality between the members of each class. Inequality is only found by comparing the members of one class with those of another. It is illustrated by appellant as follows: One who receives a legacy of $10,000 pays 3 per cent, or $300, thus receiving $9,700 net, while one receiving a legacy of $10,001 pays 4 per cent on the whole amount, or $400.04, thus receiving $9,600.96, or $99.04 less than the one whose legacy was actually $1 less valuable. . . . These, however, are conceded to be extreme illustrations, and we think, therefore, that they furnish no test of the practical operation of the classification. When the legacies differ in substantial extent, if the rate increases, the benefit increases to greater degree. If there is unsoundness, it must be in the classification. The members of each class are treated alike; that is to say, all who inherit $10,000 are treated alike; all who inherit any other sum are treated alike. There is equality, therefore, within the classes. If there is inequality, it must be because the members of a class are arbitrarily made such and burdened as such upon no distinctions justifying it. This is claimed. It is said that the tax is not in proportion to the amount, but varies with the amounts arbitrarily fixed, and hence that an inheritance of $10,000 or less pays 3 per cent, and that one over $10,000 pays not 3 per cent on $10,000 and an increased percentage on the excess over $10,000, but an increased percentage on the $10,000 as well as on the excess. And it is said, as we have seen, that in consequence one who is given a legacy of $10,001, by the deduction of the tax, receives $99.04 less than one who is given a legacy of $10,000. But neither case can be said to be contrary to the rule of equality of the 14th Amendment. That rule does not require, as we have seen, exact equality of taxation. It only requires that the law imposing it shall operate on all alike under the same circumstances. The tax is not on money; it is on the right to inherit, and hence a condition of inheritance, and it may be graded according to the value of that inheritance. The condition is not arbitrary because it is determined by that value. It is not unequal in operation because it does not levy the same percentage on every dollar; does not fail to treat 'all alike under like circumstances and conditions, both in the privilege conferred and the liabilities imposed.' The jurisdiction of courts is fixed by amounts. The right to appeal is. As was said at bar, the Congress of the United States has classified the right of suitors to come into the United States courts by amounts. Regarding these alone, there is the same inequality that is urged against classification of the Illinois law. All license laws and all specific taxes have in them an element of inequality. Nevertheless, they are universally imposed, and their illegality has never been questioned. We think the classification of the Illinois law was in the power of the legislature to make, and the decree of the circuit court is affirmed."

In the Nunnenmacher Case, the supreme court of Wisconsin, realizing that the same basic principle of classification was involved in the construction of the Wisconsin statute as in the Illinois, said: "And that the clause, 'the rule of taxation shall be uniform,' if applicable to excise taxation at all, means no more than the general equality clause of the Constitution, or 'the equal protection of the laws' guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. Taxation of privileges and occupations manifestly cannot be uniform in the sense in which property taxation may be uniform. Property may be all reduced to its money value, and a uniform rate levied upon it all; but, when occupations, privileges, or property transfers are to be taxed, there is no common ground upon which they can meet, no standard by which their relative value or worth can be measured or compared, and hence uniformity of taxation, or even equality of taxation, as applied to excise taxes, must necessarily mean taxation which does not discriminate, but which operates alike on all persons similarly situated. In other words, proper classification may be made, and a different rate applied to each class. . . . These considerations bring us to the third point of the argument, and, in fact, partly answer it, namely, the objection that the tax here in question violates the rule of uniformity, that rule, as applied to excise taxation, meaning simply that there shall be no unjust discrimination. The sole remaining question under this contention is whether the present law violates the true principles of classification. It is said in the Black Case, 113 Wis. 205, 90 Am. St. Rep. 853, 89 N. W. 522, that 'classification between lineals and collateral relatives and strangers does not violate the rule of uniformity, nor the principle of equal protection of the laws, and that reasonable exemption of small estates also may be allowed without violating uniformity.' While the admissions made by counsel in the Black Case tend to deprive this expression of weight as an authority, the arguments in the present case, aided by our own investigations, have convinced us that the conclusions are correct, and sanctioned by the great weight of authority. In order to justify classification, there must, of course, be substantial and real differences of situation, calling for, or reasonably suggesting, the necessity for different treatment. That a wife or daughter deprived by death of the care and support of her natural protector stands in substantially a different position from a collateral relative, and that her situation justifies different treatment, goes almost without saying, and that a collateral relative stands in a substantially different position from a mere stranger seems reasonably clear, although in less degree. The authorities are quite unanimous in justifying substantially the classification which is embodied in the law, and the Supreme Court of the United States has approved of it in numerous decisions, notable among which is Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank. . . . The progressive feature of the act involves greater difficulty. By this feature increased rates of taxation are imposed as the amount of the bequest increases. Thus, if one legatee receives $25,000, and another in the same degree of kinship receives $50,000, while they will both pay the same rate on $25,000, the second legatee will pay a higher rate on his second $25,000. It is said that this is rank discrimination, that there is no difference in situation justifying a difference in classification, but that classification of persons cannot be based on mere differences in ability to pay. If this question were an original one, it would seem serious. It is somewhat persuasive to know that railroad license taxes have been levied upon the progressive plan, increasing as the earnings per mile increase, since 1876 without question, and that street railroads and electric lighting companies are now subject to a like progressive rate of taxation. . . . This fact would not, of 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

course, be conclusive. The question has, however, been met in other courts, and it has been held with substantial uniformity that the progressive feature does not violate the general guaranties of equality and the equal protection of the laws contained in the various state Constitutions and in the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. . . . The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States as to the force of the 14th Amendment is necessarily conclusive, and, as the general equality guaranties of our own Constitution are substantially the equivalent of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment, we are content to follow the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, and hold that the progressive feature does not violate the Constitution."

In the case Re Fox, the supreme court of Michigan upholds the classification based on the progressive amounts of the value of the inherited estate, under a statute precisely similar in principle to the Illinois and South Dakota enactments, and in this case the court said: "This statute creates two main classes; the first being composed of lineal heirs and near relatives of the testator or intestate, and the second of distant relatives and strangers. The former is again divided into two subclasses dependent upon the amount of the estate received. Classifications based upon relationship and also upon the amount transferred have been sustained in the Federal courts." In this case the decision in the Magoun Case is quoted and approved and adopted, after a full review of the decisions apparently holding otherwise.

In the case of State ex rel. Foot v. Bazille, 97 Minn. 11, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 732, 106 N. W. 93, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1056, the supreme court of Minnesota, by Brown, J., in construing substantially a like statute, said: "The history of taxation is in harmony with all human affairs, one of evolution. Its progress from the earliest times to the present day is one of constant development, in keeping with the advancing intelligence of man, unrolling step by step, with changing economic and social conditions, tardily, however, new methods and means of subjecting untaxed property to the tax rolls. . . . But in more recent times new species of property, 'new in kind, unsubstantial in character, vast in extent, enormous in value,' have, owing to industrial growth and commercial enterprise, come rapidly into existence, . . . and methods and means of reaching and subjecting the same to its share of the public burdens have developed, and been put into practical operation by the legislatures and courts of this country. Ability or faculty to pay has come to be the test in determining the justness of taxation. It is 'not only the ideal basis of taxation, but the goal towards which society is steadily working. It lies instinctively and unconsciously at the bottom of all of our endeavors at reform.' . . . The equity and fairness of this theory in its broadest sense, when we reflect upon the vast fortunes accumulated as the result of . . . facilities not possessed by people in general, is apparent and obvious. It works no injustice or harm to those thus fortunately situated, does not injuriously affect productive or industrial agencies, and relieves in a measure those with lesser opportunities, and those to whom taxation is always an extreme burden. This theory does not, however, harmonize well with a strict application of the fundamental mandate of equality, as applied more particularly to the proportional system of taxation in force in this and other states. We mean by 'proportional system, a tax at a fixed and uniform rate, in proportion to the amount of taxable property, based upon a cash valuation; and legislatures and courts have been not a little embarrassed in attempts to apply it. But an examination of the books discloses that the equality mandate has been expanded and made to yield, from time to time, to new and advancing social and economic conditions. The general principle is retained, but is applied with less rigor and strictness. . . . The inheritance tax has been in existence for years, and, although not generally in force in the states of this country until recent times, the general principle has been practised in European countries for ages, and for a number of years in some of the states of the Union. It is variously termed an 'inheritance tax,' 'succession tax,' 'legacy tax,' and 'probate duties;' but, whatever it may be termed, it is not a tax upon property, but upon the right to succession thereto. . . . 'The term "progressive taxation" or "graduated tax" is also used in another way. If a different rate is levied on different kinds (not different amounts) of property or income, we speak not of a graduation, but of a differentiation, of the tax. But if different rates are levied on inheritances or bequests according to the degree of relationship of the heir or successor, the tax is sometimes called a graduated or progressive tax. In ordinary cases "progressive" denotes a changed rate for altered amounts.' Authority to classify persons and property for the purpose of taxation is well settled. When based upon some reasonable and practical rule, founded on such substantial difference of situation or circumstances as to reasonably suggest the propriety of a distinction, or based upon some rule of public policy, the courts sustain various forms of classification. . . . The subject is one resting in the discretion of the legislature, restricted only by the rule of reasonableness and propriety. . . . Graduated or progressive taxation is intimately associated with that of classification, and perhaps amounts, substantially, to the same thing. The progressive rule is applied to the income tax, which in principle is identical with the inheritance tax; the only difference being that the income tax is one upon property, while the inheritance tax is upon the right of succession. It is applied in different forms not materially dissimilar to that fixed by the statute under consideration, in all states and countries where the income or inheritance tax is in force, the amount of the income or inheritance being made the basis for a different rate of taxation. The rule applied in our sister states and by the Federal court sustains the statute under discussion, whether it be termed a classified or a progressive tax. It is in a sense arbitrary, but not so unreasonable or unfair as to justify interference by the courts. The statutes of the state of Illinois provide an inheritance tax substantially like our own, classifying inheritances and devises by amounts, the rate of tax imposed increasing as the amount of inheritance increases. That statute was sustained by the supreme court of that state in the case of Kochersperger v. Drake, 167 Ill. 122, 41 L.R.A. 446, 47 N. E. 321, . . . The Illinois statute was under consideration in the Supreme Court of the United States in Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 288, 42 L. ed. 1040, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594, where the subject was carefully gone over and the classification sustained." In this connection we also call attention to the exhaustive and comprehensive note to this decision commencing on page 732, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.), the first paragraph of which is as follows: "Classification of inheritances or gifts for purposes of succession tax on basis of amount.—That a progressive tax upon inheritances is now generally upheld by the courts of this country demonstrates that the judges are no longer wedded to the old theory that the only equality and uniformity possible in taxation must be based upon mathematical proportions, demanding that the same rate of taxation be applied to all persons alike, regardless of the ability to pay, and regardless, too, of the fact that in one case a proportional rate would take from one man the necessary means of subsistence, and from another merely the means to purchase unnecessary luxuries. In the days when the comparatively insignificant wealth of the county was more evenly distributed, and the richest citizen had but little more than his poorer fellows, such principles were undoubtedly just and fair; but to-day, when fortunes exist whose immensity was not dreamed of by the founders of the Republic, fortunes which owe their existence not solely to the genius or unprincipled greed of their owners, but more especially to the unbounded resources of the country, and in many cases to the partiality of the laws, and which would have no existence whatever without the government and population of America, a new principle of equality, or a new construction of the old principle, becomes absolutely necessary. The truth of this, the legislatures and courts of this country have quite generally recognized, and, early following the teachings of the more advanced economic writers, have come to hold that the fundamental principle of equality, at least in matters of inheritance taxation, is not to be determined by a proportional rate of taxation. It is to be observed in this connection that both legislatures and courts have generally acted upon the theory that inheritance taxes are laid, not upon property, but upon the right to succeed to property; in other words, are mere duties in the nature of excise taxes, and are not subject to the same tests with respect to uniformity and equality as property taxes."

It will serve no useful purpose to further multiply authorities. In all the cases cited are mentioned many other and abundant additional authorities sustaining the principle that a classification based on the increasing and progressing amount of the estate inherited is not an arbitrary, unnatural, or unreasonable basis for such classification. The overwhelming weight of recent authority is in favor of the validity of the classification contained in our statute. The argument that one receiving an inheritance of $10,000 would pay a tax of $396, and that one receiving an inheritance of $10,001 would pay a tax of $594.06, thereby making the additional $1 inherited pay an increased tax of $198.06, is unsound and opposed by the weight of recent authority for two reasons: First. This character of argument is only applicable to a property or proportional tax, and has no application to a classified progressive inheritance tax. The distinction between a property tax as such and an excise tax as such is wholly lost sight of in the use of this illustration. This character of reasoning applies only to the value of a dollar as property, and not as a dividing point between two or more classes of a progressive inheritance or excise tax. As is said in the Nunnemacher

Case, there is no common ground on which this distinction between a property and an excise tax can meet. Second. The comparison afforded by this illustration is made between those within different, instead of between those within the same class, thus falling wholly without the established rule that comparison should only be made between those within the same class. This precise illustration and argument has been directly answered and expressly repudiated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Magoun Case; by the supreme court of Wisconsin in the Nunnemacher Case; by the supreme court of Michigan in the Fox Case; by the supreme court of Minnesota in the Bazille Case; and by the supreme court of Illinois in the Drake Case. It has been suggested that in the Magoun Case the Federal court only followed the decision of the state court in construing a state Constitution, and did not pass on the question as an original proposition before the Federal court, but considered itself bound by the state decision, and is not therefore to be considered as an authority; but this certainly must be a misapprehension, as a reading of the case will justify no such inference. While the Federal "concurs in the reasoning" of the state court, yet it goes far beyond the scope of the state decision in its own originality, and based its decision on the 14th Amendment, and it was recognized as an original authoritative decision of the Federal court in Knowlton v. Moore. While our statute may differ from others as to rate or percentage of taxation, may differ as to whether the increased rate is to be computed on an amount within a class between certain fixed limits, which includes all lower classes if any, or on the amount within a class which excludes the amount of prior classes, may differ as to the amount of the exemption,—still the principle involved as to equality and uniformity, the principle involved as to the arbitrariness and unreasonableness of the classification, the principle involved as to discriminations between different classes, is just the same under all these statutes, and under all these decisions cited, whether under a state Constitution or under the 14th Amendment, or whether under a state or Federal enactment. It is also perfectly clear that the question of choice whether an exemption shall be $10,000 or $20,000 or some other amount, whether the rate or percentage of taxation shall be two, four, or some other amount, whether the increased rate of percentage from a lower to a higher class shall be computed on the amount of a class which includes or excludes the amount of prior classes, is not subject to judicial review, and is solely a subject within the legislative function, so long as the rules of "equality and uniformity" and "arbitrary" classification have not been violated. A classification based on the whole of an increasing amount between fixed limits, and which includes the amount of preceding classes, such as contained in the Illinois and South Dakota statutes, is logically, legally, and constitutionally in precisely the same category as the classification in Wisconsin, based on the net increased amount of a higher over a lower class. Both classes result in permissible discriminations and inequalities as between different classes, the only difference being in that the Illinois and South Dakota statutes result in a shade more inequality than does the Wisconsin; but nevertheless the Illinois and South Dakota classification is just as fairly and squarely, as a matter of legal and logical principle, within the "equality and uniformity" rule as to all persons similarly situated within any one of the specified classes, just as fully and fairly within the "progressive amount" rule as to arbitrary classification, as is the Wisconsin classification. This is evidently the reason why in the Nunnemacher Case the Wisconsin court said that the Wisconsin statute was substantially the same as that of Illinois, and why the Minnesota court in the Bazille Case also said that the Minnesota statute was substantially the same as that of Illinois.

Similar discriminations, inequalities, and lack of uniformity exist when comparison is made between different classes based purely on relationship; still these classes are recognized to be fairly within the "equality and uniformity" rule, as applied to excise taxation. The South Dakota statute, being squarely within both the rules as to "equality and uniformity," and as to the classification based on "progressive amount" of the inherited estate, is valid, and should be sustained.

It is contended that the inheritance law of this state is defective, in that no method by which the provisions thereof may be enforced is provided. Section 1 of the act clearly and expressly creates a liability on the part of the recipients of such inherited estates to pay the amount of any such tax to the county treasurer for the use of the state. There is no reason why the county treasurer might not maintain an ordinary action based upon the liability thus created to pay, against the receivers of any such inherited estates, to recover for the use of the state the tax under this statute, whenever there is a refusal to pay the same. The statutory liability to pay is just as strong in binding force and effect as if it were contractual.

We are of the opinion that the former decision of this court should be reversed, and that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

Whiting, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the conclusion reached by my colleague in his most able opinion, as I see no reason to change my views as expressed in the former opinion of this court. By reference to such opinion, it will be seen that there is no difference of views regarding the right of the legislature to enact laws taxing inheritances, nor the right to classify those receiving transmissions of property, both upon basis of kinship with deceased and upon the value of the property transmitted; neither is there any conflict upon the proposition that mere inequalities arising from the workings of the law do not render same void. As noted in such former opinion, there are several states that have enacted laws like the one at bar, and their courts have sustained such laws. There are other states that have enacted laws such as was held in such former opinion would be valid under our Constitution, and their courts have sustained the same. My colleague has quoted from the courts of all these states in support of the classification adopted by our legislature. With such decisions I take no issue so far as they go only to the sustaining of the classification, and giving the grounds upon which such classifications are held constitutional. It is only when it comes to fixing the rates of taxation for the several classes, classified as to value of property transmitted, that in my opinion the reasoning of some of the courts is unsound, and upon this feature of the law I feel justified in expressing my views more fully than before, fearing that one of the grounds for my conclusions heretofore expressed may not have been fully understood.

Regardless of other questions discussed in the former opinion of this court, we would call attention again to the question asked therein: "Must our statute in its application result in inequalities not consistent with any reason or theory upon which progression is allowable?" It would seem to me that the following propositions are too axiomatic to admit of dispute: While inequalities incident to proper classification do not render a tax law unconstitutional on the ground of lack of uniformity, yet all inequalities resulting from features of the law not consistent with the grounds for such classification render the law unconstitutional. When a classification is made for purposes of taxation, the reasons which rendered such classification constitutional cannot be disregarded when it comes to fixing the bases and rates of taxation among the several classes. It seems to be the universal view of all courts upholding classification based on value of property transmitted, that it finds its justification from one or both of two reasons:

(1) That the person receiving the larger sum is better able to pay the tax; (2) that, inasmuch as large aggregations of wealth are against public policy, the privilege of receiving the larger estates is much greater in proportion to the value thereof than the privilege of receiving the smaller estate, and therefore the transmission of a large estate should be taxed more in proportion than the transmission of a smaller estate. The respondent concedes that these are the bases upon which classification is justified. But the respondent contends (and, if we read aright the views of the majority of the court, my colleagues concur therein) that, when once there has been a classification constitutional in nature, then, in fixing the rate of taxation within a class and the basis for same, no regard need be paid to the rate and basis within any other class. With this contention we cannot agree, and herein lies the reason for our different conclusions. If respondent is correct, although the classification is based upon the theory that the recipient of the larger estate is able to pay a greater tax rate, or else upon the theory that the transmission of the large estate is more against public policy, or upon both, yet it would be perfectly constitutional, after having made a proper classification, to disregard the grounds for such classification, and to have taxed the transmission of the smaller estate at a greater rate than the transmission of the larger, or even to vary the rates making the rate first greater and then smaller, and then greater and smaller again, as between the several classes. To illustrate again, if respondent's contention is right, though it is conceded that a classification based upon difference in kinship is constitutional, for the reason that the instincts of natural justice teach us that to receive from one distantly or not at all related is a greater privilege than to receive from one nearer related, yet, after making a classification founded on degrees of kinship, the legislature could disregard the grounds therefor, and tax transmissions to near relatives at a greater rate than to strangers. It will not do to answer such propositions by saying that the legislature would never attempt it. The question is what we are holding that it would be constitutional for them to do. It is constitutional on grounds of public policy for public carriers to classify as between whites and blacks and provide separate carriages for each, but, though such classification is lawful, any attempt to provide better accommodations for one than the other would be unlawful, because not founded upon the reason upon which such classification is allowed. To illustrate, further, it might be lawful for a public carrier to provide a separate carriage for persons afflicted with a contagious disease, and refuse admission thereto to all other persons; but, while a public carrier may provide a separate carriage for those who smoke, it could not exclude nonsmokers therefrom. The act of the carrier in each case would have to conform to the reasons upon which the classification was based.

Let us apply similar reasoning to the law before us, and consider the grounds lying at the foundation of the classification found in such law. Let us suppose that this law provided also for the taxation of successive transmissions received by one person at different times and from different sources, so that a person receiving $10,000 to-day from A's estate and $10,000 next year from B's estate would be placed in the same class, and such transmissions taxed according to the same rule, as one who received in one lump sum $20,000 from C's estate. A law that would provide that, upon the receipt of more than one transmission, the rates and bases for taxation should be the same as if all were received at once, certainly would be constitutional so far as that feature was concerned. In the case of the man receiving two $10,000 transmissions, would it be considered constitutional to impose upon him upon receipt of the second $10,000, not only the increased tax on the second $10,000, but also compel him to pay an additional tax on the transmission received a year before? It seems to me not. It is the transmission and receipt of the second $10,000 that renders the party more able to pay the increased rate. It is the transmission and receipt of the second $10,000 that is more against public policy, and there exists no reason or grounds upon which classification can be based that is consistent with the requirement of a payment of an additional tax on the first $10,000, because of the receipt of the second $10,000; but both of the grounds upon which such classification is based fully justify an increased rate upon the second $10,000. Yet there are absolutely no grounds for distinction between the supposed case and law, and the receipt by a man under our law of $20,000. It is the receipt of the second $10,000 that justifies, under the grounds which lie as the basis of the classification, the imposition of the higher rate, and there is absolutely no reason consistent with the grounds or basis of classification that justifies the increase of the rate upon the first $10,000 simply because of the receipt of the additional sums. To me it seems clear that the legislature has made a constitutional classification, and then rendered the law unconstitutional by making an unconstitutional distinction in fixing the bases of taxation as between the different classes, the same as an unconstitutional distinction allowed a public carrier as between different races might render a law unconstitutional which contained a perfectly constitutional classification of such races; the classification being based upon a ground which did not justify the distinction attempted to be made between the classes.

It is complained that the illustrations given in the former opinion of this court are extreme illustrations. This is certainly begging the issue. These illustrations show clearly to what the principle contended for by respondent might lead, not only when applied to inheritance taxes, but when applied to the innumerable other matters concerning which classifications may be legally made. We should not depart from the principle that when classification is made for a certain purpose, the grounds which rendered the classification legal must not be disregarded in effecting the purpose of the law.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

RE ESTATE OF PEDER G. STIXRUD,
Deceased.

JOHAN E. STIXRUD et al., Appts.,
v.

STATE OF WASHINGTON, by State Board of Tax Commissioners, Resp't.

(58 Wash. 339, 109 Pac. 343.)

Inheritance tax — bequest to foreigner — effect of treaty.

1. A provision of a treaty that the subjects of the contracting parties in the respective states may freely dispose of their goods and effects by testament, and that the heirs shall receive the succession without having occasion to take out letters of naturalization, will prevent a state from imposing any higher inheritance tax upon property devised or bequeathed by one of its citizens to a citizen of the foreign state than it imposes in case of devises or bequests to its own citizens of the same degree of relationship to the testator under similar circumstances, and it is immaterial that the treaty also provides that the states shall be at liberty to make respecting this matter such laws as they think proper.

Will — treaty provision — effect on real estate.

2. Real property is included in a provision of a treaty giving a naturalized citizen a right to give by testament his goods and effects in favor of such parties as he thinks proper.

Treaty — construction — definition of heirs.

3. The word "heirs" in a treaty may be construed to mean not only those who take by operation of law, but also those who are called to the succession by act of the property owner, where the civil law prevails within the territory of one of the parties to the transaction.

(Fullerton and Gose, J.J., dissent.)

(May 14, 1910.)

APPEAL by Johan E. Stixrud et al. from an order of the Superior Court for Thurston County declaring that portion of the estate of Peder G. Stixrud, deceased which passed under his will to Johan E. Stixrud and Petronella Stixrud, subject to an inheritance tax. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. S. Langland and Bausman & Kelleher, for appellants:

The treaty exempts the devisees and the estate from paying any more or other inheritance tax than is paid by a resident of this state.

Note. — Validity of discrimination against aliens by inheritance tax law as affected by treaty with foreign government.

A state tax levied on the succession by foreign heirs, legatees, or donees to property of a deceased person is inoperative as to an alien who, by treaty between his country and the United States, is entitled to the same right of possessing and disposing of property as the citizens of the United States themselves. In Prevost v. Greneaux, 19 How. 1, 15 L. ed. 572, it was held that a vested right to a succession tax under the laws of Louisiana of 1848, imposing a tax upon all property inherited by aliens, was not affected by the subsequent treaty of 1853 between France and the United States, which provided that French citizens should not be subjected to taxes on inheritances different from those imposed on citizens of the United States.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Peder G. Stixrud, a naturalized citizen of the United States and a resident of this state, died at Olympia in January, 1908. He left a will by which he devised all of his property, both real and personal, to his brother and sister, Johan E. Stixrud and Petronella Stixrud, who were then residents and citizens of Norway. In February, 1908, letters of administration with the will annexed were granted upon the estate of Peder G. Stixrud, and, upon the settlement of the estate, it was determined by the superior court for Thurston county that the portion of the estate passing to the devisees under the will, after payment of debts and expenses of administration, was subject to an inheritance tax of 25 per cent. An order was entered accordingly, directing payment of such inheritance tax computed at this rate. From this order the devisees Johan E. Stixrud and Petronella Stixrud, have appealed.

The law fixing the amount of the inheritance tax upon property passing by will or inheritance is § 2, Laws 1907, p. 500 (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 9183), and, so far as necessary for us to notice, is as follows: "The inheritance tax shall be and is to be levied on all estates subject to the operation of this chapter, on all sums above the first $10,000, where the same shall pass to or for the use of the father, mother, husband, wife, lineal descendant, adopted child, or the lineal descendant of an adopted child, one (1) per centum. On all sums not exceeding the first $50,000 of 3 per centum, where such estate passes to collateral heirs, to and including the third degree of relationship; . . . Provided, that on all sums passing to or for the benefit of collateral relatives or strangers of the blood, who are aliens not residing in the United States, a tax of 25 per centum shall be levied and collected." Appellants being collateral heirs of the deceased within the third degree of relationship, it is plain that the inheritance tax upon the property they take under this will would only be 3 per cent, since the amount thereof is less than $50,000, unless the rate of the tax is controlled by the proviso fixing the rate at 25 per cent where property passes to collateral relatives, who are aliens not residing in the United States.

Learned counsel for appellants contend that the property left to them by their deceased brother is liable to pay an inheritance tax of only 3 per cent, the same as if they were not aliens residing out of the United States at the time of their brother's death, by virtue of article 6 of the treaty of amity and commerce of 1783 as revived by article 17 of the treaty of commerce of navigation of 1827, still existing between Norway and Sweden and the United States, which provides: "The subjects of the contracting parties in the respective states may freely dispose of their goods and effects, either by testament, donation, or otherwise, in favor of such persons as they think proper, and their heirs, in whatever place they shall reside, shall receive the succession, even ab intestato, either in person or by their attorney, without having occasion to take out letters of naturalization. These inheritances, as well as the capitals and effects which the subjects of the two parties in changing their dwelling shall be desirous of removing from the place of their abode, shall be exempt from all duty called droit de detraction on the part of the government of the two states respectively. But it is at the same time agreed that nothing contained in this article shall in any manner derogate from the ordinances published in Sweden against emigrations, or which may hereafter be published, which shall remain in full force and vigor. The United States on their part, or any of them, shall be at liberty to make respecting this matter such laws as they think proper." 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. pp. 828, 835 [8 Stat. at L. 60, 79]. By the second clause of article 6 of the Constitution of the United States it is declared: "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." It has become the settled law of this country that, when a law of a state comes in conflict with the provisions of a treaty entered into by the United States with a foreign country, relating to a subject-matter within the treaty-making power, such law must give way, and its application to the subject-matter covered by the treaty held in abeyance during the existence of the treaty. In Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483, 490, 25 L. ed. 628, 630, Justice Swayne, speaking for the court, said: "It must always be borne in mind that the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are as much a part of the law of every state as its own local laws and Constitution. This is a fundamental principle in our system of complex national polity. See also Shanks v. Dupont, 3 Pet. 242, 7 L. ed. 666; Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253, 7 L. ed. 415; The Cherokee Tobacco (Boudinot v. United States), 11 Wall. 616, 20 L. ed. 227; Mr. Pinkney's Speech, 3 Elliot, Constitutional Debates, 231; People ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Gerke, 5 Cal. 381." It is equally well settled that the matter of removing the disability of aliens, in order that they may have the same rights as citizens to acquire and hold property in the states of the Union, is a proper subject of treaty regulation. Justice Field, in speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258, 266, 33 L. ed. 642, 644, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 295, 296, said: "That the treaty power of the United States extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our government and the governments of other nations is clear. It is also clear that the protection which should be afforded to the citizens of one country owning property in another, and the manner in which that property may be transferred, devised, or inherited, are fitting subjects for such negotiation, and of regulation by mutual stipulations between the two countries." The state courts at the present day have uniformly given their assent to this doctrine. Blythe v. Hinckley, 127 Cal. 431, 59 Pac. 787; Doe ex dem. Dockstader v. Roe, 4 Penn. (Del.) 398, 55 Atl. 341; Wunderle v. Wunderle, 144 Ill. 40, 19 L.R.A. 84, 33 N. E. 195; Opel v. Shoup, 100 Iowa, 407, 37 L.R.A. 583, 69 N. W. 560; Yeaker v. Yeaker, 4 Met. (Ky.) 33, 81 Am. Dec. 530; Baker v. Shy, 9 Heisk. 85; Rabasse's Succession, 47 La. Ann. 1453, 49 Am. St. Rep. 433, 17 So. 867; Kull v. Kull, 37 Hun, 476.

These firmly established principles are not denied by learned counsel for the state, but they contend that there is nothing in this treaty to prevent a sovereign state of the Union from collecting an inheritance tax from alien heirs or devisees of a citizen of the United States, upon property in the United States; that this article was adopted for the protection of the citizens of Sweden and Norway residing in the United States, and citizens of the United States residing in Sweden and Norway; that it does not seem possible that our government would think it necessary to make a treaty with a foreign country for the protection and benefit of a citizen's property at home, he being protected and subject only to the laws of his country. These contentions are apparently based on the theory that the paramount consideration in the interpretation of this treaty is the right of the deceased to dispose of his property by testament, or have it pass by descent to his heirs, rather than the right of his heirs to receive the succession. In other words, the argument seems to be that the treaty is designed to protect the rights of the deceased, rather than those who take from him; and hence, can have no application to the property of a deceased citizen passing to a citizen of the other country. Of course, one country would not be interested in the succession of property merely between citizens of the other; but it would be interested in the succession of property passing from a citizen of one country to citizens of the other, and clearly the power to dispose of property by testament by a citizen of the country where he resides, and where his property is situated, would affect the right of his devisee, a citizen of the other country, to receive such property. Under the same circumstances would each country be interested in the right of its citizens to inherit from citizens of the other. The principal authority relied upon by learned counsel in support of this argument is the case of Frederickson v. Louisiana, 23 How. 445, 16 L. ed. 577. That case was brought into the Supreme Court of the United States from the supreme court of Louisiana by writ of error. There was involved a 10 per cent inheritance tax levied by the state upon so much of the property of a deceased naturalized citizen of the United States residing at the time of his death in Louisiana, as passed by his will to residents and subjects of the Kingdom of Wurtemberg. The statute under which the state claimed the tax, the treaty provisions relied upon by the legatees to avoid the tax, and the court's views touching their rights, will be best understood by the following quotation from the decision, commencing on page 446 of 23 How.: "By a statute of Louisiana it is provided that 'each and every person not being domiciliated in this state, and not being a citizen of any other state or territory in the Union, who shall be entitled, whether as heirs, legatee, or donee, to the whole or any part of the succession of a person deceased, whether such person shall have died in this state or elsewhere, shall pay a tax of 10 per cent on all sums, or on the value of all property, which he may have actually received from said succession, or so much thereof as is situated in this state, after deducting all debts due by the succession.' The claim of the state of Louisiana was resisted in the district court, on the ground that it is contrary to the provisions of the third article of the convention between the United States of America and his majesty, the King of Wurtemberg, of the 10th April, 1844. That article is that 'the citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal property within the states of the other, by testament, donation, or otherwise; and their heirs, legatees, and donees, being citizens or subjects of the other contracting party, shall succeed to their said personal property, and may take possession thereof, either by themselves or by others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their pleasure, paying such duties only as the inhabitants of the country where the said property lies shall be liable to pay in like cases.' This court in Mager v. Grima, 8 How. 490, 12 L. ed. 1168, decided that the act of the legislature of Louisiana was nothing more than the exercise of the power which every state or sovereignty possesses of regulating the manner and terms upon which property, real and personal, within its dominion, may be transmitted by last will and testament, or by inheritance, and of prescribing who shall and who shall not be capable of taking it. The case before the district court in Louisiana concerned the distribution of the succession of a citizen of that state, and of property situated there. The act of the legislature under review does not make any discrimination between citizens of the state and aliens in the same circumstances. A citizen of Louisiana domiciliated abroad is subject to this tax. State v. Poydras, 9 La. Ann. 105. Therefore, if this article of the treaty comprised the succession of a citizen of Louisiana, the complaint of the foreign legatees would not be justified. They are subject to 'only such duties as are exacted from citizens of Louisiana under the same circumstances.' But we concur with the supreme court of Louisiana in the opinion that the treaty does not regulate the testamentary dispositions of citizens or subjects of the contracting powers, in reference to property within the country of their origin or citizenship. The cause of the treaty was that the citizens and subjects of each of the contracting powers were or might be subject to onerous taxes upon property possessed by them within the states of the other, by reason of their alienage, and its purpose was to enable such persons to dispose of their property, paying such duties only as the inhabitants of the country where the property lies pay under like conditions. The case of a citizen or subject of the respective countries residing at home, and disposing of property there in favor of a citizen or subject of the other, was not in the contemplation of the contracting powers, and is not embraced in this article of the treaty." There are two important particulars in which that case differs from the one before us. First. The treaty there involved provided that "the citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal property within the state of the other by testament," etc., while the treaty here involved provides that "the subjects of the contracting parties in the respective states may freely dispose of their goods and effects. . . . by testament," etc. Second. The statute of Louisiana there involved did not make any discrimination between the citizens of the state and aliens in the same circumstances. A citizen of Louisiana domiciled abroad was subject to the tax. The statute here involved imposes a tax of 25 per cent on property passing to collateral relatives who are aliens not residing in the United States, and at the same time imposes a tax of only 3 per cent on property passing to citizens under the same circumstances; thus clearly discriminating between citizens residing abroad and aliens residing abroad. The persons who may freely dispose of their goods and effects under this treaty are the subjects of the contracting parties "in the respective states." Clearly these words must at least mean that the subject may freely dispose of his property by testament within the country of his citizenship. The word "respective" is defined by the Standard Dictionary as "pertaining or relating severally to each of those under consideration; several; particular; as, they went to their respective homes." The more strictly we construe this language, the more certain does it seem applicable to the facts in this case, in favor of the rights claimed by appellants, as against the contention of the state, based upon the fact that the deceased was a citizen of the United States. Turning, now, to the right of appellants to receive the succession, if indeed, such right can be considered in this case apart from the right of the deceased to give "by testament," we find the express terms of the treaty not only guarantying to them the right to receive, but guarantying to them in so many words the right to receive "in whatever place they shall reside." And then, apparently for the purpose of removing all possible doubt as to the effect of their want of citizenship in the country in which the property may be situated, upon their right to receive, the treaty further expressly provides that they shall receive "without having any occasion to take out letters of naturalization," thus indicating an intention to give them the same right to receive as if they were citizens. In the case of Schultze v. Schultze, 144 Ill. 290, 19 L.R.A. 90, 36 Am. St. Rep. 432, 33 N. E. 201, the court had under consideration article 7 of the treaty of 1827 between the United States and Bremen, providing as follows: "The citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other, by sale, donation, testament, or otherwise; and their representatives, being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their said personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato, and they may take possession thereof, either by themselves or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such duties only as the inhabitants of the country wherein said goods are shall be subject to pay in like cases; and if, in the case of real estate, the said heirs would be prevented from entering into the possession of the inheritance on account of their character of aliens, there shall be granted to them the term of three years to dispose of the same as they may think proper, and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation, and exempt from all duties of detraction on the part of the governments of the respective states." Referring to the right of alien heirs and representatives of citizens of the United States under this treaty provision, Justice Magruder, speaking for the court, said: "The second clause can be construed to mean that the representatives or heirs of American citizens, being citizens of Bremen, shall succeed to personal goods. It follows that, by the terms of the third clause, the heirs of American citizens who are citizens of Bremen shall have the prescribed term of three years to dispose of real estate, etc. The appellees are therefore entitled, under said article 7 of the treaty, to the privilege of selling the interest in the land in controversy, which they would have inherited from the deceased, George Ludwig Schultze, under the laws of Illinois, but for their alienage, and of removing such proceeds of sale, providing they do so within three years." It seems to us that the terms of that treaty are not as clear in securing rights to alien heirs of citizens of the United States as the treaty involved in the case before us; yet the liberal rule of construction applicable to treaty rights induced the court in that case to regard the United States citizenship of the deceased as having no effect upon the rights of his alien representatives to succeed to property left by him in this country. The following authorities involving aliens taking by will or inheritance from citizens of the United States may be cited as lending additional support to this view, though the right to take does not appear to have been challenged upon the ground of the citizenship of the deceased: Jost v. Jost, 1 Mackey, 487; Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258, 33 L. ed. 642, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 295; Kull v. Kull, 37 Hun, 476; Opel v. Shoup, 100 Iowa, 407, 37 L.R.A. 583, 69 N. W. 560; Adams v. Akerlund, 168 Ill. 632, 48 N. E. 454. In the case last cited the court held that subjects and residents of Sweden who were heirs of a citizen of the United States residing in Illinois at the time of his death inherited property of the deceased situated in Illinois, by virtue of the terms of the same treaty which is here involved. We are led to conclude that the rights of appellants here claimed are in no way affected by the mere fact that their deceased brother was, at the time of his death, a citizen of the United States, and that the property claimed is in the state of Washington.

We are next confronted with the question: Does this charge of 25 per cent as an inheritance tax upon the property passing to appellants under this will impair the rights guaranteed to them by the terms of this treaty? A tax of this nature is not a tax upon property; but is a charge upon the right or privilege of receiving it. The nature of this tax and the legal basis for its support is well stated by Justice Brown, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, in United States v. Perkins, 163 U. S. 625, 628, 41 L. ed. 287, 288, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073, 1074, as follows: "Though the general consent of the most enlightened nations has, from the earliest historical period, recognized a natural right in children to inherit the property of their parents, we know of no legal principle to prevent the legislature from taking away or limiting the right of testamentary disposition, or imposing such conditions upon its exercise as it may deem conducive to public good. In this view, the so-called inheritance tax of the state of New York is in reality a limitation upon the power of a testator to bequeath his property to whom he pleases,—a declaration that, in the exercise of that power, he shall contribute a certain percentage to the public use; in other words, that the right to dispose of his property by will shall remain, but subject to a condition that the state has a right to impose. Certainly, if it be true that the right of testamentary disposition is purely statutory, the state has a right to require a contribution to the public treasury before the bequest shall take effect. Thus, the tax is not upon the property in the ordinary sense of the term, but upon the right to dispose of it, and it is not until it has yielded its contribution to the state that it becomes the property of the legatee. This was the view taken of a similar tax by the court of appeals of Maryland in State v. Dalrymple, 70 Md. 294, 299, 3 L.R.A. 372, 17 Atl. 82, in which the court observed: 'Possessing, then, the plenary power indicated, it necessarily follows that the state, in allowing property . . . to be disposed of by will, and in designating who shall take such property where there is no will, may prescribe such conditions, not in conflict with or forbidden by the organic law, as the legislature may deem expedient. These conditions, subject to the limitation named, are consequently wholly within the discretion of the general assembly. The act we are now considering plainly intended to require that a person taking the benefit of a civil right secured to him under our laws should pay a certain premium for its enjoyment. In other words, one of the conditions upon which strangers and collateral kindred may acquire a decedent's property which is subject to the dominion of our laws is that there shall be paid out of such property a tax of 2½ per cent into the treasury of the state. This, therefore, is not a tax upon the property itself, but is merely the price exacted by the state for the privilege accorded in permitting property so situated to be transferred by will or by descent or distribution.'" This view of the nature of an inheritance tax has been recognized by this court in State v. Clark, 30 Wash. 439, where, at page 445, 71 Pac. 20, it was said by Chief Justice Reavis: "It is an impost or excise on the right to pass the estate, and the privilege of the devisee to take." Plumber v. Coler, 178 U. S. 115, 125, 44 L. ed. 998, 1004, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 829; State v. Hamlin, 86 Me. 495, 25 L.R.A. 632, 41 Am. St. Rep. 569, 30 Atl. 76; Gelsthorpe v. Furnell, 20 Mont. 299, 39 L.R.A. 170, 51 Pac. 267; Re Macky, 46 Colo. 79, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1207, 102 Pac. 1075.

It is upon this theory that such a tax is held not to be in violation of the usual constitutional provisions requiring uniformity of taxation upon property. It is therefore apparent that the levy of a tax of this nature has the direct effect of impairing the right or privilege of receiving property by testament or inheritance; and in that manner this tax impairs the right of these appellants to take, since it withholds from them 25 per cent of the property they would be entitled to were they citizens of the United States and this law did not exist. It logically follows that they are deprived of a right accorded them by the terms of this treaty, unless it can be said that this tax does not deprive them of their treaty rights, because it is an exercise of the power of taxation by a sovereign state, and that the treaty contemplates the exercise of such power by each of the contracting parties. It may be conceded that there is no limit to the taxing power of the sovereign, and that the right or privilege of succession to property upon the death of its owner may be given or withheld by the state at its pleasure. Indeed, the concluding words of article 6 of this treaty, probably with unnecessary caution, reserve to the United States and each of them the "liberty to make, respecting the matter, such laws as they think proper." But surely this power cannot be rightfully exercised in such manner as to destroy the very rights the treaty was plainly designed to secure. It, of course, cannot be seriously contended that citizens of Sweden and Norway are, by the terms of this treaty, accorded any greater rights in their succession to property than the general laws of the states of the Union may accord to citizens of the United States. The laws of the several states would undoubtedly control those rights, even though no reservation to that effect was in the treaty. To whatever extent the right or privilege of a citizen of the United States to take property by testament or inheritance is impaired by our own laws, whether such laws relate to taxation or succession, to that extent will the rights of the citizens of Norway and Sweden be impaired, without violating the terms or spirit of this treaty. The language of the treaty giving the citizens of the contracting parties the right to dispose of their goods and effects by testament, and the right to receive the succession, must mean the right to so give and receive as such right may be defined by the general laws in force in the country where the property is situated. It could not mean otherwise, because there is no law to which we may turn, or which the contracting parties could have in view, in the making of the treaty, defining testamentary and succession rights, save the laws of the respective countries. There is no universal or international law of succession to property. In order then to give force and effect to the treaty, and avoid the destruction of the very end it was plainly intended to accomplish, we must conclude that the testamentary and inheritance rights secured thereby are such that they cannot be impaired except as such rights and privileges of citizens may be impaired by the laws of their own country. The enforcement of a law which would have the effect of burdening the succession of property passing to the citizens of Sweden and Norway greater than that imposed upon property passing to our own citizens would, in our opinion, be a plain violation of the rights secured by this treaty. The treaty must be held to mean that, in so far as the rights to succession of property of deceased persons are concerned, the citizens of each country stand on an equal footing. Otherwise its evident intent and purpose touching the matters here involved might be rendered of no effect by the passage and enforcement of laws discriminating against citizens of other countries under the guise of exercising the taxing power or the power to control the succession of property. If these appellants can be discriminated against by withholding from them, in the form of taxation, a larger portion of the property left them than can be withheld from others under the same circumstances, then, by the same method of discrimination, their right of succession to the property may be entirely destroyed by taking all of it, even though others may not have their privilege of succession thus impaired in the least. We think this treaty was intended to secure, and does secure, to the citizens of Sweden and Norway, the right to succeed to property left them by will or inheritance upon the same terms as such rights of our own citizens may be defined by law. These are the rights and the law defining them, which must have been in view in the making of the treaty, rather than possible discriminating laws affecting the rights of aliens different from citizens; for, to concede the right to make and enforce such laws is to concede the right to nullify the provisions of the treaty. This construction of the terms of the treaty finds additional support when we call to our aid the general rule of liberal construction applied by the courts, both state and Federal, in such cases. In Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258, 271, 33 L. ed. 642, 646, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 295, 298, Justice Field said: "It is a general principle of construction with respect to treaties that they shall be liberally construed, so as to carry out the apparent intention of the parties to secure equality and reciprocity between them. As they are contracts between independent nations, in their construction words are to be taken in their ordinary meaning, as understood in the public law of nations, and not in any artificial or special sense impressed upon them by local law, unless such restricted sense is clearly intended. And it has been held by this court that where a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive of rights that may be claimed under it, and the other favorable to them, the latter is to be preferred. Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483, 487, 25 L. ed. 628, 629." See also 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d ed.) p. 490; Devlin, Treaty Power, §§ 116, 125.

It has been noticed that the deceased left by his will to these appellants both real and personal property. The use of the words "goods and effects" only, to designate the property the treaty is applicable to, might give rise to argument as to whether or not these words include real property. In the case of Adams v. Akerlund, 168 Ill. 632, 48 N. E. 464, these words in this same treaty were under consideration, where it was contended that real property was not included by them. The court, however, in a very able and exhaustive opinion, held that real property was included. 1 Bouvier's Law Dict. (Rawle's Rev.) 635; Den ex dem. University v. Miller, 14 N. C. (3 Dev. L.) 188. No contention is here made upon this point; but, in view of the fact that we are here dealing with real as well as personal property, and our decision necessarily has the effect of applying the treaty provision to real as well as to personal property, we deem it not out of place to notice this possible contention.

We have made particular reference to the language of the treaty relating to the rights of those who may receive. It will be noticed that they are described therein by the word "heirs." This word, of course, has its technical common-law meaning, restricting it to those who take by inheritance only, while in the civil law it applies to all persons who are called to the succession, whether by the act of the party or by operation of law. 1 Bouvier's Law Dict. (Rawle's Rev.) 941. There does not appear to be any reason for here attributing to it the technical meaning of either of these systems of law in preference to the other, since it is here used by countries, in one of which the common law prevails, and in the other of which the civil law prevails. 1 Bouvier's Law Dict. (Rawle's Rev.) 330, 370. We are of the opinion that the words, "their heirs . . . shall receive the succession," refer to the right of succession of those who receive by testament as well as those who receive by operation of law, in view of the other provision of the article, and that the effect of the word "heirs" should not be measured by any technical rules. Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258, 271, 33 L. ed. 642, 646, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 295; 21 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 420; Re White, 42 Wash. 360, 362, 84 Pac. 831. We notice this matter of the meaning of the word "heirs" because of the particular provisions 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) of the treaty defining the rights of those so designated.

The contention of learned counsel for appellants that this inheritance tax law is unconstitutional in so far as it imposes upon aliens not residing in the United States a greater tax than upon citizens, in view of certain provisions of our state Constitution, presents a question which does not require our attention at this time. We are of the opinion that article 6 of the treaty before us secures to appellants the right of succession to the property left them by the will of their deceased brother, upon the same terms as are accorded to our own citizens; and, in so far as the law burdens them with a greater tax than it does our own citizens, it must be held in abeyance, and yield to the provisions of this treaty.

We conclude that the order of the Superior Court should be reversed, with instructions to fix the amount of the inheritance tax at a rate not inconsistent with the views herein expressed. It is so ordered.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

ROSS WORLEY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

A. J. JOHNSON.

(— Fla. —, 53 So. 543.)

Bills and notes — presentment — liability of indorser.

1. An indorser without qualification of a note engages that on due presentment it shall be paid according to its tenor, and that if it be dishonored, the necessary proceedings on dishonor being duly taken, he will pay the amount thereof to the holder.

Same — necessity.

2. Presentment for payment, unless dispensed with or excused, is necessary in order to charge an indorser; but presentment may be expressly or impliedly waived.

Same — notice of dishonor.

3. Notice of dishonor, unless dispensed

Headnotes by WHITFIELD. Ch. J.

Note. — Bills and notes: implied waiver of presentment and notice by indorser before maturity.

Cases involving the effect of a statement by an indorser to a holder that the party primarily liable cannot pay, as waiver of presentment and notice, are excluded from this note, and will be found in a note ap-with or excused, must be given to an indorser, or he is discharged, unless the notice is expressly or impliedly waived.

Same—statute—necessity for presentment.

4. Under the statute, an indorser of a negotiable promissory note is not liable thereon as indorser, if due presentment is not made to the maker for payment, and notice of dishonor is not given, unless presentment and notice are excused, dispensed with, or waived.

Same—waiver of presentment.

5. The rights of an indorser of a negotiable promissory note to have due presentment and notice before liability attaches to him thereon are annexed by law for the benefit of the indorser, and under the terms of the statute such presentment and notice may be expressly or impliedly waived. Waiver may be implied from the conduct of the indorser.

Same—facts showing waiver.

6. Where, before the maturity of a negotiable promissory note, an indorser thereof by unequivocal words or acts shows that he regards his liability as indorser to be absolute, and not to be dependent upon proper presentment for payment, and notice to him of the dishonor of the note; or where the indorser by unequivocal words or acts fairly warrants the holder of the note to conclude that the indorser intended to assume an absolute liability; or misleads the holder and induces him to dispense with the presentment for payment and notice of dishonor required by law to fix the liability of an indorser,—the indorser may be regarded as having waived his right under the amount to a waiver. Thus, it has been held that the indorser waived presentment and notice:

Known insolvency of maker at time of indorsement.

While it was held in M'Clellan v. Clarke, 2 Brev. 106, that waiver of presentment and notice was implied by the fact that the maker was insolvent and had absconded at the time of indorsement, the general rule is that known insolvency of the maker at the time of indorsement does not imply a waiver of presentment and notice by the indorser. Phipps v. Harding (Hudson Furniture Co. v. Harding) 30 L.R.A. 513, 17 C. C. A. 203, 34 U. S. App. 148, 70 Fed. 468; Kimmel v. Weil, 95 Ill. App. 15; Groton v. Dallheim, 6 Me. 476; Sandford v. Dillaway, 10 Mass. 52, 6 Am. Dec. 99; Farnum v. Fowle, 12 Mass. 89, 7 Am. Dec. 35; Barton v. Baker, 1 Serg. & R. 334, 7 Am. Dec. 620.

And this is true though the indorser indorsed the note of the insolvent for the purpose of giving it credit. Buck v. Cotton, 2 Conn. 128, 7 Am. Dec. 251.

Indorsing renewal note.

As a rule, an indorser who indorses a note to be used for the purpose of taking up the former note, which has not yet matured, is held thereby impliedly to have waived presentment and notice of the first note. Tailer v. Murphy Furnishing Goods Co. 24 Mo. App. 420; First Nat. Bank v. Weston, 25 App. Div. 414, 49 N. Y. Supp. 542; National Hudson River Bank v. Reynolds, 57 Hun, 307, 10 N. Y. Supp. 669.

But in First Nat. Bank v. Gridley, 112 App. Div. 398, 98 N. Y. Supp. 445, it was held that no such waiver was effected by the indorser indorsing a renewal note before maturity, where the holder had no notice of the renewal until the maturity of the first note.

Agreement by indorser to pay.

A promise by an indorser indicating that he intends to assume responsibility for payment of the note is frequently held to 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

amount to a waiver. Thus, it has been held that the indorser waived presentment and notice:

—by promising to pay the note at maturity. Sigerson v. Mathews, 20 How. 496, 15 L. ed. 989; Lary v. Young, 13 Ark. 401, 58 Am. Dec. 332; Marshall v. Mitchell, 35 Me. 221, 58 Am. Dec. 697; Schley v. Merritt, 37 Md. 352; State Bank v. Bartle, 114 Mo. 276, 21 S. W. 816;

—by telling holder that he is collecting money for the maker, and not to be uneasy about the note as he will see that it is paid. Bryant v. Wilcox, 49 Cal. 47;

—by promising to pay at maturity, where the note was made to secure funds for a mutual undertaking by maker and indorsers. First Nat. Bank v. Connoway, 4 Houst. (Del.) 206;

—by telling holder to do nothing with the note, and they (indorsers) will pay it. Markland v. McDaniel, 51 Kan. 350, 20 L.R.A. 96, 32 Pac. 1114;

—by promising to take up the note when due, if maker does not. Boyd v. Cleveland, 4 Pick. 525;

—by promising to take care of the note when due, and directing that notice to the maker should be sent in his care (indorser's). Taunton Bank v. Richardson, 5 Pick. 436;

—by telling payee at time of indorsement that he should look to him to pay the note, and that he would pay it promptly. Quaintance v. Goodrow, 16 Mont. 376, 41 Pac. 76;

—by telling holder, after failure of maker and before maturity of note, that he (indorser) would pay it. Whitney v. Abbot, 5 N. H. 378;

—by telling holder to give himself no uneasiness about the note, and he would see him paid. Leonard v. Gary, 10 Wend. 504;

—by replying to holder's inquiries in regard to the note, where the maker had become insolvent before maturity, that an auditor would have to be appointed, and that what the maker's property would not reach, he (indorser) would have to pay. Stahl v. Wolfe, 6 W. N. C. 143;

law to have due presentment made and notice of dishonor given to him. The words or acts of the indorser must be of such a character as to fairly justify the holder in being misled thereby, or to warrant the holder in concluding that the indorser intended to permit the presentment and notice of dishonor to be dispensed with, or intended to assume an absolute liability.

Same — waiver — implication.

7. A waiver of presentment and notice, being in derogation of a statutory right of the indorser, will not be inferred from doubtful acts or language of the indorser.

Same — promise to pay.

8. Where an indorser of a negotiable promissory note before its maturity is informed by the holder that the makers denied liability, and had told him they would not pay the note at maturity, or at any other time, and the indorser stated that he did not have the money to pay the note, but that he was liable thereon, and if the holder would sue the makers, and should fail to recover for them, he (the indorser) would pay it, such action by the indorser is not inconsistent with, or a waiver of, his right to have due presentment to the makers for payment made, and notice of dishonor given him, as a prerequisite to his liability on the note as indorser.

Pleading — failure of proof.

9. In an action against an indorser of a negotiable promissory note, where the declaration alleges due presentment of the note for payment, and notice of its dishon-

—by agreeing at the time of discount for their (indorsers') benefit, to pay the note themselves at maturity. Souther v. McKenna Bros. 20 R. I. 645, 40 Atl. 736;

—by informing holder that he had taken back the land for which the note was given, and had become paymaster to the indorsee. Moon v. Haynie, 1 Hill, L. 411;

—by agreement to pay note if holder would let it run past maturity. Hale v. Danforth, 46 Wis. 554, 1 N. W. 284.

On the other hand, it has been held that the indorser did not waive presentment and notice;

—by his assurance that he would stand good for payment. Freeman v. O'Brien, 38 Iowa, 406;

—by his promise to pay at maturity. Isham v. McClure, 58 Iowa, 515, 12 N. W. 558;

—by his parol representation made before indorsement that he would treat the note as his own paper, and see that it was paid at maturity, as all prior negotiations are merged in the contract of indorsement. Bird v. Kay, 40 App. Div. 533, 58 N. Y. Supp. 170;

—by an offer from the indorser to the holder, before maturity of the note, to provide for its payment, which offer had not been accepted at maturity. M'Mahan v. Grant, 16 La. 479;

—by a promise to the maker, without knowledge of the holder, to pay the note when due. Coghlan v. Dinsmore, 9 Bosw. 453.

Extension or request for extension.

The indorser may waive his right to require presentment and notice:

—by consenting to an extension of time. Ridgway v. Day, 13 Pa. 208; Amoskeag Bank v. Moore, 37 N. H. 539, 75 Am. Dec. 156; Sheldon v. Horton, 43 N. Y. 93, 3 Am. Rep. 669, affirming 53 Barb. 23;

—by asking an extension of time, and promising to pay if it is granted. Hunter v. Hook, 64 Barb. 468;

—by requesting a renewal, which was granted by the holder. First Nat. Bank v. Byerson, 23 Iowa, 508;

—by informing indorsee at time of transfer that time had been extended by agreement, and requesting delay in presentment. Glaze v. Ferguson, 48 Kan. 157, 29 Pac. 396;

—by requesting holder not to sue note till the maker should see him. Gove v. Vining, 7 Met. 212, 39 Am. Dec. 770;

—by promising shortly before maturity that if the holder would wait a few days, the note would be fixed up. Bush v. Gilmore, 45 App. Div. 89, 61 N. Y. Supp. 682;

—by requesting before maturity that time on note be extended, to which payee consented on condition that the indorser let his name be on it. Cady v. Bradshaw, 116 N. Y. 188, 5 L.R.A. 557, 22 N. E. 371;

—by an offer of renewal before maturity with same makers and indorsers. Jenkins v. White, 147 Pa. 303, 23 Atl. 556;

—by indorsing the note without informing indorsee that he had previously agreed with the maker to an extension of time. Williams v. Brobst, 10 Watts, 111.

And in Walker v. Graham, 21 La. Ann. 209, where the indorser consented to an extension of time between maker and holder, it was held that presentment and notice were waived until the new date.

But in Norton v. Lewis, 2 Conn. 478, and Michaud v. Lagarde, 4 Minn. 43, Gil. 21, it was held that an agreement to permit an extension of time for payment did not amount to a waiver.

And in Dutton v. Bratt, —Ark. —, 11 S. W. 821, it was held that a waiver was not implied by the indorser requesting indorsee not to bring suit on the note against him in his absence from home, if the maker failed to pay.

Taking security—in general.

There seems to be considerable conflict as to the effect of the indorser taking security from the maker as a waiver of presentment and notice. Part of this apparent conflict may be explained on the ground that in some cases the security or property is taken for the purpose of enabling the indorser to pay the note when due, while in others it is taken merely as indemnity against his liability as indorser. In the latter case or to the indorser, and such material allegations are not proven, a judgment for the plaintiff will be reversed.

Same — common counts — indorser.

10. Common counts are not applicable in an action against an indorser as such of negotiable promissory notes.

(November, 1, 1910.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Taylor County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to hold the indorser on promissory notes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. B. Davis, for plaintiff in error:

Waivers, being in derogation of the admitted rights of the indorser, will not be inferred from doubtful acts or language.

it would seem that there should be no waiver implied, and this is doubtless the general view; while in the former the liability would be based upon the ground that the indorser had taken the place of the maker, and assumed responsibility for payment of the note. But aside from this class of cases there appears to be a real conflict of authority upon the question, the courts which take the position that the taking of security amounts to a waiver placing their decisions upon the ground that the reason for giving an indorser notice of nonpayment is to enable him to take such steps against the maker as may be available for his own protection, and that, when he is amply secured, the reason, and therefore the necessity, for giving him notice, is obviated. Cases taking the other view do so on the ground that the indorser agrees to become liable only in case the maker fails to pay when the note is due and he is notified of such failure, and that, in taking indemnity, he does so only for the purpose of protecting himself against this conditional liability. Of course, if the security taken is insufficient to indemnify the indorser, the reason for implying a waiver is not present, and the cases generally hold that it does not amount to such. There are some cases, however, which hold that though the property taken is not sufficient, nevertheless, if it is all the maker has, a waiver will be implied, for the reason that, the maker having no property left, notice to the indorser would be useless, as there would be nothing to which he could have recourse beyond the security in his hands. The cases do not all agree, however, that the taking by the indorser of insufficient security, even though it is all the maker has, will amount to a waiver of presentment and notice.

Keeping the above principles and distinctions in mind, it has been held that no waiver was implied:

Mr. Thomas B. Adams, for defendant in error:

If the indorser before maturity, by some words or acts, reasonably leads the holder to believe that demand and notice will not be required, it would be a fraud upon the holder to allow the indorser to profit by the laches of the holder caused by such words or acts.

Whitfield, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An action was brought by A. J. Johnson, the holder of two notes, against Ross Worley the indorser thereof; the notes having been made by J. H. Edwards and J. C. West, payable to the order of Ross Worley, and indorsed in blank by Ross Worley. Besides the common counts, the declaration contains two counts on the note due Deer's property. Stephenson v. Primrose, 8 Port. (Ala.) 155, 33 Am. Dec. 281; Bond v. Farnham, 5 Mass. 170, 4 Am. Dec. 47; Mechanics' Bank v. Griawold, 7 Wend. 165; Barton v. Baker, 1 Serg. & R. 334, 7 Am. Dec. 620; Bank of State v. Myers, 1 Bail. L. 412;

—by receiving a sufficient sum of money or ample security. Lewis v. Kramer, 3 Md. 265;

—by taking a mortgage as indemnity, though the mortgaged property had been released. Watt v. Mitchell, 6 How. (Miss.) 131;

—by a statement to the holder that the maker could not pay the note, and had made an assignment and preferred him, so as to make him secure on his indorsement. Taylor v. French, 4 E. D. Smith, 458;

—where, at maturity, indorser had in his hands as security sufficient property of the maker to pay the note. Beard v. Westerman, 32 Ohio St. 29.

Miscellaneous cases—sustaining waiver.

In the following cases it was held that waiver of presentment and notice was effected:

—by conduct on part of the indorser likely to mislead a reasonable person, and induce him to forbear taking the necessary steps. Boyd v. Bank v. Toledo, 32 Ohio St. 526, 30 Am. Rep. 624; Torbert v. Montague, 38 Colo. 325, 87 Pac. 1145;

—by the indorser discharging the maker from liability. Burke v. McKay, 2 How. 66, 11 L. ed. 181;

—by the indorser delivering the note to the creditor as collateral security for a debt, and subsequently giving the creditor cember 15, 1908, and two counts on the note due January 10, 1909. The first and second counts allege severally that the note "was duly presented for payment and was dishonored, whereof the defendant had due notice," and the third and fourth counts allege severally that "the plaintiff, a few days before the maturity of said note, informed the makers personally that he was the holder of the same and would expect payment at maturity; and the said makers then and there denied liability on said note, and said they would not pay the same at maturity, or at any other time; that a few days thereafter, and before the maturity of said note, the plaintiff personally informed the defendant of said statements of said makers, and then and there informed defendant that he (plaintiff) did and would look to defendant for payment of said note; that the defendant then and there stated that he did not have the money to pay said note, but that he was liable on the same, and that if plaintiff would sue the said makers, and should fail to make the money out of them, he would pay it; that, by said conversation and statements of the defendant, plaintiff was induced not to make any further demand at maturity upon said makers, or to give any further notice of dishonor of said note."

Demurrers to each of the special counts were interposed, among the grounds being, in effect, that no sufficient facts are alleged to show a legal waiver of presentment for payment, that no showing is made of any effort to collect from the makers of the note, and that the alleged waiver is not sufficient. The court overruled the demurrers. A plea of "Never was indebted" was filed to the common counts. Among the pleas to the first and second counts are several that aver the notes were not presented for payment, that defendant had no notice of the dishonor of the notes, and that no proper legal notice of dishonor was ever given to defendant. Judgment was renhis own note with security for the full amount of the debt. Johnson v. Downing, 76 Ark. 128, 88 S. W. 825;

—where a statute made demand notes dishonored after expiration of four months, and defendant indorsed a demand note that provided for payment of interest semi-annually. Hayes v. Werner, 45 Conn. 246;

—where the indorser testified that he did not expect presentment at maturity, and, under the circumstances, had no right to expect such presentment to be made. Baumeister v. Kuntz, 53 Fla. 340, 42 So. 886;

—by indorser wrongfully obtaining possession of the note, and retaining it till after maturity, and taking steps which tended to show primary liability. Havens v. Talbot, 11 Ind. 323;

—by the indorser giving to the holder a mortgage in terms clearly indicating an intention absolutely to secure payment of the debt. Hoover v. Glasscock, 16 La. 242;

—by bankruptcy of the maker participated in and consented to by his indorser. J. W. O'Bannon Co. v. Curran, 129 App. Div. 90, 113 N. W. Supp. 359;

—by a telegram sent by the indorser to the collecting bank, to pay the note to save protest, and to draw on him. Seldner v. M. T. Jackson Nat. Bank, 66 Md. 488, 59 Am. Rep. 190, 8 Atl. 262;

—by indorser calling on holder and stating that he would be unable to pay the note at maturity, and it would be useless to have it protested. Jones v. Roberts, 191 Pa. 152, 43 Atl. 123.

—denying waiver.

But in the following cases it was held that presentment and notice were not waived:

—by an answer by the indorser to an objection that the makers were insolvent, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that his name made the notes good. Andrews v. Simms, 33 Ark. 771;

—by the indorser inducing and assisting holder to commence actions for overdue instalments of interest. Isham v. McClure, 58 Iowa, 515, 12 N. W. 558;

—where, upon the holder making a premature demand on the indorser, the latter refused to pay, and indicated that he intended to resist payment of the note. Porter v. Moles, — Iowa, —, 131 N. W. 23;

—by the indorser attending a meeting of creditors of the insolvent drawer, and assuming the quality of a creditor for a large sum, including the note in question. Miranda v. City Bank, 6 La. 740, 26 Am. Dec. 493;

—where a holder informed the indorser at the time of indorsement, that he relied altogether upon him for payment. Davis v. Gowen, 19 Me. 447;

—by the indorser, on being informed that holder had the note, saying he would see the maker before it was due, and he would probably arrange for a new note. Kent v. Warner, 12 Allen, 561;

—by the indorser paying instalments of interest on a demand note. Porter v. Thom, 40 App. Div. 34, 57 N. Y. Supp. 479, affirmed without opinion in 167 N. Y. 584, 60 N. E. 1119;

—by the indorser of a demand note, on being informed of the amount still due from maker, saying he would see him, and, if he did not settle, would shut him up, Congress Brewing Co. v. Habenicht, 83 App. Div. 141, 82 N. Y. Supp. 481;

—by an indorsement providing that assignment was on condition that the property of maker be exhausted before recourse on indorser. Duffy v. O'Conner, 7 Baxt. 498.

dered for the plaintiff, and writ of error was taken by the defendant.

An indorser without qualification of a note engages that on due presentment it shall be paid according to its tenor, and that if it be dishonored, the necessary proceedings on dishonor being duly taken, he will pay the amount thereof to the holder. Presentment for payment, unless dispensed with or excused, is necessary in order to charge an indorser; but presentment may be expressly or impliedly waived. Notice of dishonor, unless dispensed with or excused, must be given to an indorser, or he is discharged, unless the notice is expressly or impliedly waived. Gen. Stat. 1906, §§ 2999, 3003, 3012-3014, 3020, 3036, 3038, 3039.

Under the statute an indorser of a negotiable promissory note is not liable thereon as indorser, if due presentment is not made to the maker for payment, and notice of dishonor is not given, unless presentment and notice are excused, dispensed with, or waived. The rights of an indorser of a negotiable promissory note to have due presentment and notice before liability attaches to him thereon are annexed by law for the benefit of the indorser, and under the terms of the statute such presentment and notice may be expressly or impliedly waived. Waiver may be implied from the conduct of the indorser. Baumeister v. Kuntz, 53 Fla. 340, 42 So. 886. See, also, Galbraith v. Shepard, 43 Wash. 698, 86 Pac. 1113.

Where, before the maturity of a negotiable promissory note, an indorser thereof, by unequivocal words or acts, shows that he regards his liability as indorser to be absolute, and not to be dependent upon proper presentment for payment, and notice to him of the dishonor of the note; or where the indorser by unequivocal words or acts fairly warrants the holder of the note to conclude that the indorser intended to assume an absolute liability; or misleads the holder and induces him to dispense with the presentment for payment and notice of dishonor required by law to fix the liability of an indorser,—the indorser may be regarded as having waived his right under the law to have due presentment made and notice of dishonor given to him. The words or acts of the indorser must be of such a character as to fairly justify the holder in being misled thereby, or to warrant the holder in concluding that the indorser intended to permit the presentment and notice of dishonor to be dispensed with, or intended to assume an absolute liability. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. chap. 1091; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 460; Torbert v. Montague, 38 Colo. 325, 87 Pac. 1145; Sie-33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ger v. Second Nat. Bank, 132 Pa. 307, 19 Atl. 217; Eaton & G. Com. Paper, 521; M'Mahan v. Grant, 16 La. 479.

A waiver of presentment and notice, being in derogation of a statutory right of the indorser, will not be inferred from doubtful acts or language of the indorser. 7 Cyc. & Proc. p. 1127, and cases cited.

The allegation demurred to in the third and fourth counts is that before maturity the holder notified the makers that he held the note and would expect payment at maturity; that the makers then and there denied liability, and said they would not pay the note at maturity, or at any other time; "that a few days thereafter, and before the maturity of said note, the plaintiff personally informed the defendant of said statements of said makers, and then and there informed defendant that he (plaintiff) did and would look to defendant for payment of said note; that the defendant then and there stated that he did not have the money to pay said note, but that he was liable on the same, and that if plaintiff would sue the said makers, and should fail to make the money out of them, he would pay it; that, by said conversation and statements of the defendant, plaintiff was induced not to make any further demand at maturity upon said makers, or to give any further notice of dishonor of said note." These allegations are not inconsistent with the right of the indorser to presentment and notice.

The acknowledgment of the indorser as alleged is not of an absolute liability, and there is nothing in the acts of the indorser as alleged to justify the holder in being misled, or to fairly warrant the holder in concluding that the indorser, by the language used, intended to waive his right to have due presentment made and notice of dishonor given to him as a condition annexed by law to the indorser's liability on the note. The makers might have changed their minds and paid the notes on due presentment. Therefore the indorser had a right to such presentment in the absence of a clear waiver. Prideaux v. Collier, 2 Starkie, 57; Duffy v. O'Conner, 7 Baxt. 498; Isham v. McClure, 58 Iowa, 515, 12 N. W. 558; Kent v. Warner, 12 Allen, 561; Wright v. Liesenfeld, 93 Cal. 90, 28 Pac. 849; Congress Brewing Co. v. Habenicht, 83 App. Div. 141, 82 N. Y. Supp. 481.

The demurrers to the third and fourth counts of the declaration should have been sustained.

The allegations of the first and second counts, that "the said note was duly presented for payment, and was dishonored, whereof the defendant had due notice," are not sustained by proofs. See A. B. Far- quhar Co. v. Higham, 16 N. D. 106, 112 N. W. 557.

Common counts are not applicable in an action against indorsers as such of a negotiable promissory note; but it appears there was no recovery on the common counts included in the declaration here.

The judgment is reversed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

ATTILIO POLI

v.

NUMA BLOCK COAL COMPANY, Appt.

(— Iowa —, 127 N. W. 1105.)

Master — mine employee — promise of pit boss.

1. An employee of a mine may rely on the promise of a pit boss who employs and discharges the operatives and has imme-

Note. — Servant's assumption of risk of master's breach of statutory duty.

The earlier cases on this subject are collected in the opinion in Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Norgate, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 981, and the note to that case and the cases of Johnson v. Mammoth Vein Coal Co. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 646, and Hill v. Saugestad, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 634. The exclusionary statements in the note in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 646, also apply to the present note.

As shown in those notes the statutes in question vary all the way from those that merely impose certain duties upon the master without any intimation whatever as to assumption of risk, thus presenting the bald question whether in view of their purpose and the nature of the defense of assumed risk they must be held impliedly to exclude that defense, to those that expressly deal with that defense in terms leaving no room for construction. Between these extremes there are statutes which, without in terms making any declaration as to assumption of risk, provide that contracts releasing the employer from liability for breach of the statute shall be void, or providing that no contract of employment shall constitute any bar or defense. These variations account for part of the apparent conflict observable when only the ultimate results in the cases are considered, but even after allowing for these differences in the statute there is a real and substantial conflict of authority on the question.

In considering the question it is important to bear in mind (as pointed out in the note to Scheurer v. Banner Rubber Co. 28 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

diata charge of the actual underground operations of the mine, to repair the cover of the cage, made in response to his complaint of its insufficiency.

Same — notice of defects.

2. Notice to a mine operator of a defect in the original construction of the cage is not necessary to hold him liable for injury thereby caused to an employee.

Same — assumption of risk — statutory duty.

3. An employee in a mine does not assume the risk of injury from the notorious and persistent disregard, by the proprietor, of his statutory duty to maintain a proper cover over the cage in order to protect employees from injury.

Same — ordinary hazard.

4. A miner is not per se negligent in continuing to work in connection with a cage having a defective covering after receiving the employer's promise to repair it as soon as possible, unless the hazard is so great that no reasonably prudent person would expose himself to it.

Same — licensed employees — liability for negligence.

5. Requiring a mine operator to employ only licensed pit bosses does not relieve him from liability for the negligence of his employees so far as it pertains to the perform-

L.R.A. (N.S.) 1215) that while the phrase "assumption of risk" in its proper and distinctive sense imports an affirmative defense not dependent upon any imputation of negligence to the employee, but simply upon his knowledge and appreciation of the danger incident to the master's negligence or breach of duty, the phrase is sometimes employed to cover that passive kind of contributory negligence which consists in remaining in the employment with knowledge or notice of a defect, where, under the circumstances, an ordinarily prudent man would not have done so. For example, as shown in the note in 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 634, the Texas statute in relation to railroad employees, while saving the latter defense, apparently treats it as a species of assumed risk, since in declaring that the plea of "assumed risk" where the ground of the plea is knowledge or means of knowledge of the defect and danger which caused the injury or death shall not be available, it adds the condition, "where a person of ordinary care would have continued in the service with knowledge of the defect and danger." It should not be assumed that because some statutes or courts declare the abrogation of the defense of assumed risk, without any qualification, that they mean to exclude as defense also the passive kind of contributory negligence already referred to, which, as just stated, is sometimes regarded as coming within the doctrine of assumed risk. In this connection see the note to Dumphy v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1152, on the subject of contributory negligence as a defense where the statute excludes the defense of assumption of risk; ance of the nondelegable duties of the master.

Appeal — excessive damages — prejudice.

6. A verdict for $3,200 for the negligent crushing of the hand of an employee, leaving it in a permanently crippled condition, is not indicative of passion or prejudice so as to require interference by the appellate court.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Wayne County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Miles & Steele, for appellant: As the pit boss held a certificate as a mine pit boss from the state board of mine examiners, the defendant was not responsible for his acts or for any failure to act while he was acting in the capacity of said pit boss.

Notwithstanding the apparently emphatic holding in POLI v. NUMA BLOCK COAL CO. that the employer cannot plead assumption of risk as a defense to an injury resulting from a violation of an express and specific statutory regulation, the court in the subsequent case of Tyrrell v. Cain, — Iowa, —, 128 N. W. 536, while citing the POLI CASE, apparently treated the question whether an employee may assume the risk from the breach of a statutory duty to guard machinery as still an open one, and the majority opinion disposed of the question by drawing a somewhat strained distinction between the facts in that case and the facts in Sutton under the law, or by virtue of his office or agency with respect to the matter about which the notice is given.

v. Des Moines Bakery Co. 135 Iowa, 390, 112 N. W. 836 (the case which is practically overruled or at least explained away by the opinion in the POLI CASE).

In a still later case (Stephenson v. Sheffield Brick & Tile Co. — Iowa, —, 130 N. W. 586), however, the court states: "We have already held that an employee does not assume the risk incident to the use of a machine which is not guarded as required by the statute, although he knows of the unguarded condition and appreciates the danger incident to the use thereof." (Citing the POLI and Tyrell Cases). The fact that the court in the Stephenson Case disposed of the defendant's contention that, under the instructions of the trial court as to assumption of risk, there should have been a verdict for defendant, upon the ground that the evidence did not conclusively establish the facts essential to assumed risk, rather than upon the ground that that defense would not be available in any event, is probably accounted for by the doctrine which prevails in some jurisdictions, including Iowa, that a verdict contrary to even erroneous instructions of the trial should be set aside. (See note in 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 852.)

In Valjago v. Carnegie Steel Co. 226 Pa. 514, 75 Atl. 728, an action for negligence in omitting the statutory duty of properly guarding cogwheels or gearing, it was held that the defense of assumption of risk was not open to the defendant, but the court points out that this question was really not in the case, as the jury had passed upon it adversely to the defendant.

A similar opinion was expressed in Jones v. American Caramel Co. 225 Pa. 644, 74 Atl. 613, where the court said: "The act of 1905 will become a dead letter if an employer who has failed to properly guard his machinery can relieve himself from that duty by the plea that the danger was so obvious that his injured employee ought to have been aware of it, and was not entitled to any warning against it. Only contributory negligence of an injured employee lawfully employed will relieve the employer from the consequences of his disregard of 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

An employee assumes the risk, even though there is a promise to repair, when he is en-his statutory duty." As in the preceding case, however, this point does seem to have been essential to a disposition of the case.

The distinction which (as shown in the note in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 646) is made in Indiana between specific and general statutory duties was referred to in American Rolling Mill Co. v. Hullinger, 161 Ind. 673, 67 N. E. 986, 69 N. E. 460, as follows: "The rule concerning assumed risk is different in cases arising under the employers' liability act, where definitive duties are not prescribed, from what it is where a statute points out definitely what the master must do in certain cases to guard the safety of the employee." See also as referring to this distinction, Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Powers, 173 Ind. 105, 88 N. E. 1073, 89 N. E. 485.

In Princeton Coal Min. Co. v. Howell, — Ind. App.—, 92 N. E. 122, holding that an employee in a mine did not assume the risk from the failure of the mining boss to see that all loose slate, coal, and rock overhead where miners have to travel to and from work shall be "taken down or carefully secured" as required by statute, it was contended by counsel that the act enjoined no specific thing upon the mine boss, but left him free to exercise his judgment as to whether the loose coal should be taken down or secured, and that, therefore, under the distinction adopted in Indiana, the doctrine of assumed risk was available. The court, however, said that the statute was explicit and mandatory,—take down or secure,—and that the alternative expression did not create any uncertainty.

Special statutory provisions.

The decisions in Luken v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 248 Ill. 377, 94 N. E. 175, and Patten v. Faithorn, 152 Ill. App. 426, that the risk of master's failure to provide the appliances required by the Illinois safety appliance act was not assumed by the employees, are based upon express provisions to that effect, which admit of no construction on the point.

And the decision to the same effect in Gilliland v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. 86 S. C. 137, 68 S. E. 186, was under a constitutional provision expressly declaring that "knowledge by any employee injured, of the defective condition of any machinery, ways, or appliances shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby, except as to conductors or engineers in charge of dangerous or unsafe cars or engines voluntarily operated by them." That statute was held in Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Woodruff, — Miss. —, 53 So. 687, to leave the question of assumption of risk by an engineer or conductor where it stood at common law.

The decision in Lowe v. Southern R. Co. 85 S. C. 363, 67 S. E. 460, that defense of assumed risk was excluded, was based upon the terms of the North Carolina statute and the North Carolina cases cited in the note in 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 985.

As shown in the note in 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 634, the Texas statute in relation to railroad employees, by its express terms in effect abrogates the doctrine of assumed risk in the sense of an affirmative defense in addition to contributory negligence available to relieve the master of the consequences of his negligence or breach of duty.

The cases of Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Lynch, — Tex. Civ. App.—, 136 S. W. 580, and International & G. N. R. Co. v. Schubert, — Tex. Civ. App.—, 130 S. W. 708, are mere applications of the provisions of the statute referred to at the beginning of the note.

In Rice v. Lewis, — Tex. Civ. App.—, 125 S. W. 961, the terms "defect and danger" in the Texas statute conditionally abrogating assumption of risk were held to cover the entire field of those defects and dangers to which persons engaged in the operation of railroad or street railway are exposed, and specifically the danger from the improper manner in which a train was made up.

The apparent assumption in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Mathis, 101 Tex. 342, 107 S. W. 530, that the doctrine of assumed risk may still under some conditions be available under this statute is doubtless due to the fact alluded to at the beginning of this note, that the statute as well as the courts treat the continuance in the service with knowledge of the defect or danger, when a person of ordinary prudence under like circumstances would not have done so—a defense which is saved by the clear implication of the statute—as a species of assumption of risk rather than contributory negligence.

In Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Tucker, 35 App. D. C. 123, a provision of the statute, that "no contract of employment shall constitute any bar or defense," was held to abrogate the defense of assumed risk, on the theory that the doctrine of assumed risk results from contractual relations. But see Osterholm v. Boston & M. Consol. Copper & S. Min. Co. infra.

Risk may be assumed.

In addition to the cases cited in the earlier notes holding that an employee may assume the risk of the master's breach of a statutory duty, that view is held or recognized by a few subsequent cases.

Thus, in Osterholm v. Boston & M. Consol. Copper & S. Min. Co. 40 Mont. 508, 107 Pac. 499, it was held that the doctrine of assumption of risk does not grow out of a contract, and that therefore it is still available as a defense in Montana, notwithstanding the Constitution and statute declare that a contract releasing an employer from liability for his negligence is void. In that case the statute provided a fine as a penalty to observe it. The court said: "There is not anything in the statute relating to the defense of assumed risk. Indeed, there is no word relating in the remotest degree either directly or indirectly to any action for personal injuries by the servant against

Even if the bonnets failed to comply with the master. There is nothing to indicate that the law-making body had any other thought than that the employer should be compelled, by fear of criminal prosecution, to provide for the employee certain safety appliances, which, experience had taught, should be furnished in any event. The courts are almost unanimously agreed that a failure to comply with the law constitutes negligence per se, but the sole effect is to remove the question of primary negligence from the realm of uncertainty. . . . There is to our minds no force in the argument found in some of the decided cases that the legislature intended to abrogate the defense of assumption of risk as an additional punishment for failure to comply with the statute. If it had such intention, it would presumably have employed apt words to express it. The penalty imposed by statute is not to be augmented by implication."

This case was followed in Monson v. La France Copper Co. — Mont. —, 114 Pac. 778.

As shown in the note in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 646, the New York employers' liability law (now part of the labor law) makes assumption of risk in cases brought under it a question for the jury rather than for the court; but the defense of assumed risk even in case of violation of a statutory duty is not entirely abrogated in that state.

Thus it is held in Gombert v. McKay, 201 N. Y. 27, 94 N. E. 186, that the provisions of § 2489 of the Code, the plaintiff waived the failure by continuing to act as cager, with knowledge and notice of the construction of the bonnets.

sions of §§ 18, 19, of the labor law with reference to the construction of scaffolds, while imposing upon the employers personal responsibility and a positive prohibition do not preclude the defenses of assumed risk or contributory negligence.

So, it is held in that state that while there is a presumption that the employee does not assume the risk from the master's breach of a duty to guard machinery as required by the labor law that presumption is not conclusive. *Graves v. In Carstens Packing Co. v. Swinney, 186 Fed. 50, it was held that the statute of the state of Washington requiring the master to provide guards for machinery where practicable impliedly excludes the defense of assumed risk when the injury occurs as a result of a violation of the provision. It will be observed that this result is in accord with the decisions of the state court of Washington construing this statute. The Federal court, however, did not rely on the decisions of the state court, but upon Welsh v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 93 C. C. A. 101, 167 Fed. 465.

The court in the latter case, while evidently inclined even as an independent proposition to the view that the statute precludes the defense of assumed risk, was of the opinion that in any event the Oregon statute having been adopted from the Washington statute after the supreme court of the latter state had so construed the statute, that view was binding upon the Federal court.

Federal cases.

In Erdman v. Deer River Lumber Co. 104 C. C. A. 482, 182 Fed. 42, it was held that the statute of Minnesota requiring the protection of saws does not exempt the employee from the assumption of risk. The court cites a decision to the same effect by the Minnesota supreme court, but also cites earlier Federal cases; and it is not clear whether the question was regarded as one for the independent judgment of the Federal court, or one as to which the decisions of the state court would in any event be controlling.

The statement in Johnson v. Great Northern R. Co. 102 C. C. A. 89, 178 Fed. 643, that no question of assumption of risk is material in the determination of a case arising under the Federal safety appliance act is based upon the express provision of § 8, that the employee shall not be deemed to have assumed the risk occasioned by the use of any locomotive, car, or train contrary to the provisions of the act, although continuing in the employment after.

Summary.

It will be observed that since the summary added to the note in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 649, the Iowa supreme court, if it has not changed its position, has at least adopted the view that a statute imposing specific duties upon the master impliedly excludes the defense of assumed risk, whereas at the time of that note it was apparently committed to the contrary doctrine.

The Pennsylvania supreme court has also expressed a decided opinion to the same effect, although the question may not perhaps be regarded as authoritatively settled in that state.

The change of position of the Wisconsin supreme court is due to the addition of a statutory provision which expressly precludes assumption of risk; and the Texas decisions on this side of the question are also due to express statutory provisions which scarcely admit of construction on the point.

The Rhode Island decision noted in the note in 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 634, holding that the defense of assumed risk was precluded is based upon an express statutory provision to that effect in relation to elevators, and does not indicate a change of position of that court upon the general question whether the defense is abolished by implication by a statute imposing specific duties upon the master.

Montana appears to be the only new state to be added to the list of those holding that the defense of assumed risk is not excluded.

Olson v. Kelly Coal Co. 236 Ill. 502, 86 N. E. 88.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant operates a coal mine in which at the time of the accident in question the plaintiff was employed. He had considerable experience in the ordinary work of mining or digging coal, and was engaged in this class of work until a short time prior to his injury, when he took the position of cager. The shaft in which the cage or hoist was operated was 240 feet in depth. Plaintiff's place of work was in the entry at the foot of the shaft. The cage was constructed with an open floor or platform at the bottom, on which were two parallel rails corresponding in gauge with the rails on which the coal cars in the mine were operated. In hoisting coal the cage was first lowered to the bottom, where the platform to which we have referred rests on a level with the car tracks in the entry. The duty of the cager is then to push the loaded cars from the tracks in the entry to the platform of the cage, which is then hoisted with its load to the surface. The business of coal mining in this state has been made the subject of statutory regulation, and among the safety appliances which the operator must provide are "proper covers overhead on all cages." Code, § 2489. The precise purpose of such covers is not definitely expressed in the statute, but quite obviously they are intended to protect the employees and others who may be upon a cage or in the shaft beneath from injury by the falling of coal or other heavy substances from the top. See Bodell v. Brazil Block Coal Co. 25 Ind. App. 654, 58 N. E. 856; Durant v. Lexington Coal Min. Co. 97 Mo. 62, 10 S. W. 484. The cage in defendant's mine was provided with a cover, but plaintiff alleges, and there was evidence tending to show, that it was considerably smaller than the shaft through which the cage was hoisted and lowered. The platform or floor of the cage was of a size to nearly fill the shaft, but the cover, or bonnet as it appears to be called in miner's parlance, was narrower, leaving an opening variously estimated at from 10 to 14 inches in width through which a lump of coal falling from the top could pass to the floor. On the day in question, the plaintiff, in the discharge of his duty as cager undertook to push a loaded coal car from the entry to its place upon the platform of the cage, and in so doing his hand, resting upon the car, was extended out from the shelter of the entry into the shaft and under the opening between the bonnet and the wall. In doing this a lump of coal falling from the top struck his hand, perforating it, breaking some of the bones, and leaving that member to a material extent in a permanently crippled condition. It is the claim of plaintiff that his injury is chargeable to the negligence of the defendant in failing to provide a large and more effective covering for the cage. The defendant takes issue upon the charge of negligence, denies that plaintiff exercised due care for his own safety, and alleges that he knew the condition under which the work was being done, and assumed the risk therefrom. It is also alleged that the negligence, if any, from which the plaintiff suffered injury, was that of a fellow servant. There was trial to a jury, and verdict and judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $3,200, and defendant appeals.

1. There was evidence tending to show that, having observed the insufficient covering of the cage, plaintiff called the attention of the pit boss to its condition, and the latter assured him he would fix it "as soon as possible," or "as soon as he could," or "had a lay-off," and the plaintiff, relying on the assurance thus given, continued the work. Appellant argues that a notice to the pit boss was not notice to the company, and the plaintiff was not authorized to rely upon his promise to repair. For reasons stated in a subsequent paragraph of this opinion, the question thus raised is not controlling importance, but we think the notice was sufficient, and the plaintiff was entitled to rely upon the promise of the pit boss as the promise of the employer. He was the person who employed the plaintiff and other operatives in the mine, and he had authority to discharge them. He had immediate charge of the actual underground operations, and, if any defect or dangerous condition therein was called to his attention, it was his duty either to remedy it or to report it to the proper office or department within whose scope such work properly belonged. The duty of the company to provide a safe place to work could not be delegated or left to the discretion of a servant, nor could it leave the operation of its mine or shaft without the responsible care and foresight of some person, and escape all responsibility until some miner or cager should hunt up the directors or managers, and serve formal notice upon them. The boss in immediate charge and control of the men and of the work as well as of the place is the one to whom they naturally and properly look as the representative of the corporation, and there is nothing in the record of this case to take it out from under 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the operation of this rule. Wahlquist v. Maple Grove Coal & Min. Co. 116 Iowa, 720, 89 N. W. 98; Beresford v. American Coal Co. 124 Iowa, 44, 70 L.R.A. 256, 98 N. W. 902; Island Coal Co. v. Swaggerty, 159 Ind. 664, 62 N. E. 1103, 65 N. E. 1028; Wellston Coal Co. v. Smith, 65 Ohio St. 70, 55 L.R.A. 99, 87 Am. St. Rep. 547, 61 N. E. 143; Consolidated Coal Co. v. Wombacher, 134 Ill. 57, 24 N. E. 627; Meier v. Way, J. L. & Co. 136 Iowa, 302, 125 Am. St. Rep. 254, 111 N. W. 420; Blazenic v. Iowa & W. Coal Co. 102 Iowa, 706, 72 N. W. 292. We cannot say, therefore, as a matter of law that the pit boss was not in this instance a vice principal, or that plaintiff was not justified in relying upon his promise to make the repair. It is to be noticed also that, as far as the merits of this case turn upon the question of notice to the company of the alleged defect, the fault, if one there was, pertained to the matter of the original construction of the cage covering, and notice of its condition is therefore conclusively presumed.

2. Appellant argues also that, even if it be found that defendant was negligent in the matter of its statutory duty to furnish a proper cover for the cage, plaintiff should be held as a matter of law to have assumed the risk because the danger therefrom was obvious, and he knew the conditions of which he now complains. In support of this contention, we are cited to Sutton v. Des Moines Bakery Co. 135 Iowa, 390, 112 N. W. 836. It is to be conceded that in the opinion referred to an expression is used to the effect that, if there was a breach of statutory duty by the employer with reference to a safety device, plaintiff was nevertheless not absolved from the consequence of his voluntary assumption of the risk. The case was one in which the plaintiff's contributory negligence was so obvious that the court was united in the opinion that the order of the district court in directing a verdict for defendant should be affirmed. In disposing of the appeal, the opinion went somewhat beyond the last ground here mentioned, and made use of the language upon which appellant now relies, without any general discussion of the question as to the effect of statutory regulation upon the application of the rule of assumption of risk. In the case before us, we are for the first time confronted with a record which seems to render necessary a definite pronouncement upon this phase of the law of negligence, and we are disposed to treat it as res integra in this jurisdiction. Statutory regulation of the manner in which any particular line of business shall be carried on is an exercise of the police power of the state, and is intended in some instances as an instrument of protection to the public generally, and in others as a protection to certain classes of employees exposed to special hazards. For example, a statute regulating the speed of railway trains or of street cars in cities and towns is meant primarily for the benefit of the general public in the use of the public ways and crossings, while a regulation which compels the operator of a mill or factory to place hoods over his circular saws, or to box or cover exposed gearings, is meant primarily for the protection of his employees whose duties expose them to contact with these dangerous instrumentalities. In cases of the first class we have held that an employee may assume the risk of the known and habitual disregard of his employer of a statute or ordinance regulating in the interest of the public safety the operation of a railroad (Martin v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 118 Iowa, 148, 59 L.R.A. 698, 96 Am. St. Rep. 371, 91 N. W. 1034. The same thought is reflected in Sweeney v. Central P. R. Co. 57 Cal. 15, and Fleming v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 27 Minn. 111, 6 N. W. 448); but the reasons which have been thought controlling in these cases have much less persuasive force when considered in connection with a case of the other class. Notwithstanding the absolute liberty with which every individual is legally endowed to enter into contract for his personal labor or service, and his equal legal right to abandon such service at any time subject only to liability for damages in case such act be not justified, it is nevertheless true in practical life that poverty, scarcity of employment, dependent family, and other circumstances often impose moral compulsion upon the laborer to accept employment upon such terms and under such conditions as are offered him; and it is in recognition of this fact, as well as the further facts, that society has a direct interest in preserving the lives and promoting the well-being of all persons engaged in productive industry, that laws have been enacted to protect them against unnecessary hazard of injury by failure of employers to exercise proper care for their safety. Freeman's note to Wellston Coal Co. v. Smith, 87 Am. St. Rep. 584; Kilpatrick v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 74 Vt. 288, 93 Am. St. Rep. 887, 52 Atl. 531; Knoxville Iron Co. v. Harbison, 183 U. S. 13, 46 L. ed. 55, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1; Harbison v. Knoxville Iron Co. 103 Tenn. 421, 56 L.R.A. 310, 76 Am. St. Rep. 682, 53 S. W. 955; State v. Brown & S. Mfg. Co. 18 R. I. 16, 17 L.R.A. 856, 25 Atl. 246; Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383; McGuire v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 131 Iowa, 340, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 108 N. W. 902, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

To say that the legislature, in enacting these measures of protection, which in some degree equalize the advantages of employer and employee and afford a needed protection to the persons and lives of the latter, intended that a master might violate the statute to the injury or death of his servant, and then escape liability by pleading and proving that his offense against the law was habitual, obstinate, and notorious, is inconsistent with justice, and, it is hardly extravagant to say, repugnant to good morals. Such a rule offers a premium to contemptuous disregard of the statute, and robs it substantially of all value to the class in whose interest it was enacted. These statutes being to a great extent the product of comparatively recent legislation, it is only natural that the expressed views of the courts of different jurisdictions have not been entirely harmonious with respect to their operation and effect, but the decided weight of the precedents supports the view we have above indicated that, where the negligence charged constitutes the violation of a statute enacted for the servant's benefit, the master cannot avail himself of the plea of assumption of risk against the consequences of his own wrong. The holdings to this effect are so numerous that to attempt an exhaustive citation would unduly extend this opinion. The leading cases of this class are collected in 26 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1181, notes 61, 62; Cyc's Annotations for 1910, p. 2533; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 121; Hall v. West & S. Mill Co. 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 599, note; Bromberg v. Evans Laundry Co. 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 36, note.

A few eminent courts—notably those of Massachusetts and New York—have reached the opposite conclusion, but the reasoning on which it is based does not appeal to us as controlling, and serves to unduly narrow the effect, if it does not substantially defeat the evident purpose, of the legislation. Among the courts upholding the view we here adopt are those of Indiana, Michigan, Washington, Oregon, Kansas, North Carolina, Louisiana, and Missouri. Such also seems to be the trend of judicial opinion in England (Webbin v. Ballard, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 122, 55 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 395, 54 L. T. N. S. 532, 34 Week. Rep. 455, 50 J. P. 597), and in Canada (McCloyerty v. Gale Mfg. Co. 19 Ont. App. Rep. 117; Rodgers v. Hamilton Cotton Co. 23 Ont. Rep. 425). A like conclusion has been reached in Illinois, where the negligence alleged was the failure of a coal-mine operator to furnish a proper light at the bottom of a shaft, and defendant sought to avoid liability because of the injured servant's knowledge that this regulation was not obeyed. The court there says: "The statute expressly requires the mine owner to furnish a sufficient light at the top and bottom of the shaft to insure as far as possible the safety of persons getting on and off the cage. To excuse the mine owner from a compliance with said statute upon proof . . . that the miner knew the mine owner was violating the statute would be to repeal the statute." Spring Valley Coal Co. v. Patting, 210 Ill. 342, 71 N. E. 371. We shall not extend this opinion for further quotation from the cited cases. They afford much interesting reading upon one of the most important features of the law of negligence as affected by modern legislation, and the logical soundness of the conclusion reached appears to us to be unassailable.

It follows that, in so far as the negligence charged in the case at bar was a violation of an express and specific statutory regulation, the appellant cannot avail itself of the plea of the assumption of risk in an action for resulting injury to a servant for whose protection the law was enacted. It should perhaps be noted before leaving this branch of the case that some leading precedents emphasize a distinction between statutory regulations which are stated in general terms and are but little more than re-enactments of the common law, and those which prescribe specific means or methods for the protection of the servant, and hold that, while there can be no assumption of risk attending a violation of the latter, the defense may still avail in the former. The case before us does not call for a determination of the question thus suggested, and we make no pronouncement upon it.

3. We are further asked to hold as a matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The record will not justify the holding. He was performing the duty placed upon him in the usual way, and counsel do not suggest what he did or omitted to do for his own protection against the hazard from falling coal. True, he might have refused to work, but, having called the attention of his employer to the condition of things and having received its promise to repair, the law did not require him to at once cease work and lose his job, or to continue work at his own risk. He could wait at least a reasonable time for the work of repair to be done without being charged with contributory negligence, unless the hazard was so great that no reasonably prudent person would expose himself to it. Whether such conditions existed was a jury question.

4. Counsel argue that, as the company was by law required to employ only duly licensed engineers and pit bosses, these persons were to be treated as quasi officers of the state, and that for their negligence the employer is not liable. The proposition does not appeal to us as being reasonable or sound. The statute is not intended to relieve the mine operator from any of his common-law liabilities, but rather to add thereto by imposing upon him certain specific duties intended to safeguard the persons and lives of his servants who are engaged in a work which exposes them to many dangers. The licensed engineer and licensed pit boss, so far as their work or duty pertain to the nondelegable obligations of the master, are none the less his representatives, because the law requires them to possess certain prescribed qualifications. As we have already said, the negligence here complained of, being one which pertains to or inheres in the construction of the shaft or cage, is necessarily the negligence of the owner, and responsibility therefor cannot be shifted to the engineer or to any other officer or servant. The law cited by counsel, which compels the master of a ship to employ a licensed pilot, and under which there have been decisions which relieve the shipowner from the consequences of the pilot's negligence or incompetence, is not in point. If the shipowner sends to sea a vessel of such defective construction that it sinks while it is being taken out of the harbor, no one would contend that he is relieved from responsibility for his negligence because a licensed pilot was in charge when the disaster occurred.

5. Much complaint is made of alleged misconduct of counsel in argument. Without undertaking to set out the various remarks and statements objected to, we have to say that we find nothing calling for the interference of the court. The debate was doubtless spirited, and the record is not without indication that counsel for appellant was inclined to indulge in nagging interruptions and objections to the course of the closing argument, and this had its usual result in spurring the orator to more fiery and exaggerated declamation than would otherwise have been indulged in. Nothing is disclosed in the argument which was so far outside of the record that we can say any prejudice therefrom to the appellant was possible.

It is also objected that the recovery was excessive. The damages awarded were liberal, but we do not regard them so excessive as to indicate that the verdict was influenced by passion or prejudice.

There is no reversible error in the record, and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHN LOW, Appt.,

v.

CLEAR CREEK COAL COMPANY.

Servant — miner — unpropped room — assumption of risk.

A miner is not guilty of contributory negligence by going to work in a room for which the owner has not furnished props in accordance with a statutory duty, which will prevent his holding the latter liable for injuries caused by fall of the roof, unless he could have seen or known by the exercise of ordinary care, that the situation was dangerous and imminently so.

(November 25, 1910.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bell County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. V. Riley for appellant.

Messrs. Sampson & Sampson for appellee.

O'Rear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant is a coal miner of some three years' experience. He was employed as a miner in appellee's coal mine to mine coal in a room. He took out the coal and propped the roof of his room. The mine owner was to furnish the timber, properly cut and taken into the mine, for his use as he requested. On December 24, 1908, he notified the mine foreman that he needed certain props for his room, and selected and marked the lot he required. But the props were not furnished to him. He continued his work until quitting time that day, leaving some 6 feet of space cleared of coal beyond his last prop. He did not return to work until the 28th of that month, when he again notified the mine foreman of his requirement, and selected and marked the props he needed. They were not sent in to him. He went into his room to begin work. He examined the roof, and discovered nothing indicating immediate danger from it, and began preparations for the day's work, when a large piece of slate forming the roof fell upon him and severely injured him. The fault in the roof was what is known as a "horseback," which, he alleges, was not discoverable by ordinary care, and, until it fell, its existence was unknown to him. Such faults were likely to exist in coal mines, and he probably knew that fact.

In the petition in this suit by the miner against the mine owner for its negligence in failing to furnish him props as required, by reason of which he alleges he sustained the injury named, he charges the foregoing facts, coupled with the allegation that it was safe to work the mine when the roof was propped with suitable props placed 5 feet apart in rows, and the rows 4 to 5 feet apart in the space from which the coal had been removed, and the props so placed as soon as the coal had been taken out, or in a reasonable time thereafter. A general demurrer was sustained to the petition as amended, and, the plaintiff declining to plead further, his petition was dismissed.

The circuit court's ruling is said to have been based upon the notion that as the petition disclosed the unsafety of the situation in the room in the absence of props, a fact alleged to have been in the knowledge of the plaintiff, he was guilty of contributory negligence in going into the room and commencing to work without them. It must be remembered that the plaintiff alleged that before going into the room and before beginning work he examined the roof, and found nothing to indicate that it was not safe, or was about to fall, and that he believed that it was safe, and would not fall before the props could be brought in and set up; also that the conditions were such that the immediate danger could not be discovered by the exercise of ordinary care. The situation thus disclosed is that coal mining, such as was here being done, was safe when the roof was propped by suitable props 4 or 5 feet apart, set seasonably—that is, in a reasonable time—after the coal was removed; that there was an unpropped space of 6 feet, which had been in that condition about three days; that the miner examined the roof with care upon going to work upon the fourth day, and found nothing indicating a disintegration, or the presence of any defect making its danger imminent. That it was a dangerous situation is admitted. He went to work under the promise of the foreman to send in his props presently. The roof immediately fell, owing to a latent fault, and injured him. Is this on his part negligence per se, and such as will preclude his recovering damages from his master for his injury? In other words, was his own conduct the immediate and proximate cause of the injury?

The legislature has from time to time found it necessary to deal with the mining situation in Kentucky. It was found that casualties in coal mines were increasing in number, resulting in destruction of life and maiming laborers, so as to reduce them to dependence on the public or on others. It was found that, in spite of the common-law duty of the mine owner to furnish his laborers a reasonably safe place in which to work, it was not always done. Besides, there was a question as to the extent of this duty. By an act approved March 20, 1908 (Laws 1908, chap. 59), now incorporated as § 2739b, Carroll's Ky. Stat. (Russell's Stat. § 2489a), the relative duties of the mine owners and miners were defined respecting a number of things. Among them was that of furnishing and using props. Subsection 7 of that section provides: "Each owner, lessee, or operator of every mine to which the mining laws of the state apply, shall provide and furnish to the miners employed in said mine a sufficient number of caps and props, said props to be sawed square at each end, to be used by said miners in securing the roof in their rooms, and at such other working places where by law or custom of those usually engaged in such employment it is the duty of said miners to keep the roof propped, after the miner has selected and worked the same." By subsection 8 of the act a penalty by fine is imposed on those who neglect the duty imposed by the act, applying both to mine owners or operators and miners. This mine was one subject to the act. It was the custom of this mine for the miners to prop the roof in their rooms. Section 466, Ky. Stat. (Russell's Stat. § 3) provides: "A person injured by the violation of any statute may recover from the offender such damage as he may sustain by reason of the violation, although a penalty or forfeiture for such violation be thereby imposed." Facts are alleged in this petition showing that it was the duty of the mine owner to provide the props, that it failed, and that the roof fell because of lack of props. It is therefore sufficiently shown that the violation of defendant's statutory duty was the cause of the injury.

But the legislature, by the statute regulating the operation of mines, did not intend to relieve miners of the duty to be careful of their own safety. Just the contrary is evinced. But it did separate the express duties of the owner and miners. The miner cannot now, nor could he before the statute, shut his eyes to obvious dangers created by his master's negligence, and then charge the whole consequence upon the master. He is still bound to use his eyes and other senses, in connection with his experience and other knowledge, to keep out of such dangers when they are apparent.

But it is a well-known fact, true no more of mining than other hazardous employments, that laborers when forced to do so will take chances and subject themselves to dangers which in calm reflection is a matter of surprise that they were not avoided by the laborer. He gets in a hurry. He is so accustomed to the ordinary dangers of his employment that they do not alarm him,—do not sharply arrest his attention. Daily familiarity with them, and coming through unharmed, begets a mental attitude respecting them which is natural enough, but to others not so employed may seem reckless. These are well-known conditions. The legislature saw that the result was an increase in the loss of life and destruction of earning capacity in that class of persons. It set about to remedy the evil. So the duty of furnishing means to make the rooms of the miners safe was imposed on the master, and the duty of using them when so furnished was put on the laborer. It was true then, and is no less true now, that, if the owner or operator neglects to furnish props or caps, the miners will go ahead with their work and take chances. They know that the conditions are inherently unsafe. Yet, as it is not apparent to them that they are immediately so, they take the chance, so to speak, of coming out without injury. Now, if the statute be so construed as to impose on the miners the consequence of the situation if they should be injured, then the wholesome benefit of the legislation is lost. On the other hand, if it be so construed as to let the miner shut his eyes to obvious and imminent dangers, it would carry the statute to an unreasonable length, and place a premium on sheer recklessness.

We think the safe rule is to hold that, unless the danger from the lack of props is not only imminent, but so obvious that an ordinarily careful man would not have worked under the conditions, the owner has the responsibility. He having failed in his statutory duty, the liability for all consequences is upon him, unless the miner could see, or know, by ordinary care, that the situation was dangerous and imminently so. In other words, there is no assumption of risk by the laborer where the master neglects a statutory duty; but such laborer is still liable for his contributory negligence. The two propositions are not identical. To constitute contributory negligence, there must be some act or failure on the part of the laborer, in addition to the ordinary risks imposed by the character of his work under the conditions created by the master's conduct, which would amount to culpable negligence on the laborer's part; such, for example, as a failure to look, to observe, to test in some way, the safety of the roof in this instance, or, if it had been unsafe, and obviously so, and the danger thereby imminent, his continuing to work under those conditions. Johnson v. Mammoth Vein Coal Co. 88 Ark. 243, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 646, 114 S. W. 722, 123 S. W. 1180; Mammoth Vein Coal Co. v. Johnson, — Ark. —, 127 S. W. 971.

The demurrer to the petition as amended should have been overruled. Reversed, and remanded for proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

C. A. THOMPSON et al., Impleaded, etc.,
Appts.

(81 Kan. 119, 105 Pac. 502.)

Will — foreign — power to admit to probate.

1. The statutes conferring jurisdiction on probate courts to allow and admit to record authenticated copies of foreign wills executed and proved according to the laws of any state or territory of the United States, or of any country other than the United States and territories thereof, and giving to such copies, when so allowed and recorded, the same effect as if the original

Note. — Jurisdiction to admit to probate will not probated at testator's domicile.

With the exception of two cases, both of which are based upon a construction of local statutes, it is uniformly held that where assets are found within a state, the courts of probate of that state have jurisdiction to grant original probate of a foreign will. In some states such jurisdiction is expressly given by statutes, which are, however, characterized by the courts as merely declaratory of the common law.

But the exercise of original jurisdiction over the estates of nonresidents affects, and can affect, only the property within the state. The judgment admitting the will to probate is valid in all other states only as to property within the jurisdiction of the court pronouncing the judgment. It has no extraterritorial force, establishes nothing beyond that, and does not dispense with nor abrogate the formalities and proofs which may be exacted by other jurisdictions in which the deceased also left property subject to their laws of administration. Re Clark, 148 Cal. 108, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 996, 113 Am. St. Rep. 197, 82 Pac. 760, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 306, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) will had been proved here, were not intended to deny such courts jurisdiction to probate an original will executed in a foreign state or country, which disposes of property situated here.

Same — original probate.

2. A resident of England executed two wills, one known as the "English will," relating solely to property in England, and the other, known as the "American will," relating solely to property situated in Kansas. The testator died in England. The English court admitted the English will to probate. The American will was never probated there; but the original thereof was brought to Kansas and probated in the probate court of the county where real estate and personal property belonging to the deceased were situated. The will was executed and attested in accordance with the laws of Kansas, and disposed of property situated here in a form not repugnant to the laws or policy of the state. Held, that the probate court had jurisdiction to probate the original will.

Same — will in two parts — validity.

3. Where a testator executes two separate and distinct wills one relating solely to property at his domicile, and the other relating solely to property situated in a foreign state or country, both are valid if executed, attested, and proved in accordance with the laws of the place where the property disposed of is situated.

Administrator — appointment — collateral attack.

4. When an application is presented to the probate court for the appointment of an administrator of a surviving partnership, and the court finds the existence of

The right to exercise such jurisdiction is discretionary, and may be declined from considerations of comity, as is instanced in some of the ensuing cases.

As to whether provisions for the ancillary probate of a will probated in another jurisdiction will permit such probate in the state of testator's domicile, see note to Re Clark, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 996.

The conclusiveness of foreign probate as affecting real property is discussed in a note to State ex rel. Ruef v. District Ct. 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 617.

In Jacques v. Horton, 76 Ala. 238, it is held that, by the express terms of a statute, which are not stated, a court of probate has jurisdiction to take proof and to admit to probate the will of a testator who is shown to have died within its jurisdiction, leaving assets therein, though his domicile may have been in another state.

In California, § 1204 of the Code of Civil Procedure expressly provides for the grant of original probate upon wills of deceased nonresidents who leave property within that state. Re Clark, 148 Cal. 108, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 996, 113 Am. St. Rep. 197, 82 Pac. 760, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 306; Re Edelman, 148 Cal. 233, 113 Am. St. Rep. 231, 82 Pac. 962.

the facts authorizing it to exercise jurisdiction, the action of the court in making the appointment is not subject to collateral attack.

Evidence — sufficiency — dissolution of partnership.

5. The evidence in this case examined, and held sufficient to warrant a decree dissolving a partnership and ordering the partnership estate settled in the probate court.

(November 6, 1909.)

A PPEAL by defendants Thompson et al., from a decree of the District Court for Kiowa County in plaintiff's favor in an action to dissolve a partnership between the estate of Herbert Marriage, deceased, and John Marriage, for a full and final accounting of the partnership business, and for a decree settling and determining the rights of the defendants to the partnership property. Affirmed.

Statement by Porter, J.:

Herbert Marriage, a resident of Moulsham Lodge, Chelmsford, in the county of Essex, England, departed this life at his residence on the 12th day of September, 1904, leaving two separate and distinct wills, one of which is known as the "English will," and the other the "American will." The American will contained a declaration that it related solely and exclusively to the testator's property in the United States of America, and not elsewhere. It named as executors a son of the testator, Herbert J. Marriage, of Alberta, Canada, Walter Hilliard, of Chelmsford, England, and Vernon J. Parnell, of Mullinville, Kansas, and bequeathed to them all his real and personal property in the United States upon trust to convert the same into money, to be held upon further trust for certain purposes mentioned in the will. The English will disposed of all of his property in that country, and was probated there. The American will was never probated in England. The original American will was afterwards brought to Kansas, and probated here under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned.

Herbert Marriage in his lifetime was the owner of a large amount of real and personal property situated in Kiowa county, Kansas. The defendant John Marriage, of Mullinville, Kansas, is a nephew of the deceased, and owned a large tract of land adjoining the land owned by the deceased. On the 12th day of October, 1903, Herbert Marriage and John Marriage entered into a partnership contract to carry on the business of stock raising and farming on what was known as the Eagle Canon ranch in Kiowa county. By the terms of the contract each contributed to the business as capital, either in cash or land or other property, the sum of $30,000, and each was to share equally in the profits or losses of the enterprise. The property owned by the partnership consisted of about 10,000 acres of land, which was held by the partners under deeds conveying to each of them an un-

In Hall's Succession, 28 La. Ann. 57, it was held that art. 1689, of the La. Civ. Code, which declares: "This order of execution shall be granted without any other form than that of registering the testament, if it be established that the testament has been duly proved before a competent judge of the place where it was received. In the contrary case, the testament cannot be carried into effect without its being first proved before the judge of whom the execution is demanded," clearly authorizes the original probate of a foreign will in Louisiana.

In Rackemann v. Taylor, 204 Mass. 394, 90 N. E. 552, it is held that jurisdiction to allow the probate of a foreign will for ancillary administration should be exercised only when the will has been proved in the state of domicile of the testator, unless special reasons are set forth for the application for the ancillary probate of it without waiting longer for administration in the courts of that state; but that, having regard to practical considerations affecting the rights and interests of the parties, and also to the comity which should be maintained between the courts of the different states, jurisdiction should be declined where proceedings for the probate of the will are being contested in the courts of the state of domicile.

In Putnam v. Whitney (Re Washburn) 45 Minn. 242, 11 L.R.A. 41, 47 N. W. 790, it is said that a will executed according to the laws of Minnesota, whether previously probated in another state or not, and without reference to the domicile of the testator, may be admitted to probate under the provisions of § 4, chap. 1, of the Probate Code, provided the testator left any property in the state which is the subject of administration; and that this power over the estates of deceased persons situate within its jurisdiction is inherent in any state or country on common-law principles, of which the provisions of the Probate Code in that regard are declaratory.

In Bailey v. Osborn, 33 Miss. 128, it was held that the probate court was without jurisdiction to grant probate of a will of a testator domiciled in another state. It does not appear whether or not testator left property within the state, but that there was no such property may be inferred from the fact that, in the subsequent case of Still v. Woodville, 38 Miss. 646, it was held that the court had jurisdiction to grant probate of a will and issue letters testamentary where testator left property within the state, even though he was domiciled elsewhere. In this latter case it does not appear whether or not the divided interest, and a large amount of cattle, hogs, and farming implements. The articles of agreement provided that the partnership was to continue for a term of seven years, terminating March 1, 1911. By the terms of the contract John Marriage was to manage and superintend the business of the partnership and to furnish Herbert Marriage, on the 1st day of March in each year, a statement showing the accounts of the concern, the stock on hand, and the value thereof. From the time the partnership was formed, John Marriage continued in possession of the property, and conducted the affairs of the partnership as manager until after the death of Herbert Marriage. John Marriage was given a year's option from March 1, 1904, to purchase the interest of Herbert Marriage in the partnership. The contract contained the following provision: "In case of the death of Herbert Marriage before the expiration of this contract, then this contract shall be carried out by his executors to the same extent as if the said Herbert Marriage were living."

A few months after the death of Herbert Marriage, and on the 2d day of November, 1904, more than a year prior to the probate of the American will, John Marriage entered into a written contract with the defendant C. A. Thompson, by which he leased to Thompson all the property of the ranch of every kind or description for a period of six years, terminating March 1, 1911. Under this contract Thompson was will had been previously probated in the state of alleged domicil.

In New Hampshire it has been held that neither the common law, nor the statute providing that the judge of probate, who shall have jurisdiction of the probate of a will of a nonresident, shall be the judge for any county in which such person had estate, requires that a will shall be probated first in the state of testator's domicil. Knight v. Hollings, 73 N. H. 495, 63 Atl. 38.

In Re Gordon, 50 N. J. Eq. 397, 26 Atl. 268, it is held that where it appears that there is personal property belonging to the testator's estate within the jurisdiction of the court, which must be administered under the will, the will may be proved in the state, even though the testator at his death were domiciled elsewhere, and the will has not yet been proved at the place of domicil.

In New York it has been held that § 2611 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which declares that a will executed without the state of New York, and within the United States, in accordance with the laws of the place of its execution, may be proved in the state of New York, and § 2476, conferring upon the surrogate's court of each county jurisdiction to take proof of the will of a nonresident testator who has died without the state leaving personal property within such county, confer authority upon the surrogate of a county in which personal property is found, to grant probate of a foreign will in the first instance, and before it has been submitted to the proper judicial tribunal of decedent's domicil. Booth v. Timoney, 3 Dem. 416. This seems also to have been assumed in Re Barandon, 41 Misc. 380, 84 N. Y. Supp. 937, in which, however, it does not appear whether or not the will had been admitted to probate at the place of domicil; and in Re Rubens, 128 App. Div. 626, 112 N. Y. Supp. 941, affirmed without opinion in 195 N. Y. 527, 88 N. E. 1130, in which it was held that the jurisdiction of the court, under § 2611 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is not so governed and restricted by the provision of § 2694, that "the validity and effect of a testamentary disposition . . . are regulated by the laws of the state or country of which the testator was a resident at the time of his death," as to preclude the probate of a will disposing of personal property within the state, although not so executed in accordance with the laws of testator's domicil as to permit its probate in the country of domicil.

In Hyman v. Gaskins, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 267, it is held that while there is a manifest propriety in submitting a will in the first instance to the forum of the domicil at the time of the death, such course is not absolutely necessary; and therefore that letters testamentary upon the original probate of a foreign will were not void, although the court characterized the grant as an unnecessary departure from the comity which should exist.

And in Shields v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 119 N. C. 380, 25 S. E. 951, a grant of letters testamentary upon proof that testator owned property then in the state, no matter when or how such chattels are brought within the jurisdiction, was held valid, although it appeared that the testator at the time of his death was a resident of another state, and left assets there also.

In Flannery's Will, 24 Pa. 502, it seems to have been assumed that letters testamentary might be granted upon the production for probate of the original of a will of a testator whose domicil was out of the state.

A statute (§ 6 of the act of March 15, 1832) providing that letters testamentary shall be grantable by the register of the county within which was the family or principal residence of the decedent at the time of his decease, "and if the decedent had no such residence in this commonwealth, then by the register of the county where the principal part of the goods and estate of such decedent shall be," confers jurisdiction to admit a foreign will to probate in the first instance, although the better way is to have it first admitted to proto manage the business, and John Marriage turned over the possession of the ranch and all the property of the partnership to him. In the spring of 1905, and about the time of the expiration of the option which John Marriage held for the purchase of his deceased partner's interest, the defendants, John Marriage, C. A. Thompson, and W. A. Cottrell, undertook to purchase the entire interest belonging to the heirs of Herbert Marriage, deceased, in the partnership business and in the ranch, and for that purpose sent John Marriage to England. He obtained from Walter Hilliard, the resident executor of the English estate, an option in writing for the purchase of the interest of the deceased in the partnership property, which provided that if the conditions of the option were carried out, the partnership agreement should be dissolved. The conditions were never complied with, and the option expired. In the month of November 1905, Vernon J. Parnell, a resident of Kansas, and the only one of the executors named in the American will who was a resident of the United States, presented the original American will to the probate court of Kiowa county for probate; and thereafter, on the 4th day of January, 1906, the same was probated, and Vernon J. Parnell qualified as sole executor. Letters testamentary were issued to him by the probate court, and he gave bond and qualified as executor. Parnell, as executor, requested John Marriage to qualify and act as surviving partner, and give bond as required bate in the place of domicile, and then to file a certified record of the will and probate in the state of the forum. Brown's Estate, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 730.

In Walton v. Hall, 66 Vt. 455, 29 Atl. 803, in which it appears that the will was never probated in the state of domicile, it was held that, inasmuch as there was property in another state on which the will was to be operative, the proper probate court of that state had jurisdiction to probate it.

Under § 6087, Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, which provides that "wills shall be proved, and letters testamentary or of administration shall be granted, . . . in the county in which any part of his [the decedent's] estate may be, he having died out of the state, and not having been a resident thereof at the time of his death," a will executed in a foreign county by a person domiciled there may be probated, notwithstanding it has not been probated in the courts of the state of the domicile, according to the laws thereof. Re Clayson, 26 Wash. 263, 66 Pac. 410; Rader v. Stubblefield, 43 Wash. 334, 86 Pac. 560, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 20.

Such jurisdiction also exists independent of statute. Re Clayson, supra.

The question was incidentally presented in Chicago Terminal Transfer R. Co. v. Winslow, 216 Ill. 166, 74 N. W. 815, in which an objection to the introduction of a will in evidence, based on the argument that, as it had been probated in a state other than that of testatrix's residence, the probate would not be the best evidence of the foreign will, was overruled, the court saying that while the rule, generally speaking, is that a will shall be probated in the first instance at the testator's domicile, it is subject to the exception, which is almost as broad as the rule itself, that it may be probated in any county in any state where the testator had and left assets, particularly real estate.

But in Davis v. Upson, 230 Ill. 327, 82 N. E. 824, in which the question was as to the jurisdiction of a probate court of Illinois to admit to probate an instrument purporting to be the will of a nonresident, which had been refused probate in the state of domicile, it was held to be clear from the language of the statute providing: "All wills, testaments, and codicils which heretofore have been, or shall hereafter be, made, executed, and published out of this state, may be admitted to probate in any county in this state in which the testator may have been seized of lands or other real estate at the time of his death, in the same manner and upon like proof as if the same had been made, executed, and published in this state, whether such will, testament, or codicil has first been probated in the state, territory, or country in which it was made and declared or not," that a foreign will can be admitted to probate in Illinois only in case the testator died seized of "lands or other real estate" situate in the state; and that no such jurisdiction can be inferred to exist from the provision of the ensuing section of the statute, that "if he or she have no such known place of residence, and there be no lands devised in such will, the same may be proved either in the county where the testator or testatrix shall have died, or that wherein his or her estate, or the greater part thereof, shall lie," such section being construed as applicable only to domestic wills. In support of this conclusion, the court further states that, as foreign executors and administrators are given by statute the right to sue in any court in the state upon filing an authenticated copy of their letters testamentary or of administration, there is no reason why the probate courts should be given power to admit to probate the wills of nonresidents who die without leaving real estate situated in the state.

The conclusion reached in PARNELL v. THOMPSON, that the courts are not deprived of such jurisdiction by statutes providing for the grant of letters testamentary upon the filing of an authenticated copy of the will, with due proof of its probate at testator's domicile, is supported by other decisions. A contrary conclusion by law. John Marriage refused, for the reason that the property was in control of defendant Thompson. Thereafter, John Marriage was cited to appear in the probate court of Kiowa county, and requested to give bond and qualify as surviving partner. On his refusal, an order was made by the probate court appointing Vernon J. Parnell as administrator of the partnership property. He gave the bond as required by law, and undertook to administer upon the partnership property. He requested John Marriage to make a statement of the condition of the property, in compliance with the terms of the partnership articles. John Marriage failed to comply with this request, stating as a reason that it was impossible to do so because Thompson was in possession of the partnership property.

Thereupon, and during the year 1906, Vernon J. Parnell, as executor of the estate of Herbert Marriage, deceased, and as administrator of the partnership estate of John Marriage, surviving partner of Herbert Marriage, deceased, brought three suits in the district court of Kiowa county, two against defendant C. A. Thompson, and the third against defendants, John Marriage, C. A. Thompson, and W. A. Cottrell. In the first it was alleged that C. A. Thompson held the legal title to certain land in Kiowa county in trust for the partnership estate, and a decree was asked ordering a conveyance for the use and benefit of the partnership. The second suit against Thompson was for an injunction to restrain him from interfering with the possession of the plaintiff as executor of Herbert Marriage, deceased, and as administrator of the partnership estate, and from disposing of or converting any of the property of the partnership to his own use. The third suit was against the three defendants, and asked for a decree dissolving the partnership theretofore existing between the estate of Herbert Marriage, deceased, and John Marriage, and for a full and final accounting of the partnership business, and a further decree settling and determining the rights of the defendants to the partnership property and the possession thereof. A receiver was appointed to take charge of the property during the pendency of the suits. The several answers of the defendants denied the right of the plaintiff to maintain the actions, either as executor of the estate of Herbert Marriage, deceased, or as administrator of the surviving partnership, alleging that the probate court of Kiowa county was without jurisdiction to probate the American will, and that all proceedings in relation thereto were void, and that, under the terms of the partnership agreement, the probate court had no jurisdiction to appoint an administrator of the partnership estate, for the reason that the partnership by the terms of the contract continued after the death of Herbert Mar-seems, however, to have been reached in a Michigan case, which constitutes one of the exceptions above mentioned.

The question as to whether a statute authorizing an authenticated copy of a foreign will proved according to the laws of any of the United States, to be proved and recorded, operated as a limitation upon the jurisdiction of the court to admit the original will to probate, was also decided in the negative in Varnier v. Bevil, 17 Ala. 286, which is so fully set forth in the opinion in the case reported as to render any further statement thereof in this place superfluous.

So, also, in Re Coursen, 4 N. J. Eq. 408, it is held that jurisdiction to grant original probate of a foreign will is not taken away or impaired by a statute authorizing any surrogate to grant letters testamentary upon an exemplified copy of a foreign will proved in another state.

On the other hand, in Re Corning, 159 Mich. 474, 134 Am. St. Rep. 739, 124 N. W. 514, it was held that while there could be no doubt concerning the power of the probate court to administer assets found within the state, the statutes of the state evinced an intention to deny to the probate court power to admit to probate the will of a person domiciled in another state, before its validity is established in a proceeding in the courts of the domicile. The real-33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

soning of the court in support of this conclusion is contained in the following excerpt: "Power to admit wills to probate, and to grant administration of estates, is conferred upon probate courts, generally, by 1 Comp. Laws, § 650, which reads: 'The judge of probate for each county shall have power to take the probate of wills, and to grant administration of the estate of all persons deceased who were at the time of their decease inhabitants of, or residents in, the same county, and of all who shall die without the state leaving any estate within such county to be administered; and to appoint guardians to minors and others in the cases prescribed by law, and shall have and exercise all such other powers and jurisdiction as are or may be conferred by law.' It is further provided in 3 Comp. Laws, §§ 9282-9284, for admitting in this state wills of those who were domiciled abroad, and for the manner of disposing of estates of testators domiciled abroad whose wills are so admitted to probate here. These and other provisions of the statutes must be read together. It is plain that the legislature has recognized the right of the courts of the domicile of a testator to conclusively determine the validity of the will, and quite as plain that the courts of the domicile of this testator have made no such determination. It has been repeatedly held that the issue here riage, and was not to terminate until March 1, 1911. Defendant C. A. Thompson denied that he held the title to any of the real estate in trust for the partnership, and alleged that he had purchased it with his own funds and had taken the title in fee simple. The three suits were afterward consolidated and tried to the court, and separate findings of fact and conclusions of law were made.

Among the facts found are that Thompson was in possession and control of the ranch and partnership business from the time he moved there with his family in November, 1904; and that the representatives of the estate of Herbert Marriage had no knowledge of the various contracts made by the defendants until a short time prior to the institution of the suits, and never consented to or ratified the action of John Marriage in making the contract with Thompson; that Thompson brought cattle of his own to the ranch and mingled them with the partnership property, and the cattle were sold together and the proceeds deposited to the credit of Marriage and Thompson, without any separate accounts being kept; that Thompson sold other property of the partnership, and placed the proceeds to his individual credit at the bank; that the indebtedness of the ranch increased during his management from $3,000 to $6,800, to secure which John Marriage and C. A. Thompson, in November, 1905, executed a chattel mortgage on the partnership property.

As conclusions of law the court found: That the probate court had jurisdiction to admit the original will to probate; and that the plaintiff, as the representative of the estate, had the right to institute the suits; that the contract entered into between the defendants for the purchase of the Herbert Marriage interest in the ranch was void for want of power on the part of John Marriage to make it, and of no effect against the plaintiff, because the contract was inimical to the Herbert Marriage estate and made through fraud and collusion of the defendants; that the contract entered into between John Marriage and C. A. Thompson was void because made without authority on the part of John Marriage, and because of the fraudulent representations on the part of Thompson; that the title to the two quarter sections of land was held by Thompson in trust for the use and benefit of the partnership; and that the acts and conduct of John Marriage in making the several contracts in fraud of the interest of the deceased partner's estate, and the mingling of the property of other persons with the ranch property, and placing the partnership property and business out of his own control, were sufficient to authorize a decree dissolving the partnership.

Judgment was accordingly entered grant-upon the offering of a domestic will for probate is 'will or no will.' We have then these two methods provided by the legislature for admitting wills of deceased persons to probate: One, to try out every issue upon which validity of the instrument depends; the other, to accept the determination of all of these issues by the courts of the domicile of the testator. There is no method pointed out for admitting a will here as valid to the extent of appointment of an administrator of the estate, leaving the question of its validity to be determined at the domicile of the testator. It is not conceivable that the courts of this state will inquire about and finally decide that a certain instrument is, or is not, a valid will, subject to having the determination reversed by the courts of any other state. Assuming the right of each state to assert complete jurisdiction in rem over all property of decedents found within the state, including the right to determine, through its tribunals, the validity or nonvalidity of a foreign will, it is equally the right of each state, acting through its legislature, to accept as conclusive the judgment of the courts of the domicile of the testator as to the validity of his will, and to permit his property found in the state to be disposed of according to the provisions of the will. I find in the statutes sufficient evidence of a state policy which denies to the probate court of Saginaw county the jurisdiction which it assumed when it admitted the particular will to probate. Holding these views, it is not important to refer to and review decisions of courts of other states in which a different view is expressed."

In connection with the present discussion, it may also be noted that it has been held that the appointment of an administrator in the place of decedent's domicile is not a necessary prerequisite to the appointment of an administrator in a state where assets are found, as otherwise, if it should happen that administration should never be granted in the foreign state, the debts due in the state of the forum under such circumstances, to a deceased person, could never be collected, and the debts due from him to citizens of the state might remain unpaid. Stevens v. Gaylord, 11 Mass. 256; Wood v. Matthews, 73 Mo. 477.

Nor is it an essential prerequisite to the granting of letters of administration upon the estate of a decedent residing in another state, leaving a will, that the will should be first proved and allowed in the courts of the state in which the deceased was domiciled. Bowdoin v. Holland, 10 Cush. 17.

ing the relief prayed for, and the partnership property was ordered turned over to the plaintiff as executor of the last will and testament of Herbert Marriage, deceased, and as administrator of the partnership estate, to be dealt with as provided by law under the orders of the probate court. The defendants filed exceptions to the conclusions of fact and of law, which were overruled. Their motion for a new trial was denied and defendants Thompson and Cottrell bring the case here for review.

Mr. L. M. Day for John Marriage, appellee.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The making of two wills by a testator, one disposing of his property at his domicile, and the other of his property situated in a foreign country, although unusual, has undoubtedly the sanction of law, and there would seem to be no inherent objection to the validity of either, where each is separate and distinct and otherwise in conformity with law. 1 Underhill, Wills, § 284. The validity of such wills has been recognized in England. In Astor's Goods (1876) L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 150, 45 L. J. Prob. N. S. 78, 34 L. T. N. S. 856, 24 Week. Rep. 539; Murray's Goods [1896] P. 65, 65 L. J. Prob. N. S. 49, 44 Week. Rep. 414. The important question to be determined is whether the probate court had jurisdiction to admit to probate the original will of Herbert Marriage, the will not having been first probated in the courts of his domicile. The granting of letters testamentary or of administration by the probate court is the exercise of judicial authority. If regular in form, the letters are prima facie evidence of the regularity of prior proceedings, but are absolutely void if the court making the appointment had no jurisdiction. Perry v. St. Joseph & W. R. Co. 29 Kan. 420; Mallory v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 53 Kan. 557, 36 Pac. 1059; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Bennett, 58 Kan. 499, 49 Pac. 606; Ewing v. Mallison, 65 Kan. 484, 93 Am. St. Rep. 299, 70 Pac. 369.

After the case was tried, and before judgment, the plaintiff by leave amended his reply, and averred that, under the laws and practice in England, a subject or resident citizen thereof is authorized to dispose of his property in any other jurisdiction or country by a will separate and distinct from his will disposing of his property in England; that under the laws of England, when separate wills of this character are made, each reciting that it is to be executed and administered independent of the other, the courts of England hold that the only courts having jurisdiction to probate such wills are the courts of the country in which the property disposed of is located; and that in such cases the courts of England have refused probate of the will disposing of property in a foreign jurisdiction; and, further, that where a citizen of the United States has made two wills, separate and distinct from each other, one disposing of his property in the United States, and the other disposing of his property in England, the courts of England, in recognition of the comity existing between nations, have permitted the independent will covering property in England to be probated there. It is said in the brief that all these allegations were established to the satisfaction of the court, and that the court made findings of fact thereon, but the court merely found that the American will was never proved or admitted in the courts of England, and no finding was made in reference to what the laws of England are in respect to the matters referred to in the reply. Our attention has not been called to any evidence offered for the purpose of proving the averments. We are referred to numerous decisions of the English courts which we are at liberty to consider as precedents, but not in proof of the fact as to what the laws of England are. We take judicial notice of the laws of another state or of a foreign country for the purpose of aiding us in ascertaining and determining the laws of this state on a particular subject, but cannot do so for any other purpose. Missouri, K. & R. Co. v. Hutchings, 78 Kan. 758, 99 Pac. 230. Looking to the provision of our own laws, we find that § 8 of art. 3 of the Constitution provides: "There shall be a probate court in each county, which shall be a court of record, and have such probate jurisdiction and care of estates of deceased persons, minors, and persons of unsound minds as may be prescribed by law." Section 1974 of the General Statute of 1901, so far as applicable to the present case, reads: "The probate courts shall be courts of record, and, within their respective counties, shall have original jurisdiction: First, to take the proof of last wills and testaments, and admit them to probate, and to admit to record authenticated copies of last wills and testaments executed, proved, and admitted to probate in the courts of any other state, territory, or country; . . . seventh, to have and exercise the jurisdiction and authority provided by law respecting executors and administrators and the settlement of the estates of deceased persons." Section 2806 of the General Statute of 1901, respecting executors and administrators, reads: "That upon the decease of any inhabitant of this state, letters testamentary or letters of administration on his estate shall be granted by the probate court of the county in which the deceased was an inhabitant or resident at the time of his death; and when any person shall die intestate in any other state or country, leaving any estate to be administered within this state, administration thereof shall be granted by the probate court of any county in which there is any estate to be administered; and the administration which shall be first lawfully granted in the last-mentioned case shall extend to all the estate of the deceased within this state, and shall exclude the jurisdiction of the probate court in every other county."

Construing the first part of the section just quoted, it has been held that, where the deceased is a resident of this state, the probate court of a county has no jurisdiction over the estate unless the deceased, at the time of his death, was an inhabitant or resident of that county, and that the true place of residence of the deceased at the time of his death may be shown for the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

purpose of disproving jurisdiction, where the probate court has assumed jurisdiction to administer the estate. Ewing v. Mallison, 65 Kan. 484, 93 Am. St. Rep. 299, 70 Pac. 369. In §§ 7937 et seq. of the General Statute of 1901, relating to wills, are found the provisions concerning foreign wills. Section 7961 provides that authenticated copies of wills executed and proved according to the laws of any state or territory of the United States, relating to property in this state, may be admitted to record in the probate court of any county in this state where such property may be situated, and the authenticated copies so recorded shall have the same validity as wills made in this state. Section 7962 reads: "A will executed, proved, and allowed in any state or country other than the United States and territories thereof, according to the laws of such foreign state or country, may be allowed and admitted to record in this state in the manner and for the purpose mentioned in the following sections." Section 7963 provides that "a copy of the will and probate thereof, duly authenticated, shall be produced by the executor or by any person interested therein, to the probate court of the county in which there is any estate upon which the will may operate. . . ." Section "7964 provides that, after the instrument is allowed and recorded, the will, the probate, and the record thereof shall then have the same force and effect as if the will had been originally proved and allowed in the same court in the usual manner. Section 7965 provides for granting letters testamentary or of administration after allowing and admitting to record a will pursuant to the four preceding sections.

Appellants insist that it was the intention of the legislature, in the adoption of the sections we have cited, to make it mandatory on the heirs and devisees of a testator under a foreign will, to probate the will first at the domicile of the testator, and it is urged, as reasons which probably actuated the legislature in so providing, that it is easier to secure witnesses acquainted with the deceased and his handwriting at the place of his domicile; that, if original foreign wills were permitted by law to be probated in any county in this state where the testator left property, persons interested in the estate would be put to great expense in taking foreign depositions for the purpose of proving the will, and many opportunities would be afforded for fraud. The principal argument is that the method specifically provided by statute for admitting to record authenticated copies of a foreign will proved in the foreign jurisdiction is exclusive, and amounts to a limitation on the jurisdiction of probate courts. Some slight support for the appellant's contention is found in language used in the opinion in Meyers v. Smith, 50 Kan. 1, 31 Pac. 670. In that case the instrument, called a will, which it was claimed was executed by Isaac Johnnycake, was presented to the probate court of Wyandotte county, and that court ordered the will approved. The original instrument, however, was not produced, and the alleged probate was founded merely upon a certified transcript of a will executed in the Indian territory, and recorded in the office of the clerk of the United States district court of the territory, probably for safe-keeping. At all events, there was no proof that it had ever been probated at the domicile of the testator, and it was said in the opinion that the probate court evidently never intended nor believed that the order it made was an original probate of the will. In the opinion Mr. Justice Valentine used this language: "We might say here that there is no statute in Kansas which in terms would authorize a will not executed in Kansas, nor by a person residing therein nor dying therein, to be probated originally in Kansas, and all the implications of the statutes are against any such probating of any such will." The language quoted, however, was not necessary to the decision. As observed, the original will was never in Kansas, and it did not appear that there was any evidence before the probate court except the certified transcript, and the case turned on the fact that the will was not sufficiently probated or proved. The same question has often been decided, which is that an exemplified copy of a foreign will, although authenticated according to the act of Congress by the official custodian of wills in a foreign jurisdiction, is not sufficient to prove a testamentary title to lands without an exemplification of the judgment of some court of competent jurisdiction admitting the will to probate. Fenderson v. Missouri Tie & Timber Co. 104 Mo. App. 290, 78 S. W. 819.

The question under consideration here has never been determined by this court. That a plain distinction is made in the statutes between a domestic will, which must be probated, and a foreign will, which may be admitted to record, must be conceded, and also that there is no provision in our statutes anywhere providing in express terms for the original probate of a foreign will in this state. The usual practice has always been for the original probate to be made in the foreign state or country at the domicile of the testator, and, upon an authenticated copy showing probate there, for ancillary probate to be made here. The sections from 7961 to 7965 of the General Statute of 1901 all relate expressly to wills "executed, proved, and allowed" in any state or country other than the United States. We have to determine therefore whether the fact that the statutes expressly provide for the allowance and admission to record in this state of an authenticated copy of a will duly probated in any state or country other than the United States was intended as a limitation on the jurisdiction of the probate court, and excludes the power of that court to grant original probate of a foreign will. The reasons urged in support of that construction are far from satisfactory. It is frequently found necessary in the original probate of a domestic will, for the probate court to send a commission to a foreign country or to another state to procure the testimony of a subscribing witness who is beyond the jurisdiction of the court. So far as the likelihood of fraud on the court being perpetrated, the advantage would seem to be all in favor of the domestic court, which judicially determines for itself whether the will has been duly executed and is entitled to probate, instead of relying upon certified copies of proceedings in the courts of a foreign state.

The contention of the appellants requires us to assume that the legislature attached more importance to an authenticated copy of a will than to the original instrument itself. The original is always the better evidence. Does the fact that the legislature provided an elaborate scheme for the allowance and recording here of the copy of a foreign will which had been originally probated in the foreign state or country, and failed to make any express provision for the original probate here of such a will, compel the conclusion that it intended thereby to limit the general jurisdiction of probate courts to take the proof of last wills, and admit them to probate? We think not. The conclusion that we have reached is that the statute was not so intended; that its purpose was to enlarge, not to restrain, the jurisdiction of the probate court. While probate courts are sometimes spoken of as courts of limited jurisdiction, they have jurisdiction over certain, peculiar, exclusive subjects, and their jurisdiction is limited only in the sense that it is confined to the particular subject-matter; but within their province they are courts of general jurisdiction. Howbert v. Heyle, 47 Kan. 58, 27 Pac. 116; Higgins v. Reed, 48 Kan. 272, 29 Pac. 389; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 116. The existence of property within the state belonging to the estate of a deceased person is the fact which gives jurisdiction to the probate court; and the principle is of universal application that "every state has plenary power with respect to the administration and disposition of the estates of deceased persons, as to all property of such persons found within its jurisdiction." Re Clark, 148 Cal. 108, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 996, 113 Am. St. Rep. 197, 82 Pac. 760, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 306; Shields v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 119 N. C. 380, 25 S. E. 951; Putnam v. Pitney (Re Washburn) 45 Minn. 242, 11 L.R.A. 41, 47 N. W. 790. A statute of Minnesota authorized the probate of a will executed according to the laws of that state, whether previously probated in another state or not, and without reference to the domicile of the testator. In Putnam v. Pitney, supra, referring to the power of the probate courts of the state over the estate of a deceased person within the state, who was domiciled out of it, Mr. Justice Mitchell used this language: "This power over the estates of deceased persons situate within its jurisdiction is inherent in any state or country on common-law principles, of which the provisions of the probate Code in that regard are but declaratory." In 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 116, it is said: "The jurisdictional fact is the existence of assets within the state. Under such circumstances, the probate court of the county in which the property is situated has jurisdiction in the premises, and even the original probate may be had in that county, though, as a general rule, a will should be proved in this first instance at the testator's domicile."

In the statute conferring jurisdiction (Gen. Stat. 1901, § 1974), the word "probate," as it is used, applies solely to original wills, and the copies of wills properly authenticated are not admitted to probate, but are admitted to record. It must therefore have been the intention of the section to give the probate courts the same authority which all courts of probate had at the common law. Nor could it subserve any useful purpose first to require the will to be proved in the foreign jurisdiction before it can be admitted here. At the common law, the probate of a will in one state was of no validity whatever as affecting the title to lands in another. Robertson v. Pickrell, 109 U. S. 608, 27 L. ed. 1049, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407. The law of the place where real estate is situated governs the formality of the transfer of such property, and at common law the original will could be probated wherever there was real property devised thereby. McCormick v. Sullivan, 10 Wheat. 192, 6 L. ed. 300; Robertson v. Pickrell, supra. But it was often difficult to procure the original will after it had been probated in the courts of the domicile of the testator, and the evident purpose of the statutes in the various states authorizing copies of wills and their probate in a foreign country or sister state to be recorded, and to have the same effect as the original, was to overcome the hardships which often occurred by reason of the fact that the original will, having been probated at the place of the testator's domicile, could not be had for original probate. The statutes therefore must have been designed to enlarge, not limit, the original jurisdiction, which probate courts always exercised at the common law, to probate the original will regardless of where it was executed. The authorities, while not numerous, support this view.

In Varner v. Bevil, 17 Ala. 286, the question determined was in all respects the same as that presented here. The will of Samuel Varner was made in the state of Mississippi, where he was domiciled at the time of his death. He owned real estate and personal property in Alabama, and the sole question was whether there could be an original probate of the will in the courts of Alabama before the will had been proved in Mississippi. So far as appears in the opinion, the jurisdiction of the orphans' court there was the same as our probate court. It was contended there, as here, that the court was of limited jurisdiction, and that the statutes authorizing the admission and allowance of authenticated copies of foreign wills that had been proved in a foreign jurisdiction were a limitation on the power of the court, and that the probate court was without jurisdiction to admit the original will to probate. In the opinion it was said: "The statutes of this state make no express provision for cases of this kind. They authorize authenticated copies of wills proved according to the laws of any of the United States, and which embrace or concern property within this state, to be proved and recorded, subject to be contested and controverted, as the original will might be if offered. . . . We must then recur to the general law as recognized by the Code of International Comity, for the rules which must guide us in arriving at a correct conclusion. . . . Our statute, which provides for the probate in our courts of authenticated copies of foreign wills which have been proved according to the laws of any of the United States, or of any country out of the limits of the United States, was not designed to deny to our courts jurisdiction over the probate of the original will made in a foreign country, but disposing of property situated here. It but enlarges the jurisdiction of the court, enabling the parties to make the contest upon an authenticated copy of a foreign will proved according to the law of the domicile, in the same manner they might have done upon the original. It could not have been intended by the legislature, in authorizing copies to be proved, to affirm that the originals, which furnished the better evidence, should not be allowed to be proved or contested. This would be to reverse the rule of law which gives the preference to the primary over secondary evidence." Other authorities in point are: Stevens v. Gaylord, 11 Mass. 263; Spraddling v. Pipkin, 15 Mo. 118; Wood v. Matthews, 73 Mo. 477; Hyman v. Gaskins, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 267; Jaques v. Horton, 76 Ala. 238; Re Gordon, 50 N. J. Eq. 397, 26 Atl. 268; Pepper's Estate, 148 Pa. 5, 23 Atl. 1039; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 114 (2). 1 Woerner, Am. Law of Administration, § 226. We have not found, nor have we been cited to, any decisions holding the contrary. The American will shows on its face that it was executed in contemplation of, and attested in accordance with, the laws of Kansas. It disposes of property here in a form not repugnant to the laws or policy of the state, and was entitled to be probated here without being first probated at the testator's domicile.

The principal contention remaining is that the probate court of Kiowa county was without jurisdiction to appoint an administrator of the surviving partnership, inasmuch as the contract itself provided that the partnership should continue until 1911, notwithstanding the death of Herbert Marriage. The appellant's contention that the partnership was not dissolved by the death of Herbert Marriage must be granted. Notwithstanding the general rule that the death of one partner dissolves the partnership, it is otherwise when by will, or in the contract of partnership, the deceased has provided that the partnership shall continue after his death. Insley v. Shire, 54 Kan. 793, 45 Am. St. Rep. 308, 39 Pac. 713; Blaker v. Morse, 60 Kan. 24, 55 Pac. 274; Exchange Bank v. Tracy, 77 Mo. 594; 30 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 620, 653.

The real contention is that the probate court is only authorized to appoint an administrator of a surviving partnership estate where the death of one of the partners has caused a dissolution of the partnership, and the surviving partner, having been cited to appear and qualify as administrator, has declined to do so; that where it is provided in the contract of partnership, or by will of the deceased, that the partnership shall continue notwithstanding his death, the probate court has no jurisdiction over the partnership; and, further, that even though misconduct of the surviving partner might be sufficient to warrant a decree of dissolution by a court of equity, the probate court could not exercise jurisdiction until such decree was rendered. The fact that a partnership existed, and the death of a partner, gave the court jurisdiction to cite the survivor, and, upon his refusal to qualify, to appoint an administrator. Conceding that, since it is not a court of general equity jurisdiction, it has no authority to determine whether facts exist which would authorize a decree dissolving a partnership, still it had authority to determine whether the facts existed authorizing it to exercise jurisdiction and appoint an administrator, and its action cannot be the subject of collateral attack. Brenholts v. Miller, 80 Kan. 185, 101 Pac. 998. Wyandotte County v. Equitable Invest. Trust Co. 80 Kan. 492, 103 Pac. 996.

The contention is of slight importance, however, for reasons that will be stated. The continuing clause of the partnership agreement provided that, in the event of the death of Herbert Marriage, the contract should be carried out by his executors to the same extent as if he were living; but his executor was not bound by the continuing clause to stand by and permit the partnership property to be dissipated through the fraud and collusion of the surviving partner. There can be no question but that the abuse of trust, the misappropriation of the funds, the disagreement between the executor and the surviving partner, and the other facts shown by the findings, were sufficient to authorize the decree of dissolution. The utmost good faith is required of parties to a partnership. The court found that the surviving partner had placed the partnership property and business beyond his control, and that he had acted collusively and fraudulently in dissipating the partnership property and mingling it with property belonging to others. If these things had occurred in the lifetime of Herbert Marriage, a court of equity would not have hesitated to grant him relief by appointing a receiver and winding up the business. As the suits were brought by the plaintiff not only as administrator of the partnership estate, but also as executor under the will, it would seem to make very little difference whether the probate court had authority to appoint him as administrator of the partnership estate or not. The petition in either event stated a cause of action, and the findings of fact are abundantly sufficient to warrant the judgment and decree dissolving and winding up the partnership. The partnership having been dissolved, the probate court had jurisdiction over the settlement of the partnership estate. Although the evidence with respect to the Crebbin land and the Herbert J. Marriage land was conflicting, we think it was sufficient to support the findings, and that the conclusions reached by the trial court ordering a conveyance of this real estate were proper.

The judgment is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

J. W. PRESCOTT, Exr., etc., of Mary E. Prescott, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

ELIZABETH E. GRIMES et al.

(143 Ky. 191, 136 S. W. 206.)

Life tenant — duty to preserve property.

1. A life tenant is bound to make all ordinary, reasonable, and necessary repairs to preserve the property and prevent its going to decay or waste.

Same — liability of estate.

2. The estate of a life tenant is answerable for the cost of repairs which he should have placed upon the property during his lifetime.

Equity — jurisdiction — obligation to life tenant — enforcement.

3. Equity has jurisdiction of a proceeding

Note. — Duty of life tenant to keep property in repair.

As to whether life tenant or remainderman must bear the cost of a public improvement, see note to Meanor v. Goldsmith, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 342.

As to right of life tenant or one claiming under him to recover for improvements, see note to Frederick v. Frederick, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 514.

Duty of life tenant to repair.

The following cases hold that life tenants are bound to keep the property in repair: Stansbury v. Inglehart, 9 Mackey, 134; Beerman v. DeGive, 112 Ga. 614, 37 S. E. 883; Miller v. Shields, 55 Ind. 71; Hackworth v. Louisville Artificial Stone Co. 106 Ky. 235, 50 S. W. 34; Delker v. Owensboro, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 440, 98 S. W. 1031; Creutz v. Heil, 89 Ky. 432, 12 S. to hold the estate of a life tenant answerable for the sum necessary to make the repairs which he should have made upon the property.

Parties — joinder — heirs — obligation of life tenant.

4. Heirs whose interests in a remainder are identical may join in an action to hold the estate of the life tenant answerable for the cost of repairs which the life tenant should have made upon the property.

Estoppel — failure to compel life tenant to make repairs.

5. Failure of remaindermen to insist that the life tenant make the necessary repairs upon the property does not estop them from holding his estate answerable for the cost of those he should have made.

Limitation of actions — life tenant — duty to repair.

6. The amount which remaindermen may recover for failure of a life tenant to make necessary repairs to the property is not limited to the amount of deterioration of the property within the period of the statute of limitations, since the duty to place the property in repair exists at all times up to the expiration of the tenancy, and the statute begins to run against the liability only at such expiration.

Messrs. Talbott & Whitley, for appellees:

It is the duty of the life tenant to keep down taxes and interest and to make repairs.

Creutz v. Heil, 89 Ky. 432, 12 S. W. 926; Delker v. Owensboro, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 440, 98 S. W. 1031; Hackworth v. Louisville Artificial Stone Co. 106 Ky. 234, 50 S. W. 33; Greene v. Greene, 10 R. L. 619, 35 L.R.A. 793, 35 Atl. 1042.

It is the duty of the life tenant to leave the property in repair.

Boardman v. Howard, 64 L.R.A. 648, and note.

After notice to the executor of the life tenant of the amount of repair needed, and refusal by the executor to pay therefor, an action should lie against the estate of the life tenant, because a remainderman, after notice to the life tenant and refusal to repair, may take the repairs and recover from the life tenant.

Baker v. Eabin, 1 Chester Co. Rep. 293; Smith v. Mattingly, 96 Ky. 228, 28 S. W. 503; Robinson v. Miller, 2 B. Mon. 284; 3 Sedgw. Damages, 950; Taylor, Land. & T. § 686; 4 Kent, Com. § 76.

Lassing, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the settlement of her husband's estate in 1865, Mary Grimes was allotted as dower the dwelling and about 200 acres of Cooke, 1 Sim. & Stu. 552, 24 Revised Rep. 225, 1 Eng. Ch. 552; Marsh v. Wells, 2 Sim. & Stu. 87, 2 L. J. Ch. 191, 25 Revised Rep. 160.

In Brodie v. Parsons, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 831, 64 S. W. 426, it is held the duty of a life tenant to pay the cost of paving the sidewalk in front of the property, where the old pavement had been worn out by long use, the improvement being in the nature of a repair essential to the proper enjoyment of the property.

So, in Ballentine v. Spear, 2 Baxt. 269, permanent improvements, such as a roof and fencing, being necessary repairs, are chargeable to the tenant for life.

And in Miller v. Shields, 55 Ind. 71, a life tenant is bound to keep in repair the buildings, fences, etc., on the estate after coming into her possession, except where they are destroyed by the act of God.

So, in Hancox v. Meeker, 95 N. Y. 528, ordinary repairs, such as plate glass, etc., are held properly chargeable against the life tenant's estate.

It is held in Murch v. J. O. Smith Mfg. Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 193, 20 Atl. 213, that a life tenant is bound to keep the premises in as good repair as they were when the life tenancy began; he is bound to make those repairs rendered necessary by actual wear and tear, and to renew the roof and repaint when required to prevent decay.

So, in Brooks v. Brooks, 12 S. C. 422, a life tenant is held bound to maintain the estate in as good condition as when it came into his hands, and if the estate is one of a productive character, such as a plantation, that productive character must be maintained.

In Brough v. Higgins, 2 Gratt. 409, it is held that both life tenant and reversioner are entitled to apply the insurance to the repair of a building on the estate partially injured by fire. "By the strict common-law rule," says the court, "supposing there had been no insurance, the tenant is bound to repair, and, as the statute of Anne has not been incorporated in our Code, the tenant may be bound to repair the partial injuries from fire, at least so far as to prevent future dilapidations, to which such injury may expose the building. Under this aspect of the case, which devolves on the tenant the duty to make such repairs, the injuries to be repaired are exclusively his risks; and it seems to be a plain consequence of reason and justice that the indemnity stipulated for such injuries should inure to him who is bound to repair them."

In Greene v. Greene, 19 R. L. 619, 35 L.R.A. 793, 35 Atl. 1042, it is held that life tenants cannot be reimbursed for expenditures of the income of residuary real estate in making up a deficiency of the income of personal estate, from which a testator has directed trustees to pay the expense of repairs, insurance, taxes, and assessments on the real estate, no provision having been made for such deficiency.

It was held in Stansbury v. Inglehart, 9 Mackey, 134, that by the common law it was the duty of the life tenant to pay for repairs.

In Hackworth v. Louisville Artificial Stone Co. 106 Ky. 235, 50 S. W. 34, it is held that a life tenant must pay the cost of reconstructing a worn-out sidewalk in front of the premises. "The improvement," said the court, "was more in the nature of a repair, like putting on a roof, or doing any act which is necessary to preserve the property and prevent its decay."

Following the above cases, it is held in Delker v. Owensboro, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 440, 98 S. W. 1031, that a life tenant is liable for the cost of reconstructing a sidewalk in front of the property, it being in the nature of a repair.

In Re Heaton, 21 N. J. Eq. 221, on motion for order to sell infants' reversionary interest in lands, it is said by the court that "a life tenant is bound not to commit or permit waste; he is bound to make the repairs needed by the natural and usual wear and tear; to keep the premises in their original condition; to rebuild fences; to repaint the house, and to renew the roof land around it. The dwelling, outbuildings, and fencing upon the place were all in good repair. It was a handsome home, well kept. She lived there for several years, when she married one J. W. Prescott, who moved to her place, and together they occupied it until her death in 1908. Following her marriage but slight attention was paid to the care of the dwelling, outbuildings, and fencing, so that at the time of her death all were in a very much decayed and dilapidated condition. Her husband John Grimes had two children by a former wife, and, after her death, the heirs at law of these two children brought suit against her husband as executor of his wife's estate, in which they sought to recover of him damages for her failure to keep and maintain the dwelling and other improvements upon the place in repair. The claim was resisted by the executor, primarily upon the ground that a life tenant is not liable for permissive waste. The procedure by bill in equity was objected to as improper, the aid of the five and ten years statutes of limitation was invoked, and the plea of laches interposed. The case was prepared for trial, much proof taken, and upon final submission a judgment for $3,000 was entered in favor of the plaintiffs. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The evidence shows beyond dispute that in 1865, when the property in question was set apart to the widow of John S. Grimes as her dower interest in the estate, it was in good repair, and at her death in 1908 it and other parts of a house when they decay, so that he may hand it over to the remainderman as good as at the commencement of the life estate."

In Bostock v. Blakeney, 2 Bro. Ch. 653, it is held that a tenant for life with remainder to his first and other sons, remainder to his sisters, cannot lay out a sum of money on the estate, and charge it on the reversion, although the estate would be benefited.

In Re Leigh, L. R. 6 Ch. 892, 40 L. J. Ch. N. S. 687, 25 L. T. N. S. 644, 19 Week. Rep. 1105, it is held the duty of the tenant for life to keep up the buildings, although he may be punishable for waste.

In Stansbury v. Inglehart, supra, an action for the sale of an infant's real estate, it is held that by the common law repairs were charges which the life tenant was to meet.

In Hibbert v. Cooke, 1 Sim. & Stu. 552, 24 Revised Rep. 225, 1 Eng. Ch. 552, it was held that an expenditure in repairing a mansion damaged by dry rot was an expense to which a tenant for life choosing to occupy the property must submit.

In Crowe v. Crisford, 17 Beav. 507, 2 Week. Rep. 45, it was held that all ordinary repairs were to be paid out of the income payable to the life tenant out of that arising from the residuary real and personal estate, but not such extraordinary repairs as would amount to rebuilding the houses.

It was held in Marsh v. Wells, 2 Sim. & Stu. 87, 2 L. J. Ch. 191, 25 Revised Rep. 160, that a reversioner who, with privity of a life tenant, had renewed a lease in his own name, and covenanted to repair the premises, was to be considered to have entered into the covenant on behalf of the life tenant, and the latter's estate was liable for damages resulting from his neglect to repair.

So, in Wise v. Metcalfe, 10 Barn. & C. 299, 5 Moody & R. 235, L. J. K. B. 126, 9 Eng. Rul. Cas. 419, an action for dilapidations by the successor against the executor of a deceased rector, the incumbent was held bound to maintain the parsonage in 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

good and substantial repair, restoring and rebuilding when necessary, according to the original form without addition or modern improvements; but that he was not bound to supply or maintain anything in the nature of ornament, to which painting (unless necessary to preserve exposed timbers from decay) and whitewashing and papering belong.

According to Hamer v. Tilsley (1859) Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 486, a tenant for life cannot recoup an expenditure by him for repairs.

In Smith v. Poyas, 2 Desauss. Eq. 65, a devisee for life was held liable for a one-fourth part of the expense of repairing buildings on an estate.

In Re Laytin, 2 Connolly, 106, 20 N. Y. Supp. 72, a life tenant is held bound to make an ordinary repair, like that of a burst pipe, but that replumbing a house is a permanent improvement of benefit to both life tenant and remainderman, the cost of which should be apportioned between them.

In Kearney v. Kearney, 17 N. J. Eq. 59, it is held that a tenant for life is obliged to make no other repairs than such as are necessary to prevent waste.

In Wilson v. Edmonds, 24 N. H. 517, a life tenant is held bound to keep the buildings of the estate from going to decay by using ordinary care; but he is not required to expend any extraordinary sums.

In Perrine v. Newell, 62 N. J. Eq. 14, 49 Atl. 724, a life tenant was held liable for expense incurred by trustees in repairing banks which retained the tides and preserved the meadows in which the lands in question were included.

It is held in Baker v. Esbin, 1 Chester Co. Rep. 203, that a remainderman who makes necessary repairs after notice to the life tenant, who refuses and neglects to make them, can recover the amount so expended; and it was also held that where repairs were of a permanent nature, such as would enhance the remainderman's estate as compared with its condition when it came into the life tenant's possession, was in a very dilapidated condition. If the life tenant is liable at all for the permissive waste charged, the amount allowed by the court in his judgment is reasonable. As a general rule a tenant for life must make all ordinary, reasonable, and necessary repairs required to preserve the property and prevent its going to decay or waste, and, if he fails to do so, the remainderman may, by appropriate proceeding, either require him to make such repairs, or have them made and the interest of the life tenant in the property subjected in satisfaction of the cost thereof. The law casts upon the life tenant this burden because he receives all of the rents, income, and profits growing out of the use of the property during the life of his tenancy. He may not suffer it to go to decay or waste for want of necessary repairs any more than he may injure its value by acts of voluntary waste. In Creutz v. Heil, 89 Ky. 432, 12 S. W. 926, it was held that the life tenant must pay the taxes and keep the property improved. No distinction was made or drawn between the duties of paying the annual taxes assessed against the property and keeping up the repairs. For a failure to discharge either of these duties, the tenant would be guilty of permissive waste. Again in Delker v. Owensboro, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 440, 98 S. W. 1031, it is held to be the duty of the life tenant to pay the cost of reconstructing a pavement in front of his property, on the theory that this is a repair. To the same effect is Hackworth v.

the cost of such repairs should be apportioned between the life tenant and the remainderman.

In Harvey v. Harvey, 41 Vt. 373, it is held that although it is the duty of a tenant in dower to keep the estate in good repair, she cannot be held liable for waste where in relation to the buildings, fences, and lands, she has proceeded as a prudent man would with respect to the same if they had been his own absolutely. It was also held in this case that such a tenant, where the want of repair was causing no immediate injury to the estate, could delay a reasonable time in making repairs, in view of the very high price of labor and materials.

It is held in Clemence v. Steere, 1 R. I. 272, 53 Am. Dec. 621, that if a life tenant receives a house in such a state as not to be repairable, or so dilapidated that the expense of repair would be beyond the value of the house, he may leave it to its natural destruction; but if the house is such that repairs would make it tenantable, he is bound to make them.

—nonobligation of tenant to repair.

The following cases hold that life tenants are not obliged to repair the property: Sampson v. Grogan (Sampson v. Bagley), 21 R. I. 174, 44 L.R.A.711, 42 Atl. 712; Wood v. Gaynon, 1 Ambl. 395; Re Freman [1898] 1 Ch. 32, 67 L. J. Ch. N. S. 14, 77 L. T. N. S. 460; Re Baring [1893] 1 Ch. 61, 62 L. J. Ch. N. S. 50, 3 Reports, 37, 67 L. T. N. S. 702, 41 Week. Rep. 87; Re de Teissier's Settled Estates [1893] 1 Ch. 153, 62 L. J. Ch. N. S. 552, 3 Reports, 111, 68 L. T. N. S. 275, 41 Week. Rep. 186; Re Betty [1899] 1 Ch. 821, 68 L. J. Ch. N. S. 435, 80 L. T. N. S. 675; Re Courtier, L. R. 34 Ch. Div. 136, 56 L. J. Ch. N. S. 350, 55 L. T. N. S. 574, 35 Week. Rep. 85, 51 J. P. 117; Powys v. Blagrove, 4 DeG. M. & G. 448, 2 Eq. Rep. 1204, 24 L. J. Ch. N. S. 142, 2 Week. Rep. 700.

In Wood v. Gaynon, 1 Ambl. 395, on the filing of a bill by a reversioner to compel the life tenant to put and keep the premises 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) in repair, the court refused on the ground that no precedent could be produced where the court had made such a decree, and also said that it would tend to harass tenants for life, and that suits of this kind would be attended with great expense in depositions about repairs.

In Nairn v. Marjoribanks, 3 Russ. Ch. 582, 3 Eng. Ch. 582, the tenant for life presented a petition stating that he had expended considerable sums in repairs of the mansion house; that the roof was constructed on a bad principle, and unless it were removed and replaced the mansion would sustain considerable injury; that the removal and construction of the roof did not fall within the description of those ordinary repairs to which a tenant for life is liable, and would greatly benefit all parties interested in the estate. The prayer was for a reference to inquire whether it would be for the benefit of the parties interested in the property that the roof of the mansion house should be removed, and a new one constructed at the expense of the testator's estate. The court refused to make any order on the petition, stating that, even if the master should report that it would be for the benefit of all parties interested that improvement should be made in the mansion house, he would not confirm the report.

In Re de Teissier's Settled Estates [1893] 1 Ch. 153, 62 L. J. Ch. N. S. 552, 3 Reports, 111, 68 L. T. N. S. 275, 41 Week. Rep. 186, where the testator left the house in a dilapidated condition, the court refused to charge the interest of the infant tenant for life with the expenditure for repairs proposed by the trustees.

In Sampson v. Grogan (Sampson v. Bagley) 21 R. I. 174, 44 L.R.A. 711, 42 Atl. 712, it is held that a life tenant required by terms of the will to keep the estate in repair is not bound to rebuild in case of destruction by accidental fire.

Liability for permissive waste.

In Re Parry [1900] 1 Ch. 160, the estate of a life tenant of leaseholds was held not Louisville Artificial Stone Co. 106 Ky. 234, 50 S. W. 33. The views of textwriters and most courts of last resort are in accord with the principles announced in the decisions which we have cited.

The burden of keeping the property in reasonable repair being cast upon the life tenant, the question arises whether the remainderman may enforce this right against the estate of the life tenant after the death of the latter. There can be no question but what the remainderman at any time during the existence of the life estate might have, by appropriate action, compelled the life tenant to discharge all duties as to repairs, etc., which the law imposed upon him. As this right existed during the continuance of the life estate, it might have been enforced just prior to the death of the life tenant, and we see no good reason why his estate should not be answerable after his death for the cost of repairs that he should have made during his life. With the exception of certain excepted cases, under our statutes, all actions for money or breach of contract or duty survive, and may be prosecuted against the personal representative of the deceased. The action for waste is not one excepted out of the general provisions of the statute, and hence survives.

It is urged that, even though the action survives, it cannot be brought in equity, but must be brought at law. It is so held in certain jurisdictions, and such contention is supported by some of the text liable to the remainderman for damages as a consequence of life tenant's failure to keep the premises in repair as covenanted.

According to Moore v. Townshend, 33 N. J. L. 284, by the statutes of Gloucester (6 Edw. I, chap. 5), and Marlbridge, tenants for life are made liable for permissive waste; by the former the offender shall lose the thing wasted, and pay treble damages; and by the latter he "shall yield full damage and shall be punished by amercement grievously." The court said: "The instances in the earlier reports in which lessees for life or years were held liable for permissive waste, which consisted in injuries resulting from acts of negligence or omission, are quite frequent; and their liability is grounded, not on the covenants or agreements in the instruments of demise, but on the statute which subjected them to the action of waste."

So, in Roby v. Newton, 121 Ga. 679, 68 L.R.A. 601, 49 S. E. 694, a tenant for life is held liable to the reversioner or remainderman for actual damages resulting from permissive waste.

But in Sampson v. Grogan, supra, it is held that a life tenant's liability for permissive waste does not include damages by accidental fire; according to this case it is the consensus of opinion that a tenant for life is liable for permissive waste where the property is destroyed by fire through his negligence, but not where the property is destroyed by accidental fire.

It is held in Stevens v. Rose, 69 Mich. 259, 37 N. W. 205, that tenants for life not made unimpeachable for waste by the person granting the estate are liable for permissive waste.

In Re Williames (1884) 52 L. T. N. S. 40, affirmed on appeal in (1885) 54 L. T. N. S. 105, the executor of a deceased life tenant was made liable for permissive waste by a life tenant; but this ruling was based on the fact that the omission to repair was a breach of condition or implied contract contained in the will.

In Sherrill v. Connor, 107 N. C. 630, 12 S. E. 588, a tenant in dower was held not liable for permissive waste in suffering to 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

fall into decay a barn not used because of the changed condition of the country and use of the farm, the court saying: "A tenant in dower, or other life tenant, who by neglect or wantonness occasions permanent waste or injury to the inheritance, whether voluntary or permissive, thereby subjects himself to liability to pay the actual damages or treble damages, at the discretion of the judge, and also to forfeit the place wasted on a day to be fixed by the judge, if she should meantime fail to pay damages recovered of her."

It is held in Patterson v. Central Canada Loan & Sav. Co. 29 Ont. Rep. 134, that an action for permissive waste will not lie against a life tenant, the court saying: "The buildings were very old and have suffered from decay and exposure; but the tenant is not legally bound to repair, in the absence of a direction to that effect in the instrument creating the present and the reversionary estate. If premises are suffered to become dilapidated by omission to repair, and so run down through mere neglect, that is no more than permissive waste, for which an action does not lie. . . . Though it may be the duty of the tenant for life, and in his own interest, to keep up the buildings in habitable shape, he cannot charge the expense on the inheritance, nor can he be dispunishable for waste if he abstains."

It is held in Cannon v. Barry, 59 Miss. 289, that courts of equity will take no jurisdiction of permissive waste by a life tenant, such as suffering a mansion to go to decay or failure to keep up an orchard.

But in Cole v. Bickelhaupt, 64 App. Div. 6, 71 N. Y. Supp. 636, an assignee of a tenant for life was held liable for treble damages for waste, where timber was cut, and an orchard and the farm in general were allowed to become ruinous by inattention.

In Re Cartwright, L. R. 41 Ch. Div. 532, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 590, 60 L. T. N. S. 891, 37 Week. Rep. 612, a life tenant was held not liable for permissive waste.

In Dozier v. Gregory, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 100, where the husband of a life tenant in dower was held not liable for permissive writers; but such is not the practice in this state, for in Smith v. Mattingly, 96 Ky. 228, 28 S. W. 503, after reviewing fully the law of procedure down to that time, it is stated that "the remedy by equitable proceeding is more easy, expeditious, and complete than by an action ordinary," intended to restrict the right to sue at law to the action for voluntary waste, provided for in § 1, quoted, whereby, in case the jury finds the waste was wantonly committed, treble damages may be assessed, leaving exclusive jurisdiction of cases of permissive waste to courts of equity." This opinion is conclusive of the question, and settles it adversely to the claim of appellant.

It is next urged that there was a misjoinder of parties, and that the motion to elect which should prosecute should have been sustained. As stated, John S. Grimes left surviving him two children. William, a son, and Sallie, a daughter, who married one Logan. William died intestate, and left surviving him two children, the plaintiffs to this suit. Sallie Logan died testate, and by her will devised to the children of her brother, William, her undivided interest in the land in question. They then became by inheritance from their father and devise from their aunt the owners in fee of the entire tract. They are joint tenants, claim from and through the same source, and their interests are identical. In Smith v. Mattingly, supra, the right of all the remaindermen to be joined as plaintiffs to this suit. Sallie Logan died testate, effect are Newman v. Kendall, 2 A. K. Marsh, 234, and King v. Bullock, 9 Dana, 41. These decisions upon this question of practice are supported by § 22 of the Code, which provides that "all persons having an interest in the subject of an action and in obtaining the relief demanded may be joined as plaintiffs, unless it is otherwise provided in this Code." The interests of the plaintiffs in the subject of this action are identical. They each seek to recover such damages as will compensate the estate for waste after his wife's death, the court freely discusses the question whether a tenant in dower or a tenant for life is liable for mere permissive waste, and says that it seems questionable whether the statute of Gloucester, which prescribes a penalty for waste by a life tenant and authorizes a writ of waste, extends to any case of mere permissive waste, and, indeed, whether a tenant for life is liable to any penalty, forfeiture, or action for merely neglecting to repair, unless he be under express directions or agreement to do so.

In Griffin v. Fleming, 72 Ga. 697, it is held that a testator by will may relieve the life tenant of the duty to make repairs, and place the title of the property in the executor.

Remedy.

The ordinary remedy to compel a life tenant to make repairs to prevent property from deteriorating is by mandatory injunction. Sawyer v. Adams, 140 App. Div. 756, 126 N. Y. Supp. 128.

According to Clement v. Wheeler, 25 N. H. 361, the remedy by injunction is applicable to every species of waste, it being to prevent a known and certain injury.

So, in Caldwell v. Baylis, 2 Meriv. 408, where buildings were allowed to decay and become ruinous, an injunction against permissive waste was granted.

It is said in Moore v. Townshend, 33 N. J. L. 284, that the action on the case in the nature of waste has almost entirely superseded the common-law action of waste, as well for permissive as for voluntary waste, as furnishing a more easy and expeditious remedy than a writ of waste, and that it is also an action encouraged by the courts, the recovery being confined to single damages, and not being accompanied by a forfeiture of the place wasted. 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

In Smith v. Mattingly, 96 Ky. 228, 28 S. W. 503, it is held that the sections of the Kentucky statute providing that if a tenant for life shall commit waste, "he shall be subject to an action of waste, shall lose the thing wasted, and pay treble the amount at which the waste shall be assessed," and if waste is wantonly committed, "judgment shall be entered for three times the amount of the damages assessed,"—apply to active, and not permissive, waste. The court, in discussing the question whether an action ordinary in the nature of trespass on the case can be maintained by a reversioner or remainderman against a tenant for permissive waste, "states that an examination of the history of legislation on the subject of waste, has satisfied us that action on the case for permissive waste, if it ever was a proper action therefor, was intended to and has been abolished by statute," and concludes that the jurisdiction of cases of permissive waste is left to courts of equity.

In Powys v. Blgrave, 4 DeG. M. & G. 448, 2 Eq. Rep. 1204, 24 L. J. Ch. N. S. 142, 2 Week. Rep. 700, it is held that equity will not interfere by injunction in cases of permissive waste, at the instance of a remainderman, against an equitable tenant for life in possession.

In Barnes v. Dowling (1881) 44 L. T. N. S. 809, 45 J. P. 635, 767, it is held that an action at law for permissive waste will not lie against a life tenant. The court said that the weight of authority in equity is therefore clearly against an action for permissive waste, and if there is any variance between the rules of equity and the rules of common law with reference to permissive waste, we are bound to give effect to the former.

the damage done by the failure of the life tenant to keep the property in reasonable repair. The court did not err in refusing to require them to elect.

The only remaining questions are, Did the court err in refusing to uphold the pleas of the statutes of limitation and laches? It being the duty of the life tenant to keep the place in reasonable repair, it is urged that, when the remaindermen discovered that this was not being done, they should have demanded of the life tenant that the necessary repairs be made, and upon her refusal to comply with their request, they should have taken steps to compel her to do so; that, inasmuch as they made no such request, and took no steps to compel her to make repairs, they, by their silence and inaction, acquiesced in the conduct of the life tenant, and are by reason of their acts estopped from now seeking to recover damages of her estate on that account. Or, if this is not so, they should at least be restricted in their recovery to such damages as the estate suffered by reason of the permissive waste during the five years, or, at most, ten years, next before the institution of their suit. There would be much force in this argument if there was any definite time fixed within which the repairs must be made. But the law imposes upon the life tenant only the duty to so manage the estate that, at the expiration of the tenancy or term, he may deliver up the property in a reasonable condition of repair. He might suffer the property to become out of repair for years, and later fix it up, in which event the remaindermen would have no cause for complaint; and even though years had run before any effort was made to compel the life tenant to repair, when such effort was made, the court would undoubtedly require the tenant to place the property in reasonable repair, taking into consideration its condition when the life tenancy began. Such a rule is but equitable and just, for the life tenant, having had the 281a, that permissive waste was punishable by the statute of Gloucester.

In St. Paul Trust Co. v. Mintzer, 65 Minn. 124, 32 L.R.A. 756, 60 Am. St. Rep. 444, 67 N. W. 657, where a life tenant neglected and refused to make necessary repairs on the homestead, it was held that the administrator could have a receiver appointed, and apply the proceeds of the income or rentals of the property collected to reimburse the administrator for the expense of repairs made by him, and, if need be, sell the property for that purpose.

Effect of statute of limitations.

There is unquestionably a dearth of authority on the question whether the statute of limitations can be pleaded in an action for permissive waste.

In Powell v. Dayton, S. & G. R. Co. 16 Or. 33, 8 Am. St. Rep. 251, 16 Pac. 863, an action against a tenant in possession under a lease, for damages for waste in failing to make tenantable repairs and in suffering a warehouse to be washed away, it was held that the statute of limitations did not commence to run against an action for waste until the time given by the lease for exercising the privilege of purchase had expired.

In Sherrill v. Connor, 107 N. C. 630, 12 S. E. 588, where a tenant in dower had suffered a barn to fall into decay, the court said: "We think that his Honor erred when he told the jury that, on account of the continuous character of the injury, no statute of limitations applied to the permissive waste. While we find no direct authority upon the question, the general principles governing the assessment of damages, and the application of them, in other analogous cases, lead us to a conclusion very different. . . . The jury 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

cannot allow prospective damages, where the roof of a building has become decayed, for the value of the whole building, on the supposition that the tenant will suffer the decay to continue till the structure shall have rotted and fallen down. The tenant is at liberty to replace the roof, and restore the building to its original condition, and if he does so, the decay is arrested, and the accruing liability ceases. . . . It being apparent that, from the nature of the case, the liability for permissive waste to the same building may be the subject of separate actions, where it is continued after one recovery, we can see no reason why his Honor should not have limited the extent of the recovery by the plaintiffs, laboring under no disability such as prevented the statute from running, to three years before the action was brought."

In Dashwood v. Magniac [1891] 3 Ch. 306, 60 L. J. Ch. N. S. 809, 65 L. T. N. S. 811, an action for permissive waste, the defendants relied on the various statutes of limitations, particularly the statute 21 Jac. I. chap. 16, and the real property limitation act 1874, as a bar to the action; but the parties came to an arrangement as to the sum payable for dilapidations, and, in the course of the argument, the point as to the plaintiff's right of action being barred by the statute of limitations was given up by the defendants' counsel.

use and benefit of the property during his entire term, if, instead of spending a small sum of money annually to keep it in repair, he has preferred to let it run for several years before he voluntarily makes the repair, or is called upon to do so, he is in no condition to complain that the expense or cost thereof is considerable.

As it is the duty of the life tenant to so manage the property as to leave it in a reasonable condition of repair at the expiration of his tenancy, the plea of the statute of limitations cannot avail. The duty of the tenant is to leave the property in reasonable condition and repair at the end of the term, and this duty keeps pace with the life of the tenancy. It is an ever-present, existing duty, and, when the court comes to enforce this duty the inquiry is not when the waste occurred, or how long it has been permitted to run, but what is the extent thereof, and what sum will be required to make the necessary repairs. During the life of the tenancy, there is no limitation to the time within which the action to compel reparation for permissive waste must be commenced.

On consideration of the whole case, we are constrained to hold that the conclusion reached by the chancellor was both equitable and just, for the life tenant was intrusted with the use of a valuable estate, upon which the improvements were in splendid repair when she took possession thereof. It was incumbent upon her to give it such care and attention as a reasonably prudent man would give his own property so as to keep it in repair. This she failed to do, and the judgment against her estate is but a fair estimate of the damage occasioned by this neglect on her part.

Judgment affirmed on original and cross appeal.

TITLE GUARANTY & SURETY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
BANK OF FULTON.

(89 Ark. 471, 117 S. W. 537.)

Insurer — indemnity bond — delivery.

1. Delivery of an indemnity bond is shown by evidence that it was executed by the insurer and sent by him to the agent of the assured, and that shortly afterwards the premium was paid to and accepted by the insurer.

Same — signature by principal — necessity.

2. A fidelity insurance bond issued by a corporation in consideration of a premium 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

paid need not be signed by the principal to render it valid, in the absence of any stipulation in the instrument or elsewhere which requires such signature.

Same — employer's statement — warranty.

3. A clause in a fidelity insurance bond which requires a statement from the employer as to habits and accounts of the employee whose fidelity is to be insured, and provides that said statement shall constitute part of the basis and consideration of the contract, does not make the statement a warranty so as to avoid the policy in case it is incorrect through mere mistake.

Evidence — embezzlement — letters announcing shipment of money.

4. Letters announcing shipments of money to a bank are not competent evidence to establish the fact of actual shipment, for the purpose of establishing its embezzlement by an officer of the bank who has since absconded.

(Battle, J., dissents.)

(February 15, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hempstead County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fidelity insurance bond. Affirmed on condition.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. W. Blackwood and Bradshaw, Rhoton, & Helm for appellant.

Messrs. James H. McCullum, Etter & Monroe, and John A. Hope, for appellee:

A guaranty company is liable on its bond insuring the fidelity of an employee, without his signature, when issued upon his application, except in cases where it is positively and specifically provided that no liability attaches without it.

Note. — What reference in policy to application will make it part of policy.

This question is discussed in a note to Spence v. Central Acci. Ins. Co. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 88, where the earlier cases will be found collected. Since the preparation of that note, it was held in Eminent Household, C. W. v. Prater, 24 Okla. 214, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 917, 103 Pac. 558, that where a policy of insurance declared that it was executed in consideration of the warranties in insured's application, and that the same were a part of the contract of insurance, and the application warranted that the insured's answers to the medical examiner were "true and accurate," such answers were warranties, and a false statement made therein by the assured avoided the policy.

Frauenthal, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On June 22, 1906, T. C. Hockersmith was the cashier of the Bank of Fulton, and he had been such cashier for some time prior to that date. On that day he made application for a surety bond guarantying his fidelity as such cashier to Duncan, Horton, & Robinson, located at Poplar Bluff, Missouri, who were the local agents of the Title Guaranty & Surety Company. On the same day Duncan, Horton, & Robinson transmitted by mail the application to the Title Guaranty & Surety Company at Scranton, Pennsylvania, the domicile of that company, and in their letter stated that the application was for bond in the sum of $10,000 in behalf of T. C. Hockersmith as cashier of the Bank of Fulton. Thereafter the Title Guaranty & Surety Company transmitted by mail the bond from Scranton, Pennsylvania, to Duncan, Horton, & Robinson, at Poplar Bluff, Missouri, and in their letter transmitting same stated: "We inclose herewith bond No. 44,478 in behalf of T. C. Hockersmith; the premium upon which of $25 we have charged to your account." On June 28, 1906, Duncan, Horton, & Robinson transmitted the bond by mail to T. C. Hockersmith at Fulton, Arkansas, who at the time was cashier of the bank, and in their accompanying letter state: "We are pleased to inclose you Title Guaranty & Surety bond in the sum of $10,000 issued to the Bank of Fulton in your behalf as cashier." Prior to transmitting the bond to Fulton, Arkansas, a record of the bond was made in their registry by Duncan, Horton, & Robinson, which shows: "Bond No. 44,478 dated May 16th, 1906, term one year, expiration May 16th, 1907; name of employer, Bank of Fulton, address, town of Fulton, Arkansas; position, cashier, amount of bond $10,000, premium $25." The original bond could not be found, but E. M. Robinson, the agent of appellant, testified that it was on one of the regular forms of surety bonds issued by appellant, a copy of which was produced, and is as follows:

The Title Guaranty & Surety Company.
Amount, $10,000. Annual Premium, $25.
Bond No. 44478.

Whereas, Bank of Fulton, hereinafter called the employer, is employing or intends to employ T. C. Hockersmith in the capacity as cashier; and,

Whereas, the employee has filed with the Title Guaranty & Surety Company, hereinafter called the company, an application specifying the amount of security required from said employee, and they jointly having applied to the company for the grant of this bond; and,

Whereas, the company in consideration of the sum of twenty-five and no/100 dollars, now paid as a premium from May 16th, 1906, to May 16th, 1907, 12 o'clock noon, has agreed, upon the terms, provisions, and conditions herein contained, to issue this bond to the employer; and,

Whereas, the employer has heretofore delivered to the company certain representations and promises relative to the duties and accounts of the employee, and other matters, it is hereby understood and agreed that those representations and such promises, and any subsequent representations or promises of the employer, hereafter required by or lodged with the company, shall constitute part of the basis and consideration of the contract hereinafter expressed.

Now, therefore, this bond witnesseth: That for the consideration of the premises the company shall, during the term above mentioned, or any subsequent renewal of such term, and subject to the provisions and conditions herein contained, at the expiration of three months next after proof satisfactory to the company, as hereinafter mentioned, make good and reimburse to the said employer, such pecuniary loss as may be sustained by the said employer, by reason of the fraud or dishonesty of the said employee in connection with the duties of his office or position, amounting to embezzlement or larceny, and which shall have been committed during the continuance of said term, or of any renewal thereof, or within six months thereafter, or within six months from the death or dismissal or retirement of said employee from the service of the employer within the period of this bond, whichever of these events shall first happen; the company's total liability on account of said employee under this bond or any renewal thereof, not to exceed the sum of ten thousand and no/100 dollars. . . . That, no one of the above conditions or of the provisions contained in this bond shall be deemed to have been waived by or on behalf of the company, unless the waiver be clearly expressed in writing, over the signature of its president and its secretary, and its seal thereto affixed.

And the employee doth hereby for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant and agree to and with the company, that he will save, defend, and keep harmless the company from and against all loss and damage of whatsoever nature or kind, and from all legal and other costs and expense, direct or incidental, which the company shall or may at any time sustain or to be put to (whether before or after any legal proceedings by or against it to recover under this bond, and without notice to him thereof), or for or by reason or in consequence of the company having entered into the present bond.

In witness whereof, the said _____ (employee) has hereunto set his hand and seal and the company has caused this bond to be sealed with its corporate seal, duly attested by the signature of its _____ president, and of its _____ secretary, that _____ day of _____ one thousand nine hundred and _____.

On August 6, 1906, a draft of the Bank of Fulton on the Exchange National Bank of Little Rock for $25 was received by Duncan, Horton, & Robinson in payment of the premium of the bond, which they had transmitted to appellant on July 25, 1906.

At the time the application was made for the bond there was transmitted therewith the following statement:

Employer's Declaration.

The foregoing applicant has been in the service of the undersigned employer two years and _____ months, and the duties required have always been performed in a faithful and satisfactory manner. The accounts were last audited on the 11th day of June, and were correct in every particular. There has never come to the notice or knowledge of the employer any act, fact, or information tending to indicate that the applicant is negligent, unreliable, deceitful, dishonest, or unworthy of confidence. As far as the employer knows, applicant's habits are good, and the employer knows no reason why you cannot safely assume the suretyship applied for.

The above and foregoing statements and representations are made for the purpose of inducing the Title Guaranty & Surety Company to execute said bond.

Dated at Fulton, Arkansas, the 21st day of June, 1906.

Bank of Fulton (Employer),
By H. L. B'Shers.

This statement was signed by H. L. B'Shers, who at the time was president of the Bank of Fulton. On June 11, 1906, there was a stockholders' meeting of the bank. At that meeting Hockersmith made a statement of everything relating to the books and accounts of the bank, and B'Shers, and some one else, went through the books. Hockersmith on that day made a report of the condition of the affairs of the bank to the board of directors, who examined the report. The officers of the bank had great confidence in Hockersmith, and did not know, and had no reason to know, of any dereliction or dishonesty on the part of Hockersmith; and, when Mr. B'Shers signed the above statement, he did so in good faith, believing same to be true. It appears from the teller's cashbook that there was an item of debit on the account of Hockersmith of $1,492.25, which occurred on every date from February 21, 1906, until Hockersmith left the bank, in May, 1907. Hockersmith continued as cashier of the Bank of Fulton until May, 1907, when he absconded. Thereafter an examination of the books of the Bank of Fulton was made by an expert accountant, from whose testimony it appears that Hockersmith had embezzled from the Bank of Fulton the sum of $11,773.90 from May 16, 1906, to May 16, 1907. Thereafter the appellee instituted suit against appellant on said bond, and recovered judgment for $10,000 against appellant, from which this appeal is taken.

1. The appellant contends that the evidence in this case fails to show that the bond was actually delivered, or that it was signed by Hockersmith, and that on that account the judgment should be reversed. The testimony in this case shows that a written application was made and sent by mail by the cashier, Hockersmith, to the appellant, through its duly authorized agents, for the execution of the bond sued on herein; that the appellant accepted and approved the application, and thereupon signed the bond, and through its authorized agents sent the bond by mail to the appellee. The letter inclosing the bond was addressed to T. C. Hockersmith at Fulton, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ark., who at the time was the agent and cashier of the appellee at its place of business at Fulton, Arkansas. Within a short time thereafter the premium and consideration for the execution of the bond was paid to the appellant and accepted by it. This operated as a full delivery of the bond. In this case the bond was first sent by the appellant to its agents unconditionally, and with instructions to deliver the same to the appellee. This itself would bind the appellant, and was tantamount to a delivery to the appellee, even though the agent had never parted with the possession of the bond. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Babcock, 104 Ga. 67, 42 L.R.A. 88, 69 Am. St. Rep. 134, 30 S. E. 273. In fact, the acceptance of an application for indemnity or insurance, and mailing of the bond or policy, are all of the acts that are necessary or essential to put the contract into force. Fidelity Mut. Life Assn. v. Harris, 94 Tex. 25, 86 Am. St. Rep. 813, 57 S. W. 635. In the case of Bostwick v. Van Voorhis, 91 N. Y. 353, it was shown that one Bartow was chosen cashier of the bank, and his bond fixed at $30,000, upon which suit was brought. The bond was actually executed by the sureties, and Bartow thereafter entered upon the discharge of his duties as cashier. No direct evidence was given that the bond was ever delivered to or that it was ever in the possession of the bank, or that the sureties were ever formally approved. And in that case it was held that it was a fair and legal inference from these facts that the bond was delivered to and accepted by the bank. In the case of the State Mut. F. Ins. Assn. v. Brinkley Stave & Heading Co. 61 Ark. 1, 29 L.R.A. 712, 54 Am. St. Rep. 191, 31 S. W. 157, this court held that when an application made to the local agent of a foreign insurance company is by him forwarded to the company at its domicile, at which place the application is accepted, and the policy of insurance signed and mailed to the applicant, the contract is then and there complete. So in this case, when the appellant accepted the application for the bond and approved the same, and thereupon actually signed the bond and deposited it in the mail addressed to its agents, with instructions for unconditional delivery, and thereupon the agents mailed same to appellee, these acts constituted a delivery of the bond to appellee. Travelers' F. Ins. Co. v. Globe Soap Co. 85 Ark. 169, 122 Am. St. Rep. 22, 107 S. W. 386. The letters that passed between the various parties showed clearly the execution of the bond, the amount thereof, the length of time for which it ran, and that it was executed to the appellee as obligee to guarantee the fidelity of Hockersmith, its cashier. The evidence shows that the premium for the bond was actually paid and received by the appellant, and the appellant therefore understood that the bond was in full force and effect. It is claimed by the appellant that the evidence does not show that the cashier, Hockersmith, had signed the bond. This bond does not stipulate that it is essential to the validity of the contract that the employee, Hockersmith, should sign the same, and that it should be of no effect until he did sign it. The bond was executed for the benefit of the appellee, and it was the one who under the terms of the bond was to be protected by its provisions. The appellee was the party indemnified and the sole obligee in the bond; and, unless the bond had expressly stated that it should not take effect until it was signed by Hockersmith, the employee, it was binding upon its execution by the appellant and delivery to the appellee. Nowhere in the correspondence, which was introduced in evidence, does the appellant even suggest that the employee, Hockersmith, should sign the bond, and under the testimony in this case there is nothing to show that the signature of Hockersmith was essential to the validity of the bond. First Nat. Bank v. Fidelity & G. Co. 100 Am. St. Rep. 765, 774, note.

2. It is urged by the appellant that the statement designated above as the "employer's declaration" became a part of the bond, and is a warranty, and that, if any of the statements therein contained is incorrect, the bond became thereby avoided. In order to determine whether these statements are warranties or mere representations, it is necessary to consider the nature of the bond sued on, and what construction the law makes relative to the provisions of such bonds. This is not an ordinary obligation given by a surety, but it is an indemnity bond, and is in the nature of a contract of insurance, insuring the fidelity of the employee. It is said by this court in American Bonding Co. v. Morrow, 80 Ark. 49, 117 Am. St. Rep. 72, 96 S. W. 613: "It is now well settled that the bond of a surety company, like any other insurance policy, is to be most strongly construed against the insurer. The language of the bond is that selected and employed by the insurer, and, when doubtful or ambiguous, must be given the strongest interpretation against the insurer which it will reasonably bear." And so, in determining the nature of the provisions of this bond, we first look to see whether the provisions are susceptible of two constructions. If they are, then we must adopt that construction which is most favorable to the bank. This is the well-settled doctrine as to the construction of such instruments as the bond sued on in this case. American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 170 U. S. 133, 42 L. ed. 977, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 552. Now, if it had been the intention of the parties to make these statements in the "employer's declaration" warranties, it should have been so stated. But the bond does not say that any of these statements is a warranty. It does not employ any language which says, or can be construed to say, that any of these statements is a warranty. If it had been so desired, the bond could have well stated that, if any of the statements made in the "employer's declaration" was incorrect, then the bond should be void. But there is no language of that kind in the bond, or in the employer's declaration, and the court cannot construe any such language into it. In the case of Supreme Council, R. A. v. Brashears, 89 Md. 624, 73 Am. St. Rep. 244, 43 Atl. 866, it is held that statements by an applicant for life insurance which by the terms of the policy are made part of the contract with the insurance company are not to be regarded as warranties, unless the policy upon its face plainly declares that they shall be treated as such. Supreme Council, C. K. A. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 11 C. C. A. 96, 22 U. S. App. 439, 63 Fed. 48. The general rule is that a statement in an application is a representation rather than a warranty, unless it is made a warranty by express terms, or by such language that it cannot be construed otherwise. 2 Joyce, Ins. § 1891.

It is contended that because the bond states that the representations in the declaration shall constitute a part of the basis of the contract these representations should be considered warranties. But in the case of American Popular L. Ins. Co. v. Day, 39 N. J. L. 89, 23 Am. Rep. 198, the application for the policy involved contained an agreement that the answers and statements should be the basis and form part of the contract of the policy, and the policy further declared that the insurance was in consideration of the representations; and in that case the court held that the agreement and statements in the application were not warranties, and that the policy could be only avoided for fraud or intentional misrepresentation. It is well settled that forfeitures are never favored, and, if the contract does not specifically and definitely provide for such forfeiture, the courts will not by a species of construction read a forfeiture into it. So, in the construction of the provisions of this bond, if by any reasonable interpretation thereof a forfeiture of it can be avoided, such interpretation should be given to it, and the contract sustained. Taking into consideration all of the terms contained in the "employer's declaration," it is shown that it was intended by the statements therein to represent the condition of the bank, and the accounts of the bank, as it was then understood, and the character and habits of the employee, Hockersmith, as then known to the employer. These were mere representations, and, if they were made honestly and in good faith, the fact that they were incorrect would not vitiate the bond. The testimony shows clearly that these representations were made in good faith, and that there was an honest basis for the making of the same. There had been a meeting of the board of directors, and a report of the condition of the bank was presented to them, and the books of the bank were before them. It is true that no expert accountant examined these books and accounts, but the terms of this declaration did not call for such an examination. The examination made was such as the board of directors were accustomed to make of the accounts of the bank in the ordinary discharge of their duties, and the statement set forth in the declaration was honestly made. We are therefore of the opinion that even though the above "employer's declaration" was duly authorized by the bank, and the statements therein were afterwards found to be incorrect, they were not warranties, nor were they of such a material and essential nature as that their incorrectness would work a forfeiture of the contract, if they were made in good faith.

3. It is urged by the appellant that the evidence does not show that the shortage amounted to $10,000. The evidence shows that soon after the cashier, Hockersmith, absconded, the appellant sent to the Bank of Fulton an expert accountant for the purpose of going thoroughly through the books and accounts of the bank and finding out the amount of the shortage during the life of the bond,—between May 16, 1906, and May 16, 1907. This accountant testified that the amount of the shortage that occurred during that period was $11,773.90. This shortage was made up of items to which the accountant testified, and the only items that were not established by competent testimony were the item of $2,000 for currency shipped May 11, 1907, by the National Bank of Commerce of St. Louis, and the item of $1,000 for currency shipped on May 8, 1907, by Exchange National Bank of Little Rock. The accountant testifies that he did not get the information as to these two items from the books of the Bank of Fulton, and that he only obtained the information from letters or statements contained in letters sent by the banks claiming to have shipped the currency. Such letters were ex parte statements, and did not prove by themselves the statements therein contained. Such testimony was not competent to show that said items of currency had been actually shipped to and received by the Bank of Fulton or its cashier. The witness testified that he obtained this information outside of the books of the bank, and there was no competent evidence introduced relative to these two items. And the court is therefore of the opinion that these two items of the shortage have not been proved by competent evidence, and that the amount of the shortage that occurred during the life of the bond, as shown by competent evidence, is $8,773.90.

If, therefore, the appellee will within fifteen days file a remittitur, so as to make the amount of judgment $8,773.90, the judgment of the lower court will be affirmed; otherwise the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

EAGLE ORE COMPANY.

Bailment — stolen property — right of bailee.

A bailee cannot relieve himself from the duty of redelivering the property to the bailor, by showing that at some unknown time it had been stolen by an unknown thief from an undisclosed owner, and that the bailor by reasonable inquiry could have ascertained that fact, and that the bailee had purchased the property from one claiming to be the agent of such owner.

I. Nature of relation created by bailment.

In considering the rule of estoppel as applied to a bailee, it is of importance to bear in mind the nature of the relation created by a bailment. The derivation of the word itself is of significance. According to Justice Story it is derived from the French word "bailler," which signifies to "deliver." Hence it is that the essential feature of a bailment is the express or implied agreement to return the subject-matter of the bailment, either on demand, or at an agreed time. It implies a trust that as soon as the purpose of the bailment is answered the bailed property shall be restored to the bailor. In the absence of an express agreement by the bailee to return the bailed property to the bailor, the law implies such an agreement. The relation has frequently been compared to the relation of landlord and tenant, principal and agent, and trustee and cestui que trust.

Thus in Pulliam v. Burlingame, 81 Mo. 111, 51 Am. Rep. 229, the court in considering the relation of bailor and bailee said: "The contract of bailment necessarily admits the right of property in the bailor, and the obligation to return it to him at the termination of the term of bailment. In other words a bailee when he receives the property by virtue of the bailment legally admits the right of the bailor to make the contract of bailment. After this subservient relation of the defendant to the plaintiff in respect to the property was established, the law forbids him to dispute the title of plaintiff. The relation is analogous to that which exists between landlord and tenant,—a relation which prevents the tenant from setting up against his landlord either an outstanding or self-acquired adverse title; and from attorning to a stranger without the consent of his landlord or in pursuance of a judgment or sale under execution or deed of trust, or forfeiture under mortgage."

The doctrine of estoppel as applied to the relation of bailor and bailee has frequently been said to be similar to that of landlord and tenant. Thus in H. K. Porter Co. v. Boyd, 96 C. C. A. 197, 171 Fed. 305, speaking on this subject the court said: "If one gains possession only by means of, and claims title solely under, an instrument of lease or bailment, he will, as a general rule, be stopped or precluded from disputing title with the other party to the contract during its continuance, and until he shall have surrendered or redelivered the property; but where he has otherwise gained possession, asserts ownership in himself, and neither claims nor defends, unto recover the value of certain ore and the sacks in which it was contained, alleged to have been delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, and by the latter wrongfully converted to its own use.

The defendant is a corporation conducting and carrying on a general ore sampling business, and buying and selling ore. The pleadings admit, or the undisputed evidence shows, that plaintiff delivered to the defendant certain sacks of the value of $40.75, containing ore of the value of several hundred dollars, under an agreement that defendant would crush and sample the ore and deliver said property to plaintiff upon upon demand, unless a sale thereof to the defendant should be agreed upon between said parties; that no sale was consummated, and that plaintiff, prior to the bringing of the suit, made demand on defendant for the possession of said property, with which demand defendant refused to comply. The defense interposed is that plaintiff was never at any time the owner of the ore, or any part thereof, and never was entitled to its possession; that his possession was at all times unlawful and fraudulent; that the Cripple Creek District Mine Owners' & Operators' Association was the agent of the owners of all the ore, and entitled to the possession thereof; that said association asserted its right of ownership in said ore, and that defendant afterwards purchased it from said association and thus acquired title thereto. The affirmative allegations of the answer were denied by the der, or by virtue of the instrument, there is no such estoppel. The court quotes with approval from Chief Justice Marshall in Blight v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. 535, 5 L. ed. 516, as follows: "The title of the lessee, is in fact the title of the lessor; he comes in by virtue of it, holds by virtue of it, and rests upon it to maintain and justify his possession. He professes to have no independent right in himself, and it is a part of the very essence of the contract under which he claims that the paramount ownership of the lessor shall be acknowledged during the continuance of the lease, and that possession shall be surrendered at its expiration. He cannot be allowed to controvert the title of the lessor without disparaging his own, and he cannot set up the title of another without violating that contract by which he obtained and holds possession, and breaking that faith which he has pledged, and the obligation of which is still continuing and in full operation." These principles, the court said, apply with equal force to leases of real estate, and to leases or bailments for hire of personal chattels, and warrant an estoppel or preclusion as to title only where those relying on such estoppel or preclusion obtain possession of the subject-matter of the lease or bailment under and by virtue of it.

And in Thompson v. Williams, 30 Kan. 114, 1 Pac. 47, the court said a bailee was estopped to deny his bailor's title even as is a tenant his landlord's.

This comparison is also made in Bechtel v. Sheaffer, 117 Pa. 555, 11 Atl. 889, where in the court, after adverting to the rule that an interpleader will not be awarded to relieve a party under an express promise to pay or perform against an antagonist an independent claim, remarked: "The same rule prevails also where an independent liability must of necessity arise out of the very nature of the relation subsisting between the parties, with respect to the subject-matter of dispute, as between landlord, and tenant, attorney and client, etc.; for, as a general rule, a tenant cannot deny his landlord's title, nor an attorney his client's right to money received for him as 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

such; nor can a bailee ordinarily raise an interpleader between his bailor and one who asserts an independent, antagonistic and paramount title. But even a tenant who is under an express promise to pay rent may interplead his landlord and an opposing claimant, when the title of the latter is derived from the lessor after the lease, or generally when there is privity between the claimant and the lessor; as, for example, when the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, trustee and cestui que trust, assignor and assignee, etc., has been created between them; in such case the tenant does not dispute the landlord's title. So in the case of an attorney, agent, or bailee, whenever the third person claims the debt or thing under a title derived from the bailor or principal, by assignment, sale, or mortgage, subsequent to the bailment or agency, he may compel the parties to interplead, for there is no denial of the original title or right; the only dispute is as to the effect of the subsequent act."

On this point in Biddle v. Bond, 6 Best & S. 225, 11 Jur. N. S. 425, 34 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 137, 12 L. T. N. S. 178, 13 Week. Rep. 561, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 573, the court said that the position of an ordinary bailee, where there has been no special contract or representation on his part, is very analogous to that of a tenant who, having accepted the possession of land from another, is estopped from denying his landlord's title unless he is evicted by title paramount.

II. Estoppel arising from relation.

a. In general.

Subject to many exceptions the general rule is that a bailment creates a relation between the bailor and the bailee of such a nature as to preclude the bailee from denying the title of his bailor to the property bailed, and from asserting a title thereto in himself or a third person as an excuse for refusing to redeliver the property to the bailor. McCullough v. Root, 8, replication. The lawful existence of said Mine Owners' Association, and its power to act in the premises, was also put in issue. The answer in no wise disclosed the particular owner or owners of the ore for whom the said association was the alleged agent, nor did the evidence adduced give light thereon. The Cripple Creek District Mine Owners' & Operators' Association was brought into existence by a voluntary agreement, said to have been entered into among certain mine owners and operators of mines, for the purpose, as stated in said agreement, of forming "a co-operative alliance and association for the protection of the mining interests of said district, and the promotion of the welfare and prosperity of the mining industry." The articles of agreement of the Mine Owners' Association were offered in evidence, and, over objections interposed, received. No proof was adduced as to the authenticity of the signatures appearing thereto, except solely as to that of this defendant. By agreement the cause was tried to the court without the intervention of a jury. The contract of bailment, and the possession of the property thereunder, having been admitted, the plaintiff presented his evidence of value of the property in question, and rested the case. Thereupon the defendant undertook to establish its affirmative defense, that the Cripple Creek District Mine Owners' & Operators' Association was the agent of the owner of said property, and entitled to its possession, and had asserted its

b. Where bailee retains possession of bailed articles.

The general rule that the bailee is estopped to deny his bailor's title to the bailed property applies where the bailee seeks to retain the possession of the property, and defend an action therefor by the bailor by showing an adverse paramount title in a third person, where he does not also show that, without his instigation, such title has been asserted, and that he defends upon such title by authority of the person in whom it is vested. Rosenfield v. Express Co. 1 Woods, 131, Fed. Cas. No. 12,060; Riddle v. Blair, 163 Ala. 314; 51 So. 14 former hearing, 148 Ala. 461, 42 So. 560; Croswell v. Lehman, 54 Ala. 363, 25 Am. right of ownership thereto. The trial court, however, over plaintiff's objections and exceptions, declared and held, that it was only necessary for the defendant to establish that the possession of the ore by plaintiff was wrongful and unlawful; that it was wholly immaterial to whom the ore belonged, or as to the agency of said association; that if the evidence convinced the court that the ore was stolen, though it failed to disclose from whom, by whom, or when, and that plaintiff by any reasonable inquiry could have ascertained before he purchased it that it was stolen, the plaintiff could not recover. Upon this theory the court proceeded, and so limited the inquiry; and at the close of the evidence dismissed the complaint. A motion for a new

Compare with Lavelle v. Belliu, 121 Mo. App. 442, 97 S. W. 200, wherein it was held that a bailee of lost money was entitled to deny the bailor's title thereto, the bailor being the finder, and it appearing that he asserted his right to the money for the purpose of converting it to his own use. This conclusion was reached on the theory that the bailee could not have returned the money to the bailor without being a particeps criminis, an accessory to the commission of a felony,—and hence it became his duty to retain it until the owner could be found.

Under no circumstances can a bailee set up a title another does not assert, and keep for himself the bailed goods as his own. Riddle v. Blair, 148 Ala. 461, 42 So. 560; Crowell v. Lehman, 54 Ala. 363, 25 Am. Rep. 684.

A bailee can only assert the title of a third person against his bailor when he defends on such a title and by authority of the holder thereof. Palmtag v. Doutrick, 59 Cal. 154, 43 Am. Rep. 245; Dodge v. Meyer, 61 Cal. 405; Wetherly v. Straus, 93 Cal. 283, 28 Pac. 1045; Bondy v. American Transfer Co. — Cal. App. —, 115 Pac. 965.

The bailee incontestably concedes the title to the bailed property to be in the bailor, unless he can show that the true owner is making an adverse claim. Oehmen v. Portmann, 153 Mo. App. 240, 133 S. W. 104. He cannot set up the title of a third person unless the owner has claimed the property, and the bailee has yielded to the claim. Sedgwick v. Macy, 24 App. Div. 1, 49 N. Y. Supp. 154.

In Dunwoodie v. Carrington, 4 N. C. (2 Car. Law Repos. 469) the court said that, by the bailment, the bailee had admitted the right of the bailor to the property, and had taken possession under it, and added: "That possession he is bound to restore to the person from whom he obtained it, and cannot with any shadow of justice consider himself a trustee for anyone who, in his conception, may have a better right to the property."

It is no defense to bailees that the title to the bailed property is in a third person, where such third person has not authorized the bailees to vindicate his title, and as to that defense they are officious intermeddlers with business that does not concern them, they not pretending to have any title themselves, or pretending to connect themselves with any third person who has a better title, or any title at all. Lain v. Gaither, 72 N. C. 234.

In Great Western R. Co. v. McComas, 33 Ill. 185, the court said that it was very questionable if a carrier would be permitted of his own motion to set up as a defense against his bailor the right of the true owner of the property.

That a horse was taken up by the bailor as an estray is no defense for the failure of the bailee to return it as agreed. Borron v. Landes, 1 Duv. 299.

While a bailee may yield to the claim of a third person who is the true owner of the property, yet the mere fact that title is in a third person is not a defense in his favor in an action against him by the bailor. Cole v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 21 Mo. App. 443; Dougherty v. Chapman, 29 Mo. App. 233; Sherwood v. Neal, 41 Mo. App. 416.

A receiptor of money, by merely showing that the legal title thereto was in the estate of a deceased person, does not relieve himself from the obligation to return the money according to his agreement. McCafferty v. Brady, 5 Sadler (Pa.) 565, 19 W. N. C. 553, 9 Atl. 37.

The bailee must either have yielded to an adverse paramount title asserted by a third person, or he must rely upon such title under authority of such person (Bet-teley v. Reed, 4 Q. B. 511, 7 Jur. 507, 3 Gale & D. 561, 12 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 172); or such third person must have asserted and maintained or prosecuted his adverse paramount title to such an extent as to be equivalent to an eviction of the bailee

People, 45 Colo. 364, 101 Pac. 340; McVicker v. Rouse, 44 Colo. 255, 98 Pac. 807.

We are clearly of the opinion that the trial court adopted an erroneous view of the law, and thereby committed reversible error. The general rule is that the bailee can discharge his liability to the bailor only by returning the identical thing which he has received, or its proceeds, under the terms of the bailment; but to this rule there are certain exceptions. The bailee may show that the property has been taken from him by process of law, or by a person having a paramount title, or perhaps excuse his default in some other way. But he cannot set up jus tertii against his bailor, however tortious the possession of the latter, unless the true owner has claimed the property and the bailee has yielded to the claim. Story, Bailm. §§ 450, 582; Schouler, Bailments & Carriers, § 494. The correct rule, stated in 9 Current Law, pp. 325, 326, is that "a bailee cannot set up title in himself, but may, if goods are claimed by third person, refuse at his peril to deliver to bailor, and may protect himself from liability by showing delivery on demand to true owner, but cannot by mere assertion of right in another avoid liability for conversion by himself." The following authorities are analogous in principle and are cited in support of the rule. Atlantic & B. R. Co. v. Spire, 1 Ga. App. 22, 57 S. E. 973; Barker v. S. A. Lewis Storage & Transfer Co. 79 Conn. 342, 118 Am. St. Rep. 141, 65 Atl. 143; Klein v. Pat-

c. Where property is surrendered to the true owner.

Where he acts in good faith and without fraud or connivance, the relation created by a bailment does not preclude the bailee from defending an action against him by his bailor to recover for his failure to redeliver the bailed goods, by showing that the property was taken from him by, or that he surrendered the same to an adverse paramount title asserted by a third person. S. 58, 5 Jur. N. S. 248.

In Ross v. Edwards, 73 L. T. N. S. 100, 11 Reports, 574, Lord Macnaghten asserted the rule to be that in an ordinary bailment the bailor represents to the bailee that he may safely accept the bailment. On that representation the bailee promises to redeliver; hence it is clear that the bailee, after acknowledging that he holds the goods on account of the bailor, cannot say to the bailor: "The goods are not yours." But it is equally clear that, if there is that which amounts to eviction by title paramount, the bailee is discharged from his promise. In that event he is under no liability to the bailor, unless he has made a special contract with him or is in some way to blame for his loss.

In Young v. East Alabama R. Co. 80 Ala. 100, the court said the reason of the rule is that the bailee of the goods can be in no better situation than the bailor from whom he received them, and the true owner or other person entitled to their custody, having a special property in them, can sue either the bailor or bailee and recover from them, and no man shall be rebuked by the law for doing what the law would compel him to do.

Nudd v. Montayne, 38 Wis. 511, 20 Am. Rep. 25, approves the English doctrine that the title of a third person must be assert-terson, 30 Pa. Super. Ct. 495, 500; Riddle v. Blair, 148 Ala. 461, 42 So. 560. In The Idaho (Hentz v. The Idaho), 93 U.S. 575, 581, 23 L. ed. 978, 980, the rule stated and approved is "that a bailee cannot avail himself of the title of a third person (though that person be the true owner) for the purpose of keeping the property for himself, nor in any case where he has not yielded to the paramount title. If he could, he might keep for himself goods deposited with him without any pretense of ownership. But if he has performed his legal duty by delivering the property to its true proprietor at his demand, he is not answerable to the bailor." "The relation between bailor and bailee, and that of depositor and depositary of money, is analogous to that of landlord and tenant. Until something equivalent to title paramount has been asserted against the bailee or depositary, he will be estopped to deny the title of his bailor to the goods intrusted to him." Bigelow, Estoppel, 4th ed. 490. Public policy and reason both combine to require that a bailee shall never be permitted to controvert the bailor's title, or set up against him a title acquired by himself during the bailment, which is hostile to, or inconsistent in character with, that which he acknowledged in accepting the bailment. This rule, however, does not preclude the bailee pleading and showing that he has been dispossessed by superior right, or that he holds the thing bailed, subject to such known right then asserted, and not by him ed to such extent as to be equivalent to an eviction in order to entitle the bailee to take advantage of the same as against the bailor.

Where, upon depositing articles with a bailee, the bailor instructs him that such articles are to be returned to the bailor personally, or to a designated third person at their demand, the bailee is not liable to the bailor if he thereafter delivers the articles to such third person, upon demand being made to him, such third person being the true owner of the property, the bailor merely acting as her agent in making the bailment. Davis v. Donohoe-Kelly Bkg. Co. 152 Cal. 282, 92 Pac. 639.

The rule that a bailee is estopped to deny the title of his bailor is, in general, limited to cases where he seeks to himself hold the property by setting up title in a third person, and does not apply to cases where he yields to such title and delivers possession of the property upon demand of the holder thereof. Western Transp. Co. v. Barber, 56 N. Y. 544.

The receiptor of attached property is not liable therefor where it is taken from him upon a paramount title asserted by a third person. Barron v. Cobleigh, 11 N. H. 557, 35 Am. Dec. 505; Healey v. Hutchinson, 66 N. H. 316, 20 Atl. 332.

That a common carrier delivered property in its hands for shipment, on demand to a stranger to the shipment, who was the rightful owner and entitled to the possession thereof, is a good defense against the claim of the bailor for failure to redeliver. Thomas v. Northern P. Exp. Co. 73 Minn. 185, 75 N. W. 1120.

And while a common carrier cannot of his own motion set up against his bailor an adverse title in a third person, he may do so, however, when he has delivered the consigned goods to such third person upon his demand. Rosenfield v. Express Co. 1 Woods, 131, Fed. Cas. No. 12,060.

Under a statute making it a misdemeanor for a warehouseman to part with the possession of stored property unless same is removed from his custody by operation of law, he cannot defend his failure to deliver the property upon the demand of the bailor, on the ground that he has delivered to another, and justify under that other's title, and he will not be permitted to dispute his bailor's title. Such a statute is valid, since it is consistent with public policy to require one out of possession, in asserting a claim of property by process of law, to establish his right while it is still in the hands of the warehouseman, or otherwise to relieve the warehouseman from liability, if he in the meantime delivers it to the bailor. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. Brookfield, 70 N. J. L. 703, 58 Atl. 352.

d. Where property surrendered to one neither the bailor nor true owner.

It constitutes a wrongful conversion of the bailed property for the bailee to surrender it to, or permit a third person to obtain possession of it, where such person is not the true owner. And it is no defense to the bailee in an action against him by the bailor for such wrongful conversion, that the title to the bailed property at the time of the bailment was in fact in another. Estes v. Boothe, 20 Ark. 583; Riddle v. Blair, 163 Ala. 314, 51 So. 14; Roberts v. Stuyvesant Safe Deposit Co. 123 N. Y. 57, 9 L.R.A. 438, 20 Am. St. Rep. 718, 25 N. E. 294.

Thus the fact that the bailor acted in the bailment as agent for the true owner is no defense to the bailee, who has turned the property over to a third person. Estes v. Boothe, 20 Ark. 583.

Neither is it a defense that the bailee doubts the bailor's title to the property, or that a third person claims the same, where the bailee retains his possession or has permitted another to convert it to his own use. Riddle v. Blair, 163 Ala. 314, 51 So. 14.

And while a bailee who permits the property of the bailor to be taken by a stranger may excuse himself by showing that he yielded to the power of legal process, it does not follow that a seizure under such process, after the bailee has negligently allowed the property to pass into the hands known prior to the bailment. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 62.

Between the plaintiff and the defendant, the property was the plaintiffs. By accepting it under the contract of bailment the defendant not only admitted the plaintiff's title thereto, but also assumed with respect to that property, a position of trust and confidence which continues until the property is returned or lawfully accounted for. It was incumbent upon defendant, in order to relieve itself of the redelivery of the property or its proceeds to the plaintiff, to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that it actually delivered the property to the true owner on his demand. The defendant could not lawfully account for the property, and relieve itself of its contractual obligation to the plaintiff, by showing that the property had been, before plaintiff secured possession thereof, stolen at some unknown time, by an unknown thief, from an unknown and unascertained owner, and that the bailee by reasonable inquiry could have ascertained such facts. It would be a serious reproach to the administration of justice if our courts should adopt a rule that permitted one to acquire possession of property from another under a specific contract to return it, and then subsequently repudiate that contract, and retain possession of the property, under a claim of ownership, acquired from one not specifically shown to have had title thereto. Such a procedure would have close resemblance to theft by sanction of of trespassers, or persons who have no right to it, is any protection to him, in an action by the bailor. And where the bailee permits the property to be taken from his custody without using proper diligence and care to retain or reclaim it, the bailors cause of action immediately accrues and cannot be defeated by the action of another party, seeking to establish claims against the bailor. Roberts v. Stuyvesant Safe Deposit Co. 123 N. Y. 57, 9 L.R.A. 438, 20 Am. St. Rep. 718, 25 N. E. 294.

e. Where property taken from bailee vi et armis.

In the early case of Shelbury v. Scottsford, Yelv. 23, it was held to be a good defense in an action by the bailor against the bailee, to show that the bailed property was taken from the bailee with force and arms, under a paramount title. It is, however, said that this would not be a good defense had the bailee suffered the holder of the paramount title to take possession of the property by fraud or covin.

Seizure of the bailed property in the hands of the bailee, under and by authority of the Treasury agents of the United States, is a good excuse on the part of the bailee for not retaining possession of the bailed property and delivering same to the bailor upon demand. Britton v. Aymar, 23 La. Ann. 63.

That the bailed property was taken from the bailee by the military department of the government is a good defense to an action by the bailor for the property. Watkins v. Roberts, 28 Ind. 167. To same effect, where property was taken by Confederate soldiers, is Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Estes, 10 Lea, 755.

f. As affected by nature of bailor's title.

The doctrine has been frequently asserted that where the bailor has acquired his title tortiously his bailee may surrender to the true owner, and rely upon this fact as a defense to any action by the bailor for his failure to restore the bailed property. Hayden v. Davis, 9 Cal. 573; Wether- 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ly v. Straus, 93 Cal. 283, 28 Pac. 1045; Bates v. Stanton, 1 Duer, 79; Decan v. Shipper, 35 Pa. 239, 78 Am. Dec. 334; Floyd v. Bovard, 6 Watts & S. 75; King v. Richards, 6 Whart. 418, 37 Am. Dec. 420; Hardman v. Willcock, 9 Bing. 382, note; Cheeseman v. Exall, 6 Exch. 41, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 209.

Thus the rule has been asserted that where the bailor has obtained possession of the bailed property by felony, force, or fraud, it is a bar to his action against the bailee for the property, that the latter has surrendered to the true owner. Bates v. Stanton, 1 Duer, 79.

And that it is a defense to the bailee in an action against him by the bailor, that the bailor's possession of the bailed property was obtained by fraud, and that the true owner has made a demand upon the bailee, for the articles, and has forbidden their delivery to the bailor. Hayden v. Davis, 9 Cal. 573.

In Wetherly v. Straus, 93 Cal. 283, 28 Pac. 1045, the court remarked that when the bailor has obtained the property by some fraud practised upon the true owner, the bailee can, upon the authority of the true owner or when he has been forbidden to make delivery of the property, defend upon such true owner's title; but he always assumes such defense at his peril, and he takes upon himself the burden of showing the right to retain the property.

While the language of the foregoing cases might indicate that this general rule applied only where the bailor acquired the bailed property tortiously, yet where the question has been squarely presented to the court in cases where the bailor's title to the bailed property was not obtained tortiously, and his claim thereto, is in good faith, even though mistakenly made, it has been held that it is immaterial how the bailor obtained the property, that, in any event, if the bailor is not the true owner the bailee has a right to deliver the property to the true owner upon demand by him, or surrender the same through legal proceedings and the loss of the property in such a manner will constitute a law, and cannot be approved. If the bailor has no title, the bailee can have none; for the bailor can give no better than he has. Still without absolute title the bailor may have the right of possession, and the bailee certainly cannot dispute that right, unless by virtue of a specific title asserted, paramount to that of the bailor. Bartels v. Arms, 3 Colo. 72, 75; Barker v. S. A. Lewis Storage & Transfer Co. 79 Conn. 342, 118 Am. St. Rep. 141, 65 Atl. 143. In Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Strange, 504, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 66, it is held that the finder of a jewel, though he does not by such finding acquire an absolute property or ownership, yet he has such a property as will enable him to keep it against all but the rightful owner, and may recover damages from a bailee for its conversion. And in Anderson v. Gouldberg, 51 Minn. 294, 296, 53 N. W. 636, 637, it is said: "One who has acquired the possession of property, whether by finding, bailment, or by mere tort, has a right to retain that possession as against a mere wrongdoer who is a stranger to the property. Any other rule would lead to an endless series of unlawful seizures and reprisals in every case where property had once passed out of the possession of the rightful owner."

From what has been said, it necessarily follows that the judgment must be, and accordingly is, reversed, and the cause remanded.

Steele, Ch. J., and Bailey, J., concur.

good defense against any action by the bailor for failure to redeliver. The Idaho (Hentz v. The Idaho) 93 U. S. 575, 23 L. ed. 978.

Thus it has been held that, as against the bailor having no title, the bailee has a right to deliver the property to the true owner upon demand by him, without reference to the mode in which the bailor obtained possession. When the owner comes and demands his property, he is entitled to its immediate delivery, and it is the duty of the possessor to make it. The law will not adjudge the performance of this duty tortious as against the bailor having no title. Western Transp. Co. v. Barber, 56 N. Y. 544.

The doctrine is also asserted in Biddle v. Bond, 6 Best & S. 225, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 573, that it is immaterial how the bailor obtained the property in so far as affecting the right of the bailee to set up the ius tertii. In this case the court, after pointing out that while in Hardman v. Willcock, 9 Bing. 382, note. And Cheeseman v. Exall, 6 Exch. 341, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 209, the plaintiff had obtained the goods by fraud upon the person whose title was set up, added: "We do not think that this circumstance alters the law on the subject. The position of the bailee is precisely the same whether his bailor was honestly mistaken as to the rights of the third person, or fraudulently acting in derogation of them."

III. Where property taken in legal proceedings.

a. In general.

Subject generally to the performance by the bailee of certain duties hereinafter considered, in an action against him by the bailor of property to recover same or the value thereof, it is a good defense that the property was taken from him upon legal process fair on its face. Stiles v. Davis, 1 Black, 101, 17 L. ed. 33; Robinson v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 9 Fed. 129; a. c. on 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

C. 242, 1 Gale, 244, 5 Tyrw. 1069; Ross v. Edwards, 73 L. T. N. S. 100, 11 Reports, 574.

The rule that a bailee cannot deny the title of his bailor has no application where the bailee has been compelled, by action of which the bailor had notice, to pay for the property to one having the true title. Cook v. Holt, 48 N. Y. 275.

A carrier, like other bailees, may set up the ius tertii, and the valid process from a court to which the carrier is subject, demanding the possession of the goods, is an excuse for nondelivery. It is the vis major of the law, and public policy, which demands obedience to the process of the court, overrides that other policy which requires the carrier to perform his contract of carriage. This protection is afforded, whatever the form of action for nondelivery against the carrier may be, if by its process the goods are taken from him. Robinson v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 9 Fed. 129, s. c. on subsequent appeal 16 Fed. 57.

In Burton v. Wilkinson, 18 Vt. 186, 46 Am. Dec. 145, a leading case on this subject, the doctrine is asserted that if bailed goods are taken from a wharfinger, or warehouseman by legal process, the wharfinger or warehouseman, on this ground, may protect himself in a suit brought against him by the owner. So, if the person from whom the wharfinger or warehouseman received the goods, claims the same by a title illegal, so that he cannot lawfully hold them, and they are taken by authority of the law, out of the custody and care of the wharfinger, the latter may show this as an excuse for not delivering them.

Seizure by legal process is an implied exception to a carrier's contract limiting pro tanto the general rule of the common law that a carrier is liable for nondelivery under a bill of lading for any causes not excepted therein. The M. M. Chase, 37 Fed. 708.

But a bailee cannot lightly shake off his obligation to defend his possession against an action at law with reference thereto, to which he alone is a party and hence recognized as having a right to defend upon any loose theory that there is something in legal process alone which protects him; he must do in and about that process all that can be done to defend against it, or else call in his bailor to defend for himself. Robinson v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 16 Fed. 57.

b. Necessity that bailor be party to suit.

By the weight of authority, in order that legal proceedings operate in favor of a bailee to bar the claim of the bailor for a redelivery of the property without also establishing the adverse title upon which it was taken, it is not sufficient that the bailee show merely that the bailed property was taken from him upon process fair upon its face. He must also show that the bailor was a party to the proceedings, or that he was heard therein or had an opportunity to be heard.

On this point, see Schrauth v. Dry Dock Sav. Bank, 86 N. Y. 390, wherein, in holding it not to be a defense to a bailee that he had paid or delivered money deposited with him to a third person, in reliance upon an order and judgment of the court in a proceeding to which the bailor was not a party, and of which he had no notice, and as to which he was not heard, the court said that if the payment by the bailee under such circumstances is held to be valid, then the bailor has been deprived of her property without due process of law, and her constitutional rights thus violated, and added: "It can never be a defense that one who owes me money has, by an order or judgment of a court in a proceeding to which I was not a party, been compelled to pay or deliver the money to another. If such were the rule, a bill of interpleader would rarely have been necessary, as the judgment of a court would always protect a defendant. The very object of interpleading conflicting claimants to money in the hands of a party willing to pay is to procure an adjudication which will protect him against double payment. In the case of conflicting claimants, an adjudication and payment, in an action by one claimant, would not bar the right of the other claimant, and no statute constituting such a bar could be upheld. Here, if plaintiff's husband had sued the bank and recovered a judgment for this money, payment of such judgment would not have furnished a defense to an action by her to recover the same money. And certainly this order had no greater or more binding force than a judgment would have had. The general rule which holds that one shall not be affected by an adjudication to which he is not a party may sometimes work hardship, but the cases must be very rare in which a party holding property upon which there are conflicting claims cannot protect himself against double liability. Here the defendant knew that the plaintiff deposited this money as her own and that she claimed it, and yet, without any effort to protect her rights, it paid the money in pursuance of an order made in a proceeding to which she was not a party. The bank should have resisted payment, or in some way made her a party to the proceeding."

As to the application to such a state of facts, of the general rule that a common carrier or other bailee can show in defense of an action against him for the property intrusted to him by the bailor, that it has been taken from him by legal process, the court in the foregoing case said, that the rule therein asserted and applied was not in conflict with the latter rule, and added: "The bailee is bound to exercise such care as the law requires over the property committed to him, and he is held not to have violated his duty in that respect if he surrenders the property upon legal process without fault or collusion, and gives notice of the surrender to the bailor. But these decisions give no countenance to the claim that a debtor can discharge his debt by either voluntary or compulsory payment to some one besides the creditor."

Considering this point in Barnard v. Kobbe, 3 Daly, 35, the court said that the due process of law which would exonerate a bailee from redelivery of the bailed property is that which is set in motion directly against the bailor; that as between the two the bailor was prima facie the true owner, and a levy upon the bailed property under an attachment against a third person does not, as between the parties to the bailment, place the bailed goods or their proceeds in the custody of the law. Hence if the goods are removed by force under an attachment, the bailee is bound to treat such acts as a naked trespass, and to protect his bailor. Otherwise he adopts the situation of the attaching creditors, with all its attendant peril.

To the same effect, also, is Edwards v. White Line Transit Co. 104 Mass. 159, 6 Am. Rep. 213, which holds that the seizure of goods upon an attachment against a third person does not exonerate a carrier from his duty to deliver the goods on his contract or his obligation as carrier, although it does relieve him from an action of trover for the conversion of the property.

It is no answer by the bailee of a certificate of deposit left with him for safe-keeping, that the certificate belonged to the husband of the bailor, and that it had been garnished in his hands by the creditors of such husband, and that he was holding same for their benefit, where the husband does not authorize such defense, and as a matter of fact gave the deposit to the wife, although his creditors claim that he did so fraudulently; the latter claim not being a proper ground of defense. Wetherly v. Straus, 93 Cal. 283, 28 Pac. 1045.

Stephens v. Vaughan, 4 J. J. Marsh. 206, 20 Am. Dec. 216, holds that a bailee who covenants to redeliver the bailed property to the bailor is not excused therefrom by the fact that the property was taken from him by the sheriff in proceedings against another than the bailor, and to which neither the bailor nor bailee is a party.

A bailee of property to be returned to a sheriff from whom he had received it, and who had attached same, cannot defend an action for the possession of the property by the sheriff by showing that, in a trial between the plaintiff in the attachment and a third person, the property had been proved to belong to such third person, and such fact does not authorize the bailee to surrender the property to claimant without the authority of the plaintiff in the attachment. Foltz v. Stevens, 54 Ill. 180.

In Stiles v. Davis, 1 Black, 101, 17 L. ed. 33, the doctrine is asserted that the seizure of goods under transportation by a carrier will relieve the carrier from liability to the consignor or consignee in an action of trover for wrongful conversion although such seizure is by writ of attachment running against a third person. The court said that, after the seizure of the goods by the sheriff under the attachment, they are in the custody of the law, and the defendant can not comply with the demand of the plaintiff without a breach of it even admitting the goods to have been at the time in his actual possession, and added: "It is true that these goods have been delivered 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) to the defendant as carriers by the plaintiffs to be conveyed for them to the place of destination, and were seized under an attachment against third persons, but this circumstance did not impair the legal effect of the seizure or custody of the goods under it, so as to justify the defendant in taking them out of the hands of the sheriff. The right of the sheriff to hold them was a question of law, to be determined by the proper legal proceedings and not at the will of the defendant nor that of the plaintiffs." The court concluded that the plaintiffs had mistaken their remedy, and said that they should have brought their action against the officer who seized the goods, or against the plaintiffs in the attachment suit if the seizure was made under their direction. As to these parties the court said the process being against third persons, it would have furnished no justification if the plaintiffs could have maintained a title and right to possession in themselves.

While the foregoing case is apparently in conflict with the general doctrine heretofore asserted, yet this conflict is more apparent than real. It is to be noted that the action was trover for the conversion of the bailed goods; and while in holding it to be a good defense to the action of trover, that the goods were taken from the possession of the carrier under process against a third person, the court used language which might indicate the intention to assert the broad doctrine that the seizure of bailed goods under process against a third person will exonerate a carrier from redelivery, the court, however, did not have that point before it, and the case relied upon and quoted from as authority was also a trover action in which the distinction seems clearly made between an action in trover and action for failure to redeliver, as it is said in that case (Verrall v. Robinson, 2 Crompt. M. & R. 495, 4 Dowl. P. C. 242, 1 Gale, 244, 5 Tyrw. 1009) that where a bailee's refusal to deliver the bailed property is grounded on its being on his premises, but in the custody of the law because seized in attachment proceedings, his refusal is no evidence of a wrongful conversion to his own use so that trover may be maintained against him.

This distinction is also made in Edwards v. White Line Transit Co. 104 Mass. 159, wherein Stiles v. Davis is distinguished on that ground. To the same effect also, is Henderson v. 300 Tons of Iron Ore, 38 Fed. 41.

But where there is no collusion it is a defense that goods intrusted to a carrier for transportation were taken on legal process against a third person, where the carrier gives to the consignor, who is also the consignee, timely notice of this fact. McVeagh v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 3 N. M. 327, 5 Pac. 457. (See also infra 3).

Of course the bailee may show as a bar to the right of a bailor to a redelivery of the bailed property, that the same was taken from him upon process fair upon its face, if he also shows that the proceedings in which the property was taken were valid and were instituted by the holder of a paramount title. Upon such a showing it is not necessary also to show that the bailor was a party to the proceeding or had notice thereof or had an opportunity to be heard therein. As supporting this proposition, see Edson v. Weston, 7 Cow. 278, which holds the fact that the bailed property was taken from the bailee under legal proceedings instituted by the holder of the paramount title constitutes a good defense against a claim of the bailor to a redelivery of the property.

And see also Rogers v. Weir, 34 N. Y. 463, which holds a bailee cannot rely upon an attachment levied upon the bailed goods to exonerate him from redelivering them to the bailor, where the attachment was directed against a third person on the theory that such third person was the true owner of the goods and had conveyed them to the bailor in fraud of his creditors. The court, after pointing out that the sheriff levying the attachment could not justify the seizure as against the bailor except by bringing forward the creditors and establishing the alleged fraud, said: "Upon what principle, then, can the defendant rely upon the sheriff's levy to withhold the goods from the plaintiff? Is he in a better position than the sheriff himself? Suppose the sheriff had taken the goods into his own custody; he could not detain them from the plaintiff on the ground which is the foundation of the defense in this action."

See also Barnard v. Kobbe, 3 Daly, 35, which recognized and applied this doctrine to a very similar state of facts.

And see also Van Winkle v. United States Mail S. S. Co. 37 Barb. 122, wherein the rule is asserted that a person having a paramount title may claim his property from the bailee or carrier where it has been taken from him by felony, force, or fraud, or where the bailor or shipper is a mere agent of the owner; and where the bailor is the mere agent for the owner it is a defense to the bailee or carrier that the property was taken from him upon valid process directed against the true owner.

c. Where proceeding is defective.

The rule that a bailee is excused from delivering property to the bailor when called for, by showing that the property was taken out of his custody under the authority of valid legal proceedings, and that in a reasonable time he gave notice of that fact to the owner, does not apply where the officer who took the property had no process which authorized him to do so, and where no attempt was made by the bailee to notify the bailor of what had transpired, although they had her name and address and she resided only a short distance from their place of business. Roberts v. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Stuyvesant Safe Deposit Co. 123 N. Y. 57, 9 L.R.A. 438, 20 Am. St. Rep. 718, 25 N. E. 294.

That property while in the hands of a common carrier in transitu is seized by an officer without any warrant or other legal process constitutes no defense in behalf of the carrier for a failure to redeliver the property according to its contract, since the officer under such circumstances is a mere trespasser, and the carrier is liable under the rule of common law, in the same manner as if it had allowed any other trespasser to take property out of its custody. Bennett v. American Exp. Co. 83 Me. 236, 13 L.R.A. 33, 23 Am. St. Rep. 774, 22 Atl. 159.

A bailee assuming to give up the bailed property on the request of a receiver, without any order or judgment binding upon him, undertakes to affirm the legality of the proceedings in which the receiver was appointed. Welles v. Thornton, 45 Barb. 390.

In Walter A. Wood Harvester Co. v. Dobry, 59 Neb. 590, 81 N. W. 611, it is said that the bailee must surrender the bailed property to the bailor on demand and payment of his just charges unless there has been a prior lawful seizure of the property under judicial process issued against the owner, and the fact that the property was taken from the bailee upon defective attachment proceedings constitutes no defense to the claim of the bailor for the redelivery thereof.

A factor receiving and selling the principal's property, and rendering him an account of the sales, cannot defend an action against him on the ground that he has paid the proceeds of the sale of the property to a stranger upon an order of the court made in a supplementary proceeding, invalid because based upon an invalid attachment judgment. Barnard v. Kobbe, 54 N. Y. 516.

That goods in the hands of a carrier were seized on an attachment running against the owner is no defense to an action by the owner against the carrier for failure to redeliver the goods, where the goods were exempt from attachment. Kiff v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 117 Mass. 591, 19 Am. Rep. 429.

But a carrier surrendering property to an officer under a writ valid on its face is protected, even though the writ was issued under a statute afterwards judicially determined unconstitutional. McAlister v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 74 Mo. 351.

A seizure of whisky in a warehouse of a common carrier under process prima facie legal, on the claim that the same was shipped into the state in violation of the state liquor law, excuses the carrier from liability for the loss of the goods; and it is not necessary that the carrier should question the validity of the statute under which the same was seized. Southern R.

Co. v. Heymann, 118 Ga. 616, 45 S. E. 491.

d. Duty of bailee to give notice of proceeding to bailor.

In order that the bailee be entitled to take advantage of the rule that the loss of the bailed property through legal proceedings will exonerate him from redelivering the property to the bailor, he must, within a reasonable time after seizure of the property, give notice of this fact to the bailor, in order that the latter may have an opportunity to defend his title.

Considering the question as to the necessity of giving notice to the bailor under such circumstances in Thomas v. Northern P. Exp. Co. 73 Minn. 185, 75 N. W. 1120, the court said: "The bailee must promptly notify his bailor of the seizure, so as to give him the opportunity to defend his title. The law does not require a common carrier to defend a title of which he presumably knows nothing, but in case of seizure on legal process it does require him to notify his bailor, so that the latter may defend. Where the carrier delivers the property, on demand, to one claiming to be a rightful owner, he of course assumes the burden of proving, as against the claim of his bailor, that such person was the rightful owner; but we know of no rule of law requiring him to give notice to his bailor of such delivery."

Roberts v. Stuyvesant Safe Deposit Co. 123 N. Y. 57, 9 L.R.A. 438, 20 Am. St. Rep. 718, 25 N. E. 294, while holding that a bailee is not bound to resist the seizure on a search warrant of goods described therein which he holds as bailee, further holds that such a warrant affords no excuse or justification for the removal from the bailee's custody of property not described therein, and that as to such property the bailee must use such means to prevent its removal as is proper and justifiable in case the same party attempted to remove it without having any warrant or legal authority whatever. The bailee cannot rely upon such seizure as an excuse for not delivering the bailed property to the bailor, where he makes no resistance to the seizure and no attempt to inform the bailor as to what had transpired, although he had her name and address. In reaching this conclusion the court asserted the doctrine that, when property in the custody of the bailee for hire is demanded by a third person under color of process, it becomes the bailee's duty to ascertain whether the process is such as requires him to surrender the property, and if it does not, then it is his right and duty to refuse and to offer such resistance to the taking, and adopt such measures for reclaiming it, if taken, as a prudent and intelligent man would if it had been demanded and taken under claim of right to the property by another without legal process.

A common carrier is exonerated from liability for the loss of goods seized on attachment against the owner, where they give verbal notice of the seizure to the husband of the owner, who at the time had in his possession a bill of lading for the goods. Furman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 81 Iowa, 540, 46 N. W. 1049.

It is the duty of a carrier by sea, upon any interference with his possession, whether by legal proceedings or otherwise, to interpose for the owner's protection, and to make immediate assertion of his rights and interests, by whatsoever measures are appropriate at the time and place. To that extent the carrier is bound to take part in legal proceedings, and to continue them until, after informing his absent consignee thereof, the latter has a reasonable opportunity to take upon himself the burden of the litigation. The M. M. Chase, 37 Fed. 708.

A carrier does not discharge his obligation to the consignee with whom he is making the contract of shipment, by simple delivery to an officer, or by standing idly by until the process has impounded the goods and through it the adverse claimant has appropriated them by the judgment of the court. The strict rule of law applying generally to bailees, which requires them to defend their possession and justifies the surrender of the bailed articles only to a paramount owner, applies with equal force to a carrier, and imposes upon it the liability of either assuming all the dangers of loss from wrongful seizure by undertaking the defense of the suit in which the seizure was made, or giving immediate notice to the consignee to appear and defend it for himself. Robinson v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 16 Fed. 57.

It is a complete defense to a common carrier that the property during transportation was taken from it under legal process by one claiming a paramount title thereto, and that notice of this fact was given to both the consignor and the consignee, both of whom failed to furnish the company any evidence to enable it to resist the sworn statement of the complainant, and also failed to pay any attention to the notice. Savannah, G. & N. A. R. Co. v. Wilcox, 48 Ga. 432.

In Ranson v. Platt [1911] 1 K. B. 499, it is held that a bailee is exonerated from his duty to redeliver the bailed property to the bailor, where the property was taken under an order issued by a magistrate in a proceeding in which the bailor was not a party and in which she was not heard, and although the bailee gave her no notice thereof, the court said that the bailee complied with his obligations to the bailor by making known to the magistrate the bailor's claim to the property; and this was true although the bailor lived but a short distance away and her residence was known to the bailee.

IV. Subsequent sale of bailed property by bailor.

The bailor may sell the subject-matter of the bailment and thereby confer on the purchaser an immediate and valid title thereto, the possession of the bailee becoming that of the purchaser, without any formal delivery of the subject of the bailment to him, a mere notice to the bailee of the sale being sufficient; and where the fact of the sale is established or not disputed, the relation of bailor and bailee exists between such subsequent purchaser and the bailee, and their acts or conduct with reference to the subject-matter of the bailment are governed by the same rules of law that obtained between the original parties to the bailment, and the liability of the bailee with respect to a conversion of the property by him is determined by the same principle which would obtain were the action brought by the first bailor. The bailee can no more deny the title of the first bailor in the action by the purchaser, than he could in an action brought by the first bailor. Riddle v. Blair, 148 Ala. 461, 42 So. 560. And see to same effect Bechtel v. Shearer supra, I.

The bailee, after recognizing the title of a subsequent purchaser from the bailor and agreeing to turn the property over to him, is liable to him for the conversion of the property, if he thereafter turns it over to the bailor or his appointee. Smith v. Bell, 9 Mo. 873.

Where a bailee promises the purchaser of the bailed goods that he will deliver the same to him, he is not entitled to set up any other than such person as the proprietor of the goods. Holl v. Griffin, 10 Bing. 246, 3 L. J. C. P. N. S. 17, 3 Moore & S. 732.

As an excuse for a failure to redeliver the bailed's property, the bailee may rely upon a deed in trust, executed by the bailor subsequently to the bailment and covering the property in question, the bailee having attorned to the trustee in the deed. Burnett v. Fulton, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 486. It is a defense to the bailee that he has delivered the bailed property to a subsequent assignee of his bailor. Roberts v. Noyes, 76 Me. 590. He may surrender the bailed property to a subsequent mortgagee who, under the mortgage, is entitled to possession thereof. European & A. Royal Mail Co. v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. 30 L. J. C. P. N. S. 247, 8 Jur. N. S. 136. And he is not estopped to assert a subsequent paramount title under a mortgage covering the bailed property, executed by the bailor. Collins v. Bellefonte C. R. Co. 171 Pa. 243, 33 Atl. 331.

V. Effect of bad faith of bailee.

a. Where bailee accepts bailment with knowledge of adverse claim.

Even though a bailee of property is entitled, under some circumstances, to surrender possession thereof upon demand of a holder of the paramount title, it is clear that in order to entitle himself to make such surrender a defense to the claim of his bailor, he must not connive with the holder of the paramount title, and his contract of bailment must have been entered into by him without knowledge of such title, for if the bailee has knowledge of the hostile adverse claim, and with such knowledge he accepts the property, he cannot thereafter assert such title as an excuse for his failure to deliver the bailed property to his bailor upon demand. Considering this point Jessel, M. R. in Ex parte Davies, L. R. 19 Ch. Div. 86 said: "In order that the bailee may be able to avail himself of such a defense, he must himself have been in no default. If the bailee, knowing of the adverse claim, had said to his bailor, I will sell the horse for you if you will let me have a commission, and I will hand over the proceeds to you, he could not afterwards set up against his bailor the title of the adverse claimant, because he would have acted with his eyes open." This doctrine is applied in that case to an auctioneer, who put up goods for sale, by the order of a trustee in liquidation, and to whom he afterwards sent an account charging him possession money for the time the goods were in his care. The court said that by this account he had precluded himself from setting up the adverse claim of a person holding under a bill of sale from the same person represented by the trustee in liquidation, he having notice of such adverse claim at the time of the sale. In the same case, and on the same point, Lush, L. J., remarked: "When a person in such a position, knowing of two adverse claims to goods, elects to take the part of one of the claimants and to sell the goods as his, he is estopped from afterwards denying that claimant's title. If he had not taken this course he would have been entitled to show that there was a better title in the bill of sale holder; there might have been what is called an eviction of the trustee by title paramount."

And see also Osgood v. Nichols, 5 Gray, 420, which held that an auctioneer who received goods intrusted to him for sale, and who sold them in that capacity, and made no claim on them as his property until he was called upon for the proceeds of the sale, was estopped to deny the title of the bailor. The court said that as it neither appeared, nor was suggested, that he acted in the sale under any ignorance or misapprehension of his own right, if the goods were his, he misled the plaintiff and is estopped from making the defense offered.

This doctrine is also recognized in Sinclair v. Murphy, 14 Mich. 392, wherein a bailee of money attempted to defend his possession as against the bailor, on the ground that a third person had an interest in the money, and that in holding the same against the bailor he was acting for and in behalf of such third person. Upon this point the court said: If the bailee "intended to set up any such claim when he obtained the money, we think he is as much estopped by his representations and promises from doing so, as the receptor of property levied upon is estopped from setting up a claim to it in opposition to his receipt."

So, a person accepting property from someone other than the true owner, and with knowledge of that fact, recognizing his right thereto and agreeing to hold same for him, cannot set up the title of the true owner as against the person whose title he so recognized. Murphy v. Yeomans, 29 U. C. C. P. 421.

After recognizing a person's title to the bailed goods, with knowledge of the claim of a third person, the bailee is estopped to thereafter assert title in such third person as a defense to the claim of the title he recognized. Gosling v. Birnie, 7 Bing. 339, 9 L. J. C. P. 105, 5 Moore & P. 160.

A common carrier accepting goods for transportation from a person other than the true owner, with knowledge of that fact, cannot set up the title of the true owner against the person from whom the goods were accepted for transportation. Brill v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 20 U. C. Q. P. 440.

And a person assuming an agency and duty in regard to a draft which the payees might recognize, and to which they might bind him by a ratification, is not at liberty to defend an action therefor, by such payees, by showing an absence of title in them to the draft. Hayes v. Kedzie, 11 Hun, 577.

Title in a third person cannot be asserted by a bailee where he received the bailed articles under a bailment which he intended to violate before he received the articles. Dodge v. Meyer, 61 Cal. 405.

A bailee of goods for safe-keeping, knowing at the time of the bailment the nature of the transfer of the goods to the bailor, cannot assert the invalidity of the transfer, or its fraudulent character, and claim that the goods are in reality the property of a third person. Hendricks v. Mount, 5 N. J. L. 738, 8 Am. Dec. 623.

A bailee receiving goods for safe-keeping only, and under a promise to deliver them when called for, will not be permitted to set up property in himself derived from a third person. Hampton v. Swisher, 4 N. J. L. 66.

By force of the contract of bailment, the bailee incontestably concedes that title and right of possession exists in the bailor, and he is estopped to assert title in himself by virtue of a mortgage upon the bailed property, although by the terms of the mortgage, it being in default, he had the right to take possession of the property, where such default also existed at the time of the contract of bailment, so that the title to the property mortgaged and the right of possession was the same as when the bailee refused to surrender the mortgage. Bricker v. Stoud Bros. 56 Mo. App. 153.

A bailee who at the time of the bailment had a mortgage upon the bailed goods executed by a third person is estopped from setting up said mortgage as a defense to an action by the bailor against him for the conversion of the property. Peebles v. Farrar, 73 N. C. 342.

But a person getting possession of a boat as a bailee for a mere trespasser is not estopped to show that he turned the boat over to the true owners, although that was his purpose at the time of obtaining possession of the boat. Hastings v. Allen, 14 Ohio, 58, 45 Am. Dec. 523.

b. Where bailee induces holder of paramount title to assert claim.

A bailee cannot hunt up a paramount claimant, and then, when called upon by the bailor for the property, answer that he is a bailee of such claimant. Thus, a husband who becomes the bailee of property cannot defend an action by the bailor, on the ground that his wife is the true owner of the property and has asserted a claim thereto, and that he is holding the same for her, and he having knowledge of the wife's interest in the property at the time of the contract of bailment. Pulliam v. Burlingame, 81 Mo. 111, 51 Am. Rep. 229.

And see also Shelbury v. Scotsford, Yelv. 23, which holds that while it would be a good defense that the property was taken from the bailee with force and arms, by the holder of a paramount title, yet it would not be a good defense, if the property was so taken by the fraud or covin of the bailee.

This doctrine is also recognized in Marvin v. Ellwood, 11 Paige, 365, and applied to an attorney who had collected a judgment for his client, and who connived with a third person claiming a paramount title thereto, to assert such title.

c. Where bailee instigates commencement of action by adverse claimant.

In order that the bailee of property be entitled to show the seizure thereof upon legal process as a defense to an action by the bailor, the seizure must not have been brought about by any fraud or connivance of the bailee. The M. M. Chase, 37 Fed. 708.

So, if at the instigation of the bailee attachment proceedings are instituted against the bailor, and the bailed property is seized in such proceedings, the loss of the property thus occasioned is no bar to the claim of the bailor for the redelivery thereof. Walter A. Wood Harvester Co. v. Dobry, 59 Neb. 590, 81 N. W. 611.

VI. Effect of special contract.

A bailee by executing a receipt to the bailor for the bailed property admits the right of possession in the bailor, and is thereafter estopped from denying what has been thus admitted. The bailee cannot thereafter avoid the force of his own agreement by showing title in a third party. Reed v. Reed, 13 Iowa, 5.

A distinction is also made in Crawshaw v. Thornton, 2 Myl. & C. 1, 6 L. J. Ch. N. S. 179, between an ordinary bailee and a receptor of property, and it is held that, irrespective of the question of a paramount title in a third person, a bailee is liable for the value of bailed goods which he received for bailment, to be delivered to a third person, and to whom he furnished a written statement showing the amount of goods left with him at the disposal of such third person. The court said that this was a personal undertaking on the part of the bailee, and created a liability or right of action beyond that arising from the legal consequences of a mere bailment, and the liability of the bailee did not depend merely on the question of title.

So a wharfinger who accepts from his bailor an order to a third person for goods stored with him is thereafter estopped from asserting an adverse title to the one he has just recognized. Woodley v. Coventry, 9 Jur. N. S. 548, 2 Hurlst. & C. 164, 32 L. J. Exch. N. S. 185, 8 L. T. N. S. 249, 11 Week. Rep. 599. Under such circumstances the court said that it was not a question of title, but the question was whether the wharfinger had so conducted himself as to entitle the plaintiff to say: "I call upon you to deliver to me that which you have acknowledged you hold on my behalf."

A bailee having money which, by agreement, he is to deposit to the credit of the bailor, will not be permitted to retain it and compel the bailor to litigate with him the right of some third person to an interest therein, even though the bailee claims to be holding the money as the agent for, and in behalf of, such third person. Sinclair v. Murphy, 14 Mich. 392.

A bailee of money to abide the order of a court under and by virtue of specified attachments and garnishments is a mere depositary or stakeholder of the money to be held for a specified purpose, and as such he is bound by the terms of his acceptance. He cannot raise any objections to the surrender of the funds inconsistent with the conditions on which he accepted the custody. Swallow v. Duncan, 18 Mo. App. 622.

In Colbath v. Hofer, 43 Or. 366, 73 Pac. 10, the court said that a receptor's liability is to be determined by the terms of the contract. Whether he is estopped to show that the property belonged not to the debtor, but to some third party, depends upon whether it is a contract of indemnity, an express assurance for a certain amount or value whereby he assumes an absolute liability, or a mere contract of bailment for the safe-keeping and return of the specific chattels. If the former, he will not be allowed to prove title in a third person, but if on the other hand, the contract is one of bailment only, the bailee may always excuse himself for nondelivery by showing that the property was that of a third person, and not that of the bailor, if he further show that it has been delivered to the true owner in obedience to a paramount title.

If at the time of the attachment of property, it did not belong to the defendant in attachment, but to a third person, that circumstance alone will not constitute a defense in an action by the officer against the receptor for the property, but if such third person has obtained possession of the property the receptor may defend himself for failure to deliver the property to the officer by proof of that fact. Fisher v. Bartlett, 8 Me. 122, 22 Am. Dec. 225.

VII. Waiver by bailee of right to make defense.

Where the bailee refuses to deliver the property to the bailor, upon demand, and does not intimate that anything has happened to discharge his obligation as bailee, he is answerable in a proper action by the bailor. Dunlap v. Hunting, 2 Denio, 643, 43 Am. Dec. 763.

The refusal of a bailee to deliver the bailed property upon the confessedly false pretense that it had already been delivered to a third person precludes his thereafter claiming that the plaintiff failed to exhibit to him his bill of sale from the original bailor, or pleading a paramount adverse title. Tuttle v. Gladding, 2 E. D. Smith, 157.

In Rogers v. Lambert [1891] 1 Q. B. 318, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 187, 64 L. T. N. S. 406, 39 Week. Rep. 114, 55 J. P. 452, while the doctrine was recognized that a bailee may set up the jus tertii where there has been what is equivalent to an eviction by title paramount, it was, however, held the fact that third persons owned the bailed property was no defense to the bailee, where his denial of the demand of the bailor for the possession of the property was not based upon that ground, but upon a general denial of the right of the bailor thereto.

VIII. Remedies of bailee.

a. Interpleader.

1. General rule.

In many cases the right is denied a bailee to maintain a pure bill of interpleader to protect himself against the claim of his bailor and that of a third person who asserts an adverse title to the bailor. Bartlett v. The Sultan, 23 Fed. 257; Crawshaw v. Thornton, 2 Myl. & C. 24, 6 L. J. Ch. N. S. 179; Marvin v. Ellwood, 11 Paige, 365; First Nat. Bank v. Bininger, 26 N. J. Eq. 345.

In Vosburgh v. Huntington, 15 Abb. Pr. 254, the rule is asserted that neither in equity nor at law can a bailee or agent dispute the original title of the person from whom he received the property, and hence such bailee or agent cannot file a bill in equity to settle the conflicting claims of the bailor or principal and a stranger who claims the property by a distinct and independent title.

In reaching the same conclusion in First Nat. Bank v. Bininger, 26 N. J. Eq. 345, the court said that if this was a case of first impression, no difficulty would be found in declaring jurisdiction to entertain an interpleader in such a case to be clearly within the purposes designed to be accomplished in the establishment of courts of equity, and added: "But the rule denying the right of the complainants to require the bailor to interplead with the other defendant is too firmly established to be changed by anything short of legislative power."

And in Crawshaw v. Thornton, 2 Myl. & C. 1, Lord Cottenham said that, unless the plaintiff has come under some personal obligation, independently of the question of property, so that either of the defendants may recover against him at law, without establishing a right to the property, it is obvious there is no case for interpleader, and added: "It is familiarly said that there is no interpleader between landlord and tenant or principal and agent, but it will be found that the reason for this lies deeper than might be inferred from the statement of this rule, and that it is to be considered not so much as an independent rule, as a necessary consequence to the principle of all interpleading. In both these cases rights and liabilities exist between the parties independent of the title to property, or to the debt or duty in question, and which may not depend upon the decision to the question of title."

In Pearson v. Cardon, 2 Russ. & M. 606, Lord Brougham, in denying the right of an agent or bailee to compel his principal to litigate with a stranger, the title to property held by him for the principal, said: "Upon such a state of facts, can I hold this to be a common case of a claim by an agent against his principal, and of another party, claiming by another title, foreign to the title of the principal." That an agent should have the power of filing a bill of interpleader when his principal demands a redelivery of goods bailed with him appears to me so monstrous a proposition and to involve such frightful consequences in mercantile transaction, that I could not suppose it was meant to contend for any such doctrine. For in fact it amounts to this, that an agent may at any moment treat his principal to a chancery suit, and I was therefore relieved to find that the plaintiffs' counsel went entirely on the peculiarity of this case."

And in the absence of statute a bailee cannot compel his bailor to interplead with a stranger where he claims the property in the hands of the bailee under adverse rights not founded in any privity of title or common contract. New Jersey Title, Guarantee & T. Co. v. Rector, 75 N. J. Eq. 423, 72 Atl. 968.

In DeZouche v. Garrison, 140 Pa. 430, 21 Atl. 450, it is said that a bailee cannot ordinarily raise an interpleader between his bailor and one who asserts an independent, antagonistic, and paramount title, and that in any event he must occupy the place of a mere stakeholder, without any rights of his own to be litigated or any personal interest in subject-matter of the controversy.

An interpleader is not the proper remedy where the bailee has been deprived of the possession of the property by a writ of replevin in behalf of a third person claiming title thereto, and the further reason that the bailee has an inadequate remedy at law in his defense to the replevin suit does not make it the proper remedy. Grant Bros. Auto. Co. v. Cotter, 161 Mich. 521, 126 N. W. 839.

But the bailee of lost money left with him by the finder is entitled to maintain a bill of interpleader against the bailor and third persons claiming the ownership of same, in order that the title to the money be settled. Lavelle v. Belliu, 121 Mo. App. 442, 97 S. W. 200.

2. Where interpleader authorized by statute.

In England by a special act the right is given a bailee to maintain a bill of interpleader against his bailor and adverse claimants to the bailed property. Attentborough v. St. Katharine's Dock Co. L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 450, 47 L. J. C. P. N. S. 763, 38 L. T. N. S. 404, 26 Week Rep. 583.

In Alabama by statutory provision, a bailee has the right to require claimants of the bailed property to counterplead with the bailor and litigate the question of title. Behr v. Gerson, 95 Ala. 438, 11 So. 115; Powell v. Robinson, 76 Ala. 423.

Under the practice in Nebraska a bailee may defend an action against him for the bailed property either by a stranger or the bailor, by an answer in the nature of a bill in interpleader, making the adverse claimant a party to the controversy and requiring such claimant and the bailor to litigate their claims of title between themselves. Shellenberg v. Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. 45 Neb. 487, 50 Am. St. Rep. 561, 63 N. W. 859.

In Iowa under the Code, a third person claiming to own personal property may be made a defendant in an action by the bailor against the bailee for the conversion of the property. Reed v. Reed, 13 Iowa, 5.

3. Effect of bad faith of bailee.

If a bailee accepts property for bailment from one who to his knowledge is not the true owner and whom he has assisted in getting possession of the property wrongfully, a court of equity will not assist him to compel the parties to interplead to determine to whom the property should be surrendered. Hatfield v. McWhorter, 40 Ga. 269.

On this point in Bechtel v. Sheaffer, 117 Pa. 555, 11 Atl. 889, the court said that as a general rule the party seeking relief by an interpleader must not have incurred any independent liability to either of the rival claimants. If he has expressly acknowledged the title or rights of one of them and agreed to hold the property for him, or, disregarding the adverse claim of one, he has by contract made himself liable in any event to the other, he cannot be said to stand indifferent between them. It was, however, held in this case that the mere fact of a contract relation existing between the bailor and the bailee by the terms of which the bailee was bound to pay the money received to the bailor will not necessarily deprive the bailee or depository of the right to an interpleader.

In Marvin v. Ellwood, 11 Paige, 365, an attorney at law was denied the right to interplead, his client and a third person claiming certain money in the hands of the attorney belonging to his client. The court said that in general a stranger cannot know that the attorney has funds in his hands not paid over to his client, to which he can interpose a claim, unless the attorney himself, in violation of his professional duty, discloses the same. Hence, it would be contrary to sound morals to permit him to sustain a suit of discord against his own client and at the expense of the latter, in order to transfer the fruit of his suit to another party; such a course would seem to be putting a premium on professional infidelity. The foregoing is taken from the opinion of the vice chancellor, which, however, on appeal, was affirmed by the chancellor.

b. Miscellaneous remedies.

The cases heretofore considered which sustain the right of a bailee, under any circumstances, to surrender the bailed property to a third person, and assert this fact as a defense to an action against him by the bailor for his failure to redeliver the bailed property, are, of course, authority for the rule that this is a remedy which the bailor may at his option resort to. In taking this course, however, the bailee assumes the burden of establishing the existence of a paramount title in the person to whom he surrendered the property. While, as stated, this right of the bailee is assumed in all the cases included herein which sustain the right of the bailee to assert an independent paramount title against the bailor, for a discussion of the question as a remedy, attention is particularly called to the following cases: The Idaho (Hentz v. The Idaho) 93 U. S. 580, 23 L. ed. 978; Jackson v. Jackson, 97 Ala. 372, 12 So. 437; Young v. East Alabama R. Co. 80 Ala. 100; Powell v. Robinson, 76 Ala. 423; Dodge v. Meyer, 61 Cal. 405; Atlantic & B. R. Co. v. Howard Supply Co. 125 Ga. 478, 54 S. E. 530; Atlantic & B. R. Co. v. Spires, 1 Ga. App. 22, 57 S. E. 973; Graham v. Northern P. Exp. Co. 89 Minn. 193, 94 N. W. 548; Rogers v. Weir, 34 N. Y. 463; Lester v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 73 Hun, 398, 26 N. Y. Supp. 206; Lain v. Gaither, 72 N. C. 234; Biddle v. Bond, 11 Jur. N. S. 425, 6 Best & 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

S. 225, 34 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 137, 12 L. T. N. S. 178, 13 Week. Rep. 561, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 573; Betteley v. Reed, 4 Q. B. 511, 7 Jur. 507, 3 Gale & D. 561, 12 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 172; Palmtag v. Doutrick, 59 Cal. 154, 43 Am. Rep. 245.

If the bailee is embarrassed by the conflicting claims of the bailor and a third person, who claims to be the principal of the bailor, each claiming to own the goods, and to be his bailor, so that he cannot even, with the bond of indemnity, safely or properly deliver the property to the claimant, he can relieve himself from all responsibility by promptly commencing a suit in equity, in the nature of a bill of interpleader, against both parties, and thus have the controversy and the conflicting rights to the property judicially determined. Ball v. Liney, 48 N. Y. 6, 8 Am. Rep. 511.

When there are adverse claims, and the bailee cannot compel the bailor and the adverse claimant to interplead, he must, at common law, defend himself as well as he may. If he is unwilling to undertake the burden of proving the superior title to his principal, he may retain possession and defend in an action by the adverse claimant. On such action being brought, he may give his bailor notice of its tendency and require him to defend his title. A judgment against the bailee where the bailor appears or refuses to defend after notice will be a sufficient defense in any subsequent action by the bailor, the rule that the bailee cannot dispute the title of the bailor not applying under such circumstances. Powell v. Robinson, 76 Ala. 423. A. G. S.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

WILLIAM W. DANENHOWER, Appt.,

v.

NARCISSA HAYES.

(35 App. D. C. 65.)

Contract — hotel accommodations — negotiations for others — personal liability.

One who engages accommodations at a hotel for a party, promising that they will occupy and utilize them, is personally liable for the contract price in case the party upon arriving refuses to accept the accommodations and goes elsewhere.

(April 5, 1910.)

Note. — Effect upon contract obligation of failure of third person to take action essential to performance.

It has long since been established that "where the law creates a duty or charge, and the party is disabled to perform it without any default in him, and hath no remedy over, there the law will excuse him . . . but when the party by his own con-

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Supreme Court affirming a judgment of a Justice of the Peace in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of an alleged contract to furnish plaintiff's hotel with certain prospective guests. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hayden Johnson and O. A. Keigwin for appellant.

Mr. Levi H. David, for appellee:

Where a party by his own contract creates a duty or obligation possible of fulfilment, he must make good his undertaking, unless prevented from doing so by the act of God, the law, or the other party.

Macfarland v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 29 App. D. C. 506.

tract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract." This distinction, which has its basis in the classic decision of Paradine v. Jane, Ayleyn, 26, from which the preceding quotation is taken, has been followed in a multitude of subsequent cases which establish the general doctrine that impossibility of performing an absolute promise will not relieve from the obligation.

The rigor of this rule is somewhat tempered in its application by the doctrine that the provision against liability for nonperformance occasioned by intervening impossibility need not be in express terms, but may be implied from the nature of subject-matter of the contract and the situation of the parties. Whether a contract is to be operative in the event of performance becoming impossible is therefore dependent upon the real intention of the parties. See, among the multitude of decisions to this effect: School Dist. No. 1 v. Dauchy, 25 Conn. 530, 68 Am. Dec. 371; Hillyard v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 35 N. J. L. 415; and Wolfe v. Howes, 20 N. Y. 197, 75 Am. Dec. 388.

Such being the situation, the question arises as to when an intention that the contract shall not continue operative may be inferred. Some courts have stated as a general rule that further performance is excused where rendered impossible by the act of God or of the law; but the decisions themselves show that no such categorical assertion can be universally correct. The true view appears to be that the character of the circumstance which occasioned the impossibility does not conclusively establish an intention that in such an event the promise shall not be operative, but that the solution of the question must ever depend upon the facts of the particular case.

Owing to the manifold aspects in which the question is likely to be presented, the following cases which, like the decision reported, deal with the effect upon a contract obligation of impossibility of performance 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

occasioned by the failure of a third party to take some action essential to the performance, probably do not comprehend all the decisions of that type. They will, nevertheless, serve to show that the fact that the act of a third party is a prerequisite to a promisor's ability to perform does not necessarily and of itself give rise to the implication that the promise was conditional upon such act. This does not mean, of course, that such is always the case. An instance of this may be found in the suggestion made in the decision reported, that the contract therein under construction was conditioned upon the coming of the party of guests to the city.

In M'Neill v. Reid, 9 Bing. 68, it was held that a promisor was liable for nonperformance of an agreement to introduce a stranger into a firm of which he was a member, although such nonperformance was due to his inability to obtain the consent of his copartners, Bosanquet, J., saying: "It is objected that the contract is of such a nature that the defendant could not perform it without the consent of his partners; but that does not discharge the defendant from his contract, for he ought not to have engaged in it unless he had secured that consent or was willing to incur the consequences; as where a party undertakes to sell a lease which he cannot assign without the consent of the lessor, it is his business to procure such consent."

The performance of an agreement by a carrier to procure the renewal of notes or to return them is not excused by the refusal of an indorser to whom they have been delivered to give them up or renew them, because he has been summoned as trustee of a subsequent indorser. Wareham Bank v. Burt, 5 Allen, 113.

In Cobb v. Harmon, 23 N. Y. 148, it was held that sureties in a bond conditioned for the diligent prosecution by a debtor of his application for a discharge were not relied from liability by the fact that the prosecution within the time stipulated was rendered impossible by the circumstance that the only available judge was absent from the county and in such a state of intoxication as to be unfit to discharge the duties of his office. The court said: "The nonperformance was not caused by the act of God, nor of the law, nor of the obligee. It was attributable solely to the default of the judge, resulting from acts within his own control. His absence was voluntary, and his inability of unfitness to discharge the duties of his office was in consequence of the free indulgence of a depraved appetite. All was the result of his own agency, and although the defendants themselves had done nothing to contribute to that result, and may not have been able in fact to prevent it, they nevertheless, by obligating themselves absolutely that the application should be made, became bound not only that the petition and notices necessary to that end should be served, but also that the requisite means to make those steps effectual should be secured through the officer of the law appointed for that purpose. As a part of those means they undertook to secure the attendance of the judge, and so far to rule and govern him as that he should not, by his own acts and conduct, disqualify himself from the discharge of his official duty. Their obligation was in this respect the same in principle as that assumed by a party for the faithful discharge of an official or other duty by a third party, and the performance thereof was no more impossible. It is said by Brian, Ch. J., that 'there is a diversity where a condition becomes impossible by the act of God, as death, and where by a third person (or stranger), and where by the obligor, and where by the obligees; the first and last are sufficient excuses of forfeiture, but the second is not, for in such case the obligor has undertaken that he can rule and govern the stranger, and in the third case it is his own act.' Hendrick v. Lindsay, 93 U. S. 148, 23 L. ed. 855.

Van Orsdel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against the appellant William W. Danenhowe, and in favor of appellee Narcissa Hayes for the sum of $250 for the breach of an alleged contract. This action was originally brought in the justice of the peace court, and a judgment there rendered in favor of appellee for the sum of $125, from which judgment appellant appealed to the supreme court of the District.

It appears that on March 26, 1908, appelsibility for failure to perform, because prevented from performance by the neglect or omission of some other person upon whom he had depended for such performance. Van Etten v. Newton, 15 Daly, 542, 29 N. Y. S. R. 411, 8 N. Y. Supp. 478.

Employees quitting the employment of one who has contracted to saw lumber and ties, on account of the prevalence of small-pox, and thereby greatly diminishing the capacity of the employer's mill, is no defense for the nonperformance of his contract. Vale v. Suiter, 58 W. Va. 353, 52 S. E. 313.

Where a railway company agreed that the total amount of grain received at an elevator should be at least 5,000,000 bushels a year during the term of a lease, and, if it should fall short of that amount, agreed to pay the lessee 1 cent per bushel on the amount of such deficiency, such company by offering at the elevator the stipulated quantity of grain performed its agreement, and the inability of the lessee to accept the grain so tendered on account of the storage capacity of the elevator being fully occupied by third parties, whose action in respect to allowing the grain to remain, or to be removed, was beyond the control of either the company or the lessee, cannot operate to defeat such performance or constitute any ground for holding the company liable on its agreement. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Hoyt, 149 U. S. 1, 37 L. ed. 625, 13 Sup. St. Rep. 779, reversing 39 Fed. 416.

Another case which, although not precisely in point, may profitably be stated in the present connection, is Tone v. Doelger, 6 Robt. 251, in which it was held that the promisor was absolved from the performance of his undertaking to fill in with certain earth removed by him in process of excavating, where by the direction of the other party to the contract he had placed it upon adjoining lands, the owner of which would not allow him to remove it. The decision in this case, however, proceeded upon the theory that performance was prevented rather by the act of the promisee in directing the disposition of the earth, than lant was the proprietor of the Fredonia Hotel and the appellee was the proprietress of the George Washington Hotel, both situated in this city. Shortly prior thereto, appellant had engaged to accommodate at his hotel a party of about forty-five persons from Boston. Some days before their arrival, appellant, finding that he could not accommodate them, requested appellee to arrange for their accommodation at her hotel. The agreement between the parties was partly verbal and partly in writing. The written portions consisted of two separate papers, one signed by appellee and the other signed by appellant. The writing signed by appellee is as follows: "3-26-'08. Miss N. Hayes agrees to take 45 people from Sunday afternoon, March 29, to Friday after breakfast at $7.50 per person. April 3." The record does not contain a copy of the paper signed by appellant, but it is recited in the bill of exceptions: "Then Mr. Danenhower signed a paper writing (which he drew up himself) whereby he bound himself personally to pay to the plaintiff 35 cents for each of the 45 persons in order that the plaintiff would be assured of receiving $7.50 for each of said persons." This agreement on the part of appellant to pay appellee 35 cents for each of the forty-five persons was due to the fact that the rate at which appellant had agreed to take the party was thirty-five cents less per person for the five days that that demanded by appellee.

The evidence on the part of the appellee,

by that of the third person in forbidding its removal.

in effect, discloses, and for the purposes of this appeal must be accepted as true, that the appellant assured appellee that the forty-five persons would come to Washington and that they would remain at the George Washington Hotel for the four and three-quarter days from March 29, 1908. Pursuant to the agreement, appellee made preparations for the accommodation of the prospective guests, incurred considerable expense, and, in order to reserve room for them, refused to contract for another party with whom she had been negotiating. It appears that, when the party arrived in Washington, appellant sent automobiles to the depot to meet them, and they were taken to appellee's hotel. After inspecting the rooms, they all left the hotel, refusing to accept the accommodations afforded. For the damage sustained, appellee brought this suit.

The case comes here on a single assignment of error: "That the court below erred in refusing to grant his motion, made at the conclusion of the evidence, to instruct the jury to return a verdict in his favor."

The evidence of appellee discloses that appellant made representations to her which amounted to a guaranty on his part that the party of guests would not only come to her hotel, but that they would stop there during the time agreed upon. This was disputed by the testimony of the appellant. An issue of fact was, therefore, presented to the jury, the further consideration of which, under the limitations of the single assignment of error, is foreclosed by the verdict. This is a contract based upon the happening of a contingency, namely, the coming of a party of guests to be turned over to appellee by appellant to be entertained. The party came, and appellee fulfilled her part of the contract by furnishing the accommodations agreed upon. Her proof is that appellant failed in his part of the agreement in that the party refused to accept the accommodations afforded and which appellant had contracted that they would accept.

This is simply a case of the appellant's undertaking to do a perfectly lawful thing which he was unable to perform. Such contracts, in the absence of fraud, are enforceable. In 2 Parsons on Contracts, p. 673, it is said: "If one, for a valid consideration, promises another to do that which is, in fact, impossible, but the promise is not obtained by actual or constructive fraud and is not on its face obviously impossible, there seems no reason why the promisor should not be held to pay damages for the breach of the contract; not, in fact, for not doing what cannot be done, but for undertaking and promising to do it. Ashmore v. Cox 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

[1899] 1 Q. B. 436, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 72, 15 Times L. R. 55, 4 Com. Cas. 48. So, if it becomes impossible by contingencies which should have been foreseen and provided against in the contract, and still more, if they might have been prevented, the promisor should be held answerable. So, if the impossibility applies to the promisor personally, there being no natural impossibility in the thing, this will not be a sufficient excuse."

Such contracts, when fairly and honestly made, are enforceable. There is no claim of fraud or deception in this case. The agreement was a fair one with ample consideration. Touching the question of consideration, in Hendrick v. Lindsay, 93 U. S. 143, 23 L. ed. 855, the court said: "It is argued that Hendrick had no personal interest in the matter, and that, therefore, there was no consideration for his promise. But damage to the promisee constitutes as good a consideration as benefit to the promisor. In Pillans v. Van Mierop, 3 Burr. 1663, the court say: 'Any damage or suspension of a right or possibility of a loss occasioned to the plaintiff by the promise of another is sufficient consideration for such promise, and will make it binding, although no actual benefit accrues to the party promising.' This rule is sustained by a long series of adjudged cases."

The questions of fact in this case have been disposed of by the jury, and there are no questions of law that demand further consideration. The judgment is affirmed, with costs, and it is so ordered.

pears to have been some conflict of authority on that question. Where it is held that proof of seduction is wholly inadmissible upon the question of damages in a breach of promise suit, the question as to the necessity of averring it, of course, does not arise. But where the apparently better established rule prevails, that seduction may be considered in aggravation of damages in breach of promise suits, the other question, as involved in HENDRY v. ELLIS, arises, upon which, as further indicated in the note in 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 616, and as stated in HENDRY v. ELLIS there is an irreconcilable conflict of authority. In numerous cases holding evidence of seduction generally competent, it appears that it has been duly averred, and in such cases, again the question of pleading here involved does not arise. But where the seduction has not been averred, some courts have still held evidence thereof to be admissible in aggravation of damages, while others, like HENDRY v. ELLIS have held it inadmissible, in the absence of special averment.

The latter view, as stated in HENDRY v. ELLIS, seems to be more in line with the rule of pleading "that special damages, not the natural and usual result of the acts complained of, should be alleged,"—seduction not being a "direct, natural, and usual result of the contract of marriage or the breach of it."

As stated in Tyler v. Salley, 82 Me. 128, 19 Atl. 107: "The distinction between general and special damages, and the necessity of a special averment to permit the recovery of special damages, is now well settled." And the increase of shame and distress of mind following the breach of a promise of marriage, where there has been a seduction under and by virtue of such promise, though the proximate result of the breach, "is not a natural or necessary one,—not one implied by the law from a simple statement of the cause of action,—but arises from another and distinct statement of facts, which are traversable and which must be proved, and to be proved must be alleged. These are facts upon which the defendant is entitled to be heard, and of which he has a 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Hocker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error sued plaintiff in error in the circuit court of De Soto county for breach of promise of marriage.

The declaration is as follows: "For that the plaintiff, the said Willie E. Ellis, and the defendant, the said William A. Hendry, on the 15th day of October, A. D. 1906, agreed to marry one another, and a reasonable time for such marriage has elapsed, and the plaintiff has always been willing and ready to marry the defendant, yet the defendant has neglected and refused to marry the plaintiff, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $10,000. Whereupon she brings this suit."

Pleas of not guilty, and two special right to the legal notice before he can be required to answer." And, especially in view of the possibility of a false charge of seduction in an action of this kind, and the consequences in case the defendant had no notice of such charge prior to the time of trial, this would seem to be the only just rule.

So, in Herriman v. Layman, 118 Iowa, 590, 92 N. W. 710, holding that seduction, before it can be considered in aggravation of damages, must be alleged in the petition, the court said: "Though the proximate result, it is by no means the natural or necessary one to be implied from a general statement of the breach of promise. Allowance because of it is in the nature of special damages, to be specifically alleged, especially so in view of our statute authorizing an unmarried female to maintain an action for her own seduction. Ordinarily, a distinct state of facts is involved, which are traversable by the defendant; and when not alleged, seduction should not be considered an element of damages."

Likewise, in Indiana, where, by statute, a woman can maintain in her own name an action for her own seduction, it has been held that evidence of seduction cannot be admitted to enhance the damages in a suit for breach of a marriage contract, under a complaint which contains no allegation of seduction. Cates v. McKinney, 48 Ind. 562, 17 Am. Rep. 768.

Referring to the earlier cases of Whalen v. Layman, 2 Blackf. 194, 18 Am. Dec. 157, and King v. Kersey, 2 Ind. 402, holding evidence of seduction admissible to enhance the damages in breach of promise suits, the court said: "In the cases in 2 Blackf. and in 2 Ind., it does not appear whether the declaration alleged seduction or not." And further: "When the cases in this court were decided, a woman could not prosecute an action for her own seduction." Cates v. McKinney, supra.

And in Felger v. Etzell, 75 Ind. 417, although the only point directly involved was whether evidence upon the subject of illicit intercourse between the parties was admissible as bearing upon the question as to pleas to the effect that the plaintiff had been guilty of illicit intercourse with other men, which was unknown to the defendant at the time the promise to marry was made, were filed. And on the trial a verdict and judgment were given for the plaintiff. Among the errors assigned here are that the court admitted evidence on the part of the plaintiff, over the objection of defendant, of the seduction by the defendant and the birth of a bastard child, there being nothing alleged in the declaration to that effect.

The defendant in error has not favored us with a brief in support of the rulings of the trial court, but we have given the matter some investigation, and we find that the courts are in irreconcilable conflict whether or not a contract of marriage was in fact made, the court said: "It is very clear that the evidence complained of was not competent for the purpose of enhancing or aggravating the appellee's damages, where, as in this case, the complaint contains no allegation of her seduction by the appellant. . . . We are clearly of the opinion therefore that the evidence of the illicit intercourse between the parties was wholly inadmissible in this case for any purpose."

In Leavitt v. Cutler, 37 Wis. 46, where the trial judge had instructed the jury that if the defendant seduced the plaintiff under promise of marriage, and if the defendant's charges of unchastity against the plaintiff were not proved, the seduction might properly be considered as enhancing the damages, the court said: "The authorities seem to sustain the instruction as correct in the law, but we think the better practice is to require that seduction should be alleged in the complaint before any evidence thereof (if duly objected to) is received. . . . But it is quite unnecessary to enlarge upon these questions [judgment having been reversed and the case remanded on another ground], inasmuch as the circuit court has full power to allow the pleadings to be amended to meet the exigencies of the case."

In Daggett v. Wallace, 75 Tex. 352, 16 Am. St. Rep. 908, 13 S. W. 49, although seduction was duly alleged, it appears inferentially that this is necessary in order to recover therefor, the court saying: "It is settled by the great majority of cases that, in an action for the breach of a promise of marriage, such seduction, if alleged and proved, is proper to be considered in estimating the damages."

And in Burks v. Shain, 2 Bibb, 341, 5 Am. Dec. 616, holding that the plaintiff in an action for a breach of promise, being particeps criminis, cannot recover damages therein for seduction, especially where her father has brought suit for the seduction, it seems that the want of a special averment of seduction may also have been one reason for such holding, the court saying: "Nor is there any allegation, either general or special, under which testimony of the seduction is admissible." But the further conclusive consideration also appears, "that the promise attempted to be proven on the trial was made at a period subsequent to the seduction, and of which the seduction might have been the cause, but could not have been the consequence. Had it therefore been alleged with a per quod, evidence of it could not have been admitted to increase the plaintiff's damages."

Opposed to these cases are others from an equal or even a greater number of jurisdictions, holding that seduction brought about and accomplished by the defendant under and by virtue of a promise of marriage may be shown in aggravation of the damages in a suit for breach of the promise, although not specially alleged. Poehlmann v. Kertz, 204 Ill. 418, 68 N. E. 467, affirming 105 Ill. App. 249; Lowden v. Morrison, 36 Ill. App. 495; Jennette v. Sullivan, 63 Hun, 361, 18 N. Y. Supp. 266; Dent v. Pickens, 34 W. Va. 240, 26 Am. St. Rep. 921, 12 S. E. 698.

So, also, in Fidler v. McKinley, 21 Ill. 308, holding evidence of seduction admissible in an action of this kind, it appears from the opinion of Breese, J., expressing a strong dissent on this point, that seduction was not averred, though he argued that evidence of seduction was not admissible in a breach of promise action, whether averred or not.

The reason for this holding seems to be that, while seduction is not the natural result of a promise of marriage, and while the law may not imply that damages for seduction are a natural result of a breach of promise of marriage, yet, "when seduction follows in consequence of the promise, degradation, loss of character and happiness, are the direct result of a breach of that promise." Poehlmann v. Kertz, supra.

So, proof of seduction is said to be merely evidence of such direct damages, necessarily following a breach of a contract, and "it is not necessary to plead that which is merely evidence." Lowden v. Morrison, supra.

But, as noted above, while this reasoning may be satisfactory in cases of actual seduction, it would be highly unjust to a defendant in a breach of promise suit, falsely charged for the first time, upon trial, with seduction.

A somewhat different line of reasoning appears in Dent v. Pickens, supra, where the court said: "Upon this question [whether proof of seduction can be admitted where there has been no direct averment thereof in the declaration] there is a conflict of authorities. Those who hold such averment a necessary prerequisite go upon the well-settled doctrine that two causes of action cannot be combined and prosecuted in one suit, and that any special circumstance in aggravation of damages should be alleged in the declaration. The other and weightier class of authorities proceeds upon the idea that, when a contract for future marriage has been entered into, the relation between the parties is in the nature of a trust, and that the seduction of the female, upon the question whether it is necessary that the declaration should allege seduction and the birth of a bastard child, as a predicate for the introduction of evidence of these facts.

In West Virginia and New Jersey, it is held that such evidence may be given in aggravation of damages, though nothing to that effect is alleged in the declaration.

while thus engaged, is in itself a breach of the promise of marriage, which is held to embrace an obligation and undertaking to protect and respect until the marriage is lawfully consummated; hence the evidence of seduction is admitted (whether directly averred or not in the declaration) as proof of the violation of his promise by the defendant."

If a defendant in a breach of promise action resorted to the marriage contract as a means of seduction, evidence of the seduction is admissible in aggravation of damages, although the declaration contains no direct averment thereof. Williams v. Hollingsworth, 6 Baxt. 12.

And in Ferguson v. Moore, 98 Tenn. 342, 39 S. W. 341, a breach of promise action in which seduction was specifically pleaded, and the question was as to the admissibility of evidence of an abortion, not specially pleaded, the court said, obiter: "It is true that in an action for breach of promise, seduction may be shown, though not alleged, but abortion is a separate, distinct grievance and injury," etc.

So, although evidence tending to show a seduction consequent upon a promise of marriage is competent to aggravate damages in an action for a breach of the promise, even without a special allegation thereof in the declaration, evidence of a venereal disease contracted from the defendant is incompetent, and cannot be considered in fixing the damages. Churan v. Sebesta, 131 Ill. App. 330.

In Coil v. Wallace, 24 N. J. L. 291, where presumably seduction was not alleged, though this is not entirely clear from the report, it was held that seduction effected under the influence and on the sanctity of a promise to marry may be considered as an aggravation of the damages in a suit for breach of the promise.

And in Mainz v. Lederer, 21 R. I. 370, 43 Atl. 876, holding that seduction may be shown in evidence in aggravation of damages in a breach of promise suit, it appears inferentially that the seduction was not alleged, and that this court considered such special allegation unnecessary, and it refers to the fact that "some states require an averment of special damages on this account."

So, in Sauer v. Schulenberg, 33 Md. 288, 3 Am. Rep. 174, holding that evidence of a seduction of the plaintiff, accomplished by the defendant after and by means of the promise of marriage, is admissible on the question of damages, it appears inferentially, at least, that the seduction was not al-

Dent v. Pickens, 26 Am. St. Rep. 921, and note (34 W. Va. 240, 12 S. E. 698); Coil v. Wallace, 24 N. J. L. 291. On the other hand, several courts of high authority hold that evidence of seduction of the plaintiff by the defendant under the alleged promise of marriage, and of her subsequent delivery of a bastard child, cannot be introduced, unless there is a special averment of these leged, though the question of admissibility of evidence thereof was discussed rather generally than as a question of necessity of averment.

And the same is true in Sherman v. Rawson, 102 Mass. 395, holding that the jury may consider seduction in awarding damages for the mortification and distress suffered as a result of the breach of promise.

This case was followed in Kelley v. Riley, 106 Mass. 339, 8 Am. Rep. 336, holding that, although the declaration did not allege special damage, seduction under and by virtue of the marriage promise, resulting in the birth of a child alive and still living, may be considered by the jury in computing damages, so far as it tends to aggravate and increase the disappointment, mortification, pain, or distress of mind which the plaintiff has suffered by reason of the defendant's breach of contract.

Other breach of promise cases holding evidence of seduction admissible upon the question of increased damages, in which it is not apparent whether or not the seduction was alleged, but in which it seems more probable that it was not, although the question as to the admissibility of the evidence of the seduction is discussed on general principles, and without reference to necessity of averment, are: Berry v. Da Costa, L. R. 1 C. P. 331, 12 Jur. N. S. 588, 1 Harrison & K. 291, 35 L. J. C. P. N. S. 191, 14 Week. Rep. 279; Tubbs v. Van Kleeck, 12 Ill. 446; Kurtz v. Frank, 76 Ind. 594, 40 Am. Rep. 275; Bennett v. Beam, 42 Mich. 346, 36 Am. Rep. 442, 4 N. W. 8; Bird v. Thompson, 96 Mo. 428, 9 S. W. 788; Kniffen v. McConnell, 30 N. Y. 285; Conn v. Wilson, 2 Overt, 233, 5 Am. Dec. 663; Goodall v. Thurman, 1 Head, 209.

And the report leaves the same uncertainty as to the question of pleading, in Wells v. Padgett, 8 Barb. 323, holding that where defendant's promise to marry plaintiff was made with a view to seduce her and then to abandon her, and by mean of such promise he has seduced her, the seduction will be regarded as an aggravation of a broken promise, and will authorize increased damages.

Where the defendant has pleaded as a defense to a breach of promise action that the plaintiff was an unchaste woman, it is competent for the plaintiff to prove that the defendant seduced her, and was the father of the child to whom she has given birth, although she has not alleged any special damages. Clark v. Phillips, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 826 (abstract). A. C. W.

facts in the declaration. Tyler v. Salley, 82 Me. 128, 19 Atl. 107; Leavitt v. Cutler, 37 Wis. 46; Geiger v. Payne, 102 Iowa, 581, 69 N. W. 554, 71 N. W. 571.

Of course, it must be alleged and proven that the seduction and sexual intercourse were brought about and accomplished by the defendant under and by virtue of the contract of marriage. These facts must be shown, even in those states where it is not necessary to allege them in the declaration. 3 Sutherland, Damages, pp. 316 et seq.; 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 744.

It seems to us that these decisions which require that seduction, sexual intercourse, and the birth of a bastard were brought about by and as a result of the contract of marriage, should be set up in the declaration, are more in line with the principles of pleading followed in this state than those which do not require such allegations. When such facts are alleged in the declaration, the defendant is advised before trial of what he has to meet.

The rule in this state is that special damages, not the natural and usual result of the acts complained of, should be alleged and proven. Ocala Foundry & Mach. Works v. Lester, 49 Fla. 199, 38 So. 51; Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Batchis, 54 Fla. 192, 44 So. 933; Moses v. Autuono, 56 Fla. 499, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 350, 47 So. 925.

It cannot be contended that seduction and the birth of a bastard child are the direct, natural, and usual result of the contract of marriage or the breach of it.

We think the trial judge erred in admitting the evidence of seduction of the plaintiff and the birth of a bastard child, in the absence of any allegation of those facts in the declaration.

A charge to the jury was given by the judge, based on the evidence of seduction and the birth of a bastard child. This was excepted to, and, of course, erroneous from our view of the law.

Charge No. 6 given by the judge was also excepted to and assigned as error. It seems to us this charge is objectionable as argumentative and somewhat too rhetorical as a statement of law. Of course, the facts of the case present a deplorable social tragedy calculated to arouse the sensibilities of every right-feeling man; but the trial judge should refrain from any statement which would have the effect of arousing the feelings of the jury. It is his duty to give the jury the law applicable to the evidence of the case, and leave it to counsel to make proper and legitimate 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

field of state action, to the essential authority of government to maintain peace and security, and to enact laws for the promotion of the health, safety, morals, and welfare of those subject to its jurisdiction. . . . The principle involved in these decisions [cases upholding statutes requiring reasonable maximum charges for public service etc.] is that where the legislative action is arbitrary and has no reasonable relation to a purpose which it is competent for government to effect, the legislature transcends the limits of its power in interfering with liberty of contract; but where there is reasonable relation to an object within the governmental authority, the exercise of the legislative discretion is not subject to judicial review. The scope of judicial inquiry in deciding the question of power is not to be confused with the scope of legislative considerations in dealing with the matter of policy. Whether the enactment is wise or unwise, whether it is based on sound economic theory, whether it is the best means to achieve the desired result, whether, in short, the legislative discretion within its prescribed limits should be exercised in a particular manner, are matters for the judgment of the legislature, and the earnest conflict of serious opinion does not suffice to bring them within the range of judicial cognizance.

"In dealing with the relation of employer and employed, the legislature has necessarily a wide field of discretion in order that there may be suitable protection of health and safety, and that peace and good order may be promoted through regulations designed to insure wholesome conditions of work and freedom from oppression. What differences, as to the extent of this power, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

may exist with respect to particular employments, and how far that which may be authorized as to one department of activity may appear to be arbitrary in another, must be determined as cases are presented for decision. . . . Here there is no question as to the validity of the regulation, or as to the power of the state to impose the liability which the statute prescribes. The statute relates to that phase of the relation of master and servant which is presented by the case of railroad corporations. It defined the liability of such corporations for injuries resulting from negligence and mismanagement in the use and operation of their railways. In the cases within its purview it extended the liability of the common law by abolishing the fellow-servant rule. Having authority to establish this regulation, it is manifest that the legislature was also entitled to insure its efficacy by prohibiting contracts in derogation of its provisions. In the exercise of this power, the legislature was not limited with respect either to the form of the contract, or the nature of the consideration, or the absolute or conditional character of the engagement. It was as competent to prohibit contracts which, on a specified event, or in a given contingency, should operate to relieve the corporation from the statutory liability which would otherwise exist, as it was to deny validity to agreements of absolute waiver. The policy of the amendatory act was the same as that of the original statute. Its provision that contracts of insurance relief, benefit, or indemnity, and the acceptance of such benefits, should not defeat recovery under the statute, was incidental to the regulation it was intended to enforce. Assuming the right of enforcement, the authority to enact this inhibition cannot be denied. If the legislature had the power to prohibit contracts limiting the liability imposed, it certainly could include in the prohibition stipulations of that sort in contracts of insurance relief, benefit, or indemnity, as well as in other agreements. But if the legislature could specifically provide that no contract for insurance relief should limit the liability for damages, upon what ground can it be said that it was beyond the legislative authority to deny that effect to the payment of benefits, or the acceptance of such payment, under the contract? The asserted distinction is sought to be based upon the fact that under the contract of membership, the employee has an election after the injury. But this circumstance, however appropriate it may be for legislative consideration, cannot be regarded as defining a limitation of legislative power. The power to prohibit contracts, in any case where it exists, necessarily implies legislative control over the transaction, despite the action of the parties. Whether this control may be exercised in a particular case depends upon the relation of the transaction to the execution of a policy which the state is competent to establish. It does not aid the argument to describe the defense as one of accord and satisfaction. The payment of benefits is the performance of the promise to pay, contained in the contract of member-

Mr. C. H. Elgin also for appellant.

Messrs. H. H. Trimble, Palmer Trimble, F. S. Payne, and J. W. Blythe for appellee.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's petition at law alleges that, while in the service of the defendant railway company as brakeman and while in the exercise of reasonable care for his own safety, he was seriously and permanently injured by reason of the negligence of a coemployee in the management of the train on which he was employed, and he asks to recover damages in the sum of $2,000. As a bar to the plaintiff's right of recovery the defendant alleges that at the time of the accident in which plaintiff was injured he was a member of the Burlington Relief Department, an association organized by the defendant and its employees (the rules and regulations of which are made a part of the answer), and that by reason of such membership the plaintiff became entitled to recover certain benefits while disabled by physical injury, and that he did in fact receive from the association on that account the aggregate sum of $822. It is further alleged that by the terms of the contract embodied in the relief department regulations, plaintiff had an election to accept said benefits, or to waive them and insist upon his claim against the defendant for damages, but he was not entitled to both, and that by reason of his acceptance of such benefits he is now estopped to recover anything in this action. The answer further asserts that the provisions of Code, § 2071, as amended by the twenty-seventh general assembly (Acts 27th Assemb. p. 23, chap. 49), have no effect to bar or estop the defendant from relying upon the defense above stated because said amendment is in contravention of the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the state of Iowa. A demurrer to the answer having been overruled, the plaintiff appeals.

The questions suggested by the record and argued by counsel may be condensed as follows: (1) Assuming the truth of the matters pleaded in the petition and answer, is the case one calling for the application of the statutory provision upon which plaintiff relies? (2) If the foregoing question be answered in the affirmative, is Code, § 2071, as it now stands, a valid exercise of legislative power, or is it void as being in contravention of the Constitution, national or state?

1. As originally enacted Code, § 2071, was in words as follows: "Every corporation operating a railway shall be liable for all damages sustained by any person, including employees of such corporation, in consequence of the neglect of the agents, or by any mismanagement of the engineers or other employees thereof, and in consequence of the wilful wrongs, whether of commission or omission, of such agents, engineers, or other employees, when such wrongs are in any manner connected with the use and operation of any railway on or about which they shall be employed, and no contract which restricts such liability shall be legal or binding." The amendment to which reference has been made adds to said section the following: "Nor shall any contract of insurance relief, benefit, or indemnity in case of injury or death, entered into prior to the injury, between the person so injured and such corporation or any other person or association acting for such corporation, nor shall the acceptance of any such relief, insurance, benefit, or indemnity by the person injured, his widow, heirs, or legal representatives after the injury, from such corporation, person, or association, constitute any bar or defense to any cause of action brought under the provisions of this section; but nothing contained herein shall be construed to prevent or invalidate any settlement for damages between the parties subsequent to the injuries received." The events leading up to the adoption of this amendment are matters of common knowledge. Subsequent to the enactment of Code, § 2071, in its original form, a relief department scheme for the payment of benefits to injured employees was organized by the appellee herein; one of the provisions or regulations of the department being that the bringing of suit by a member for damages should suspend his right to receive further benefits until the suit was discontinued, and the acceptance of the benefits should operate as a release and satisfaction of all claims for damages. Prior to the adoption of the amendment it was held by this court that the relief contract was not void as being against public policy, and employees of the railway who accepted benefits from the association on account of injuries received in the company's service were held to be barred from the recovery of damages. Donald v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 284, 33 L.R.A. 492, 61 N. W. 971; Maine v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 260, 70 N. W. 630, 80 N. W. 315. Upon the announcement of the first of the cited decisions the matter of further legislation to restrict or prohibit contracts of this nature became a topic of very general discussion throughout the state, and in apparent response to the public sentiment manifested, the twenty-eighth general assembly enacted the amendment quoted above. That it was intended to invalidate defenses like that which is here pleaded, and to permit an employee injured by the neglect of the corporation or its servants to recover his damages, notwithstanding the terms of his membership in the relief department, or the receipt of benefits thereunder, seems to be very clear from the language employed. To the extent that the legislative will is here expressed, the question of public policy which has been argued by counsel is eliminated; for the statute, if constitutional, must stand as the authoritative expression of the public policy of the state, which the courts are bound to observe and enforce.

But it is said in behalf of appellee that the amendment, even if valid, has reference to such relief contracts only as operate to "restrict the liability" of the company, and that this court, by its decisions under the statute as it stood before the amendment, has already held contracts similar to the one now before us not to be of that character. This argument is reinforced by the further proposition that, if the amendment is to be construed as enlarging the scope of the section and applied to cases not before within its prohibition, it must be held unconstitutional, because the title, "An Act to Amend Code, § 2071," does not sufficiently set forth the subject of the legislation. It will be conceded that, to be of any effect, an amendment to a statute must have some relevancy to the original act, and the two are to be read together in seeking to discover the legislative will and purpose. But there is no rule of interpretation requiring us to give the amended statute a meaning which differs in any degree from that which would have been given it had the matter of amendment been made a part of the original act. In other words, unless the contrary intent is clearly indicated, the amended statute is to be construed as if the original statute had been repealed and a new and independent act in the amended form had been adopted. Holbrook v. Nichol, 36 Ill. 161; McKibben v. Lester, 9 Ohio St. 627; Farrell v. State, 54 N. J. L. 421, 24 Atl. 725; Kamerick v. Castleman, 21 Mo. App. 587; Humphrey v. Parsons, 15 N. Y. 595; Conrad v. Nall, 24 Mich. 277. Now, Code, § 2071, as first enacted, making railway companies liable for injuries occasioned to a servant by the negligence of a fellow servant, gave to employees in that service an important right or measure of protection which did not before exist, and undertook to guard the same by a provision rendering void any agreement or stipulation in the contract of employment waiving or restricting the benefit of such statutes. This provision was stated in general terms only, and, when it was invoked to avoid the effect of appellee's relief department contract, this court decided, as we have already seen, that such contract did not restrict the statutory liability of the corporation and was therefore not affected by the prohibition. Thereafter, and by the amendment referred to, the legislature added a clause enumerating certain specific acts, agreements, contracts, and stipulations which shall constitute no defense to an action brought for the enforcement of the statutory liability. That enumeration so accurately describes the contract upon which the appellee here relies that it would be a mere affectation to profess to misunderstand it. To place upon it the construction asked for by the appellee is to deprive the amendment of all force and effect. The section in its original form invalidated in general terms all contracts restricting the liability of the corporation; and if, as contended, the amendment must be construed as applying only to such agreements for insurance, indemnity, or benefits as tend to "restrict" that liability within the meaning of the court's opinion in the Donald Case, then it neither increases nor diminishes the scope of the original provision, and the passage of the amending act was an idle and useless ceremony. Its words are not in the least obscure, its purpose is obvious, and unless we arbitrarily disregard the plain terms of the statute it must be construed in substantial accord with the appellant's contention. This being determined, we have next to inquire concerning its validity.

2. There is, in our judgment, no fatal defect in the title of the amending act. That act has but one purpose,—the amendment of Code, § 2071, and that purpose is succinctly stated. It is a general rule that a title which simply names or describes an amending act as such, without stating the specific character or substance of the amendment, is sufficient. Morford v. Unger, 8 Iowa, 82; Iowa Sav. & L. Asso. v. Selby, 111 Iowa, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

402, 82 N. W. 968; Timm v. Harrison, 109 Ill. 593; People ex rel. Gere v. Whitlock, 92 N. Y. 191; Robinson v. Lane, 19 Ga. 337. The act as amended relates to but one subject. The object sought to be obtained by the original statute was the imposing of a liability upon railway corporations in favor of their employees and the protection of the latter in the right thus created. If, in view of the practical operation of the statute, the legislature wisely or unwisely concluded that the protection thus provided was not sufficient for the intended purpose, and desired to specifically provide that the right given to the employees should not be waived or lost by reason of his membership in a railway relief department or by a participation in its benefits, it seems plain that (assuming the validity of such legislation in any form) it was entirely competent to so enact by way of amendment to the original statute, and that such amendment does not introduce a new subject of legislation. Generally speaking, the purpose of every amendment is to enlarge or restrict the application or effect of the statute so sought to be amended, and the fact that in the case at bar the amended statute is made to include within its prohibition a class of contracts which escaped the ban of the original act does not introduce a new or independent subject of legislation. It is only the general purpose which is to be expressed in the title, and not the methods or provisions by which that purpose is to be accomplished. People ex rel. Le Roy v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Rep. 103; People ex rel. Rochester v. Briggs, 50 N. Y. 553; Murdock v. Woodson, 2 Dill. 188, Fed. Cas. No. 9,942. It is sufficient if the provisions of the statute expressed have congruity and proper connection. De Witt v. San Francisco, 2 Cal. 289; Com. v. Green, 58 Pa. 226; State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. 470; Robinson v. State, 15 Tex. 311; Reed v. State, 12 Ind. 641. The title to an act "need not go into details. It is sufficient if it indicates with reasonable precision and clearness the subject it embraces. Nor is an act invalid because it includes details not mentioned in the title, provided the details are germane to the general subject designated in the title." Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Montgomery, 152 Ind. 1, 69 L.R.A. 875, 71 Am. St. Rep. 301, 49 N. E. 582. The title to the original act and of the amendment comes fairly within the rule of these authorities, and the objection thereto is not well taken.

3. Summing up their argument against the validity of the statute, counsel narrow the question to the proposition that it violates the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as well as the somewhat similar provisions found in our state Constitution. They say: "There are but two provisions of the Constitution of the United States relied upon by appellee in this case. These are found in the 14th Amendment. The substance of these provisions is that no state shall pass any law that will deprive any person of the right of life, liberty, and property, or deprive any person of the equal protection of the law. There are two provisions in our state Constitution, substantially similar: Section 1, art. 1 (Code, p. 60), and § 6, art. 1 (Code, p. 61). We assume that the court will regard itself bound to determine whether the Temple amendment is repugnant to these two provisions of the state Constitution." The questions thus raised are of great importance, and have been thoroughly and exhaustively presented in the briefs of counsel. It is well, at the threshold of the discussion, to recall the familiar rule by which we are bound in passing upon any proposition affecting the constitutionality of a legislative enactment. While it is an imperative duty, from which no court will shrink, to declare void any statute the unconstitutionality of which is made apparent, due regard to the boundary between the legislative and judicial departments of our government requires that this prerogative be exercised with the greatest caution, and only after every reasonable presumption has been indulged in favor of the validity of the act. Merchants' Union Barb Wire Co. v. Brown, 64 Iowa, 275, 20 N. W. 434; Stewart v. Polk County, 30 Iowa, 9, 1 Am. Rep. 238; Duncombe v. Prindle, 12 Iowa, 1; Reed v. Wright, 2 G. Greene, 15; State ex rel. Weir v. County Judge, 2 Iowa, 280; Whiting v. Mt. Pleasant, 11 Iowa, 482; Flint & F. Pl. Road Co. v. Woodhull, 25 Mich. 99, 12 Am. Rep. 233; Evans v. Job, 8 Nev. 322. It is not the province of the court to pass upon the policy, wisdom, or justice of the statute, or upon the expediency of its enactment. Central Iowa R. Co. v. Wright County, 67 Iowa, 199, 25 N. W. 128; Merchants' Union Barb Wire Co. v. Brown, supra.

So thoroughly are the courts committed to this theory of the law that in Stewart v. Polk County, 30 Iowa, 9, 1 Am. Rep. 238, it is said that a legislative act may be declared unconstitutional only when it violates that instrument clearly, palpably, plainly, and in such manner as to leave no reasonable doubt. In this same case we approvingly quoted the language of Mr. Justice Baldwin of the Federal court as follows: "We cannot declare a legislative act void because it conflicts with our opinions of policy, expediency, or justice. We are not the guardians of the rights of the people of the state, unless they are secured by some constitutional provision which comes within our judicial cognizance. The remedy for unwise or oppressive legislation within constitutional bounds is by appeal to the justice and patriotism of the representatives of the people. If this fail, the people in their sovereign capacity can correct the evil; but the courts cannot assume their rights." The inquiry to which we are confined is one of legislative power alone. It is fundamental in our system of government that all powers not delegated to the United States by the terms of the Federal Constitution and its amendments, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states or to the people. U. S. Const. Amend. 10. Subject to the authority thus expressly or by necessary inference delegated to the Federal government, the state has sovereign legislative power over all subjects, except such as are withheld from it by the Constitution of the state itself. Boyd v. Ellis, 11 Iowa, 97; Stewart v. Polk County, 30 Iowa, 9, 1 Am. Rep. 238; Purezell v. Smidt, 21 Iowa, 540; Morrison v. Springer, 15 Iowa, 324; Boyer v. Kinnick, 90 Iowa, 74, 57 N. W. 691; Hawkeye Ins. Co. v. French, 109 Iowa, 588, 80 N. W. 660; New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 102, 9 L. ed. 648; Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. v. Dey, 82 Iowa, 312, 12 L.R.A. 436, 3 Inters. Com. Black*, 47 Tex. 558. It is not for the court to inquire or determine whether a state of facts existed calling for the enactment of the legislation in question. That is for the exclusive consideration of the legislature. If under any possible state of facts the act would be constitutional and valid, the court is bound to presume that such condition existed. Murin v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; State v. Peckham, 3 R. I. 289; Re Ten Hour Law, 24 R. I. 603, 61 L.R.A. 612, 54 Atl. 602.

4. Is the statute objectionable as class legislation, or as denying to the corporation the equal protection of the laws? The 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides, among other things, that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. While a corporation is not a citizen within the meaning of this amendment, it is a "person," and as such may not rightfully be denied the protection of the laws of the state upon equal terms with all other persons under like circumstances and conditions. Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42

L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 43 L. ed. 432, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 165; Pembina Consol. Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. But the reasonable classification of persons for the purposes of legislation according to occupation, business, or other circumstances, by which one class or portion of the people is differentiated from other portions or classes, has often been held not to be a violation of this constitutional guaranty. The mere fact that legislation is special, and made to apply to certain persons, and not to others, does not affect its validity, if it be so made that all persons subject to its terms are treated alike under like circumstances and conditions. Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 68, 30 L. ed. 578, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350; Com. v. Interstate Consol. Street R. Co. 187 Mass. 436, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 973, 73 N. E. 530, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 418; State v. Nelson, 52 Ohio St. 88, 26 L.R.A. 317, 39 N. E. 22; People v. Smith, 108 Mich. 527, 32 L.R.A. 853, 62 Am. St. Rep. 715, 66 N. W. 382; People v. Walbridge, 6 Cow. 512; Dugger v. Mechanics' & T. Ins. Co. 95 Tenn. 245, 28 L.R.A. 796, 32 S. W. 5; Walston v. Nevin, 128 U. S. 578, 32 L. ed. 544, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192; Duncan v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 377, 38 L. ed. 485, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 570; Broadfoot v. Fayetteville, 121 N. C. 422, 39 L.R.A. 245, 61 Am. St. Rep. 668, 28 S. E. 515; State v. Tower, 185 Mo. 79, 68 L.R.A. 402, 84 S. W. 10; People v. Bellett, 99 Mich. 151, 22 L.R.A. 696, 41 Am. St. Rep. 589, 57 N. W. 1094.

Such, also, has been the uniform holding of this court with reference to the corresponding provision in our state Constitution. A leading case to this effect is McAunich v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 20 Iowa, 338. As we there said: "Such laws are general and uniform, not because they operate upon every person in the state, . . . but because every person who is brought within the relations and circumstances provided for is affected by the law. They are general and uniform in their operation upon all persons in the like situation, and the fact of their being general and uniform is not affected by the number of persons within the scope of their operation." Treating the same question, the Supreme Court of the United States by Field, J., in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161, says: "The greater part of all legislation is special, either in the objects sought to be attained by it or in the extent of its application. . . . Such legislation does 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) not infringe upon the clause of the 14th Amendment requiring equal protection of the laws, because it is special in its character. . . . And when legislation applies to particular bodies or associations, imposing upon them additional liabilities, it is not open to the objection that it denies to them the equal protection of the laws, if all persons brought under its influence are treated alike under the same condition." See also People v. Havnor, 149 N. Y. 206, 31 L.R.A. 689, 52 Am. St. Rep. 707, 43 N. E. 541; Missouri v. Lewis (Bowman v. Lewis), 101 U. S. 22, 25 L. ed. 989; Duncan v. Missouri, 152 U. Rep. 721; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. ed. 1031, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Crider, 91 Tenn. 501, 19 S. W. 618; Butte v. Paltrovich, 30 Mont. 18, 104 Am. St. Rep. 698, 75 Pac. 521.

That legislation imposing upon railway companies special restrictions, obligations, and liabilities not generally applicable to other persons or corporations, is not a denial of the equal protection of the laws, has been so often decided as to be no longer a debatable question. Thus the courts have upheld statutes depriving railway companies of the benefit of the fellow-servant doctrine (Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 31 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771, 16 N. W. 413; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Herrick, 127 U. S. 210, 32 L. ed. 109, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1176); requiring a railway company to pay attorneys' fees to the landowner in condemnation proceedings (Gano v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 114 Iowa, 719, 55 L.R.A. 263, 89 Am. St. Rep. 393, 87 N. W. 714; Id.; 190 U. S. 557, 47 L. ed. 1183, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 854); subjecting railway corporations to double damages under certain circumstances (Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 29 L. ed. 463, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U. S. 26, 32 L. ed. 585, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207); denying railway corporations the right of appeal from assessment for taxation, although such right is given to owners of other taxable property (Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. ed. 1031, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114); making such corporations liable, without regard to negligence, for fires set by their engines (Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. ed. 909, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609); and requiring them to pay without discount to a discharged employee wages earned at the time of discharge (St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, 173 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 746, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419). In each of these cases, and in many others which might be cited, the statute under consideration was made applicable to railway companies only, and in each case it was vigorously assailed as a denial of the equal protection of the laws; but in each instance, after thorough argument proceeding along the lines followed by counsel for the appellee herein, the court of last resort has uniformly held the legislation to be a valid exercise of the police power of the states. In view of these decisions we think it beyond question that the statute here under consideration cannot be said to be void as a denial of the equal protection guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. As to the general nature of this amendment and the limits of its application, see Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 29 L. ed. 463, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357; Missouri, K & T. R. Co. v. May, 194 U. S. 267, 48 L. ed. 971, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 638; Farmers' & M. Ins. Co. v. Dobney, 189 U. S. 301, 47 L. ed. 821, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565; Froelich v. Toledo & O. C. R. Co. 24 Ohio C. C. 359; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mahaffey, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 81 S. W. 1047.

5. Is the statute an unwarranted interference with liberty of contract? The right of contract is not one of the rights which are guaranteed in express words by the Constitution, but such protection exists as a necessary inference from the express guaranty of property rights. This right, like all others possessed by the individual member of society, is held subject to such reasonable restrictions and regulations as may be imposed for the general good. The power by which these limitations are imposed upon the liberty of the individual is commonly called the "police power," which is but another name for that portion of the sovereignty of the state not surrendered by the terms of the national compact. The police power, as that term is commonly employed, may be paraphrased as society's natural right of self-defense, and its definition and limitation vary with the circumstance calling for its exercise. To enshrine it in any fixed or rigid formula would be to destroy its value, for it would then be deprived of its indispensable quality of adaptation to changing conditions, and thus defeat the ends it was intended to promote. 6 Words & Phrases, p. 5424, and cases there cited. While protection of public health and public morals and the promotion of social order are peculiarly within its province, these are but instances of its application, and do not limit its sphere of action. People v. Budd, 117 N. Y. 1, 5 L.R.A. 559, 15 Am. St. Rep. 460, 22 N. E. 670, 682; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357. The police power of the state is the power to govern men and things within the limit of its dominions. It comprehends all those general laws of internal regulations necessary to secure peace, good order, health, and prosperity of the people, and the regulations and protection of property and property rights. State v. Harrington, 68 Vt. 622, 34 L.R.A. 100, 35 Atl. 515; State v. Reynolds, 77 Conn. 131, 58 Atl. 755. It adapts itself to the changing conditions of society, and makes it competent for the state to devise, adopt, and enforce any new regulation or restriction, not clearly forbidden by the Constitution, which it believes to be expedient under the peculiar circumstances with which it is sought to deal. The spirit which pervades the police power is closely related to that which is embodied in the common-law maxim, Sic utere tuo alienum non ladas. The liberty of the individual may always be restrained where its unregulated exercise becomes a source of danger or injury to the society of which that individual is a member. "As soon as any part of a person's conduct affects prejudicially the interests of others, society has jurisdiction over it." Mill, Liberty, chap. 4. See also Powell v. Com. 114 Pa. 265, 60 Am. Rep. 350, 7 Atl. 913, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 32; Oil City v. Oil City Trust Co. 151 Pa. 454, 31 Am. St. Rep. 770, 25 Atl. 124; Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 89, 34 L. ed. 620, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13; Jamison v. Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Co. 128 Ind. 560, 12 L.R.A. 652, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 613, 23 N. E. 76; Garrett v. Aby, 47 La. Ann. 618, 17 So. 238; Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079; State v. Tower, 185 Mo. 79, 68 L.R.A. 402, 84 S. W. 10.

Of course, it must be kept in mind that the police power, like all other powers of the state, is subordinate to the Constitution, and if the legislature, under the guise of police regulation, transgress the express or clearly implied limits drawn by the Constitution, the courts will hold the act void and of no effect. But this authority of the court involves a duty of the most delicate and responsible character, and, as we have already said, is to be exercised in no doubtful case. The court is not to substitute its own ideas for those of the legislature as to the propriety, wisdom, or justice of the statute. It must not arrogate to itself superior knowledge of the public needs, nor assume to prescribe remedies for public ills. Cases may, perhaps, be found where this fundamental distinction has apparently been overlooked, thus affording some measure of support for the proposition advanced by counsel that "the validity of the statute depends upon the question whether it is a measure for the public good." The adoption of such a rule would be to transfer the lawmaking power to the judiciary, and work the utter elimination of the legislative department as a co-ordinate branch of the government. The courts do not sit to revise or review legislative action, and if they hold an act invalid it is because the legislature has failed to keep within the express or clearly implied limitations of the Constitution. A court has no right to declare an act invalid solely because of unjust and oppressive provisions, or because it is supposed to violate the natural, social, or political rights of the citizen, unless it can be shown that such injustice is prohibited, or such rights guaranteed, by the Constitution. Except when the Constitution has imposed limits upon the legislative power, it must be considered practically absolute. Neither are the courts at liberty to declare an act void merely because, in their judgment, it is opposed to the spirit of the Constitution. They must be able to point out the specific provision, expressed or clearly implied from what is expressed, which the act violates. Cooley, Const. Lim. chap. 7; Winter v. Jones, 10 Ga. 190, 54 Am. Dec. 379.

The duty to keep within the constitutional limits of its jurisdiction is no less binding upon the court than upon the legislature. It is a settled proposition that the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution was not intended to limit or hamper the states in the exercise of their police powers. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 34 L. ed. 519, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 930; Re Converse, 137 U. S. 624, 34 L. ed. 796, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 191; Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 992, 1257. Considering a statute like our Code, § 2071, the Minnesota court declares it to be "a police regulation intended to protect life, person, and property by securing a more careful selection of servants and a more rigid enforcement of their duties by railroad companies." Mikkelsen v. Truesdale, 63 Minn. 137, 65 N. W. 260. Nor is this protection confined to the employees alone. It tends as well to increase the safety of the millions of people and the vast aggregate of property daily transported by these companies, and the public interest is directly subserved and promoted by every reasonable rule or device by which negligence in such business is lessened or prevented. The Ohio court, discussing a similar statute of that state, has said that the liability is not created for the benefit of the employees alone, but has its reason and foundation in public necessity and policy. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Spangler, 44 Ohio St. 471, 58 Am. Rep. 833, 8 N. E. 467. See also Kane v. Erie R. Co. 63 L.R.A. 788, 67 C. C. A. 653, 133 Fed. 681.

6. Assuming, then, that the statute is not to be avoided as class legislation, or as depriving railway corporations of the equal protection of the laws, let us inquire whether it is of such manifestly arbitrary and unreasonable character that it cannot be justified by reference to the police power? For several reasons we are constrained to answer this inquiry in the negative:

(1) It should be kept in view of all stages of this discussion that the enactment, the validity of which is denied by the appellee, is an attempt by the legislature to protect a right which Code, § 2071, in its original form, conferred upon railway employees; and we think it a rule, the soundness of which cannot be successfully denied, that where the legislature, acting within its constitutional power, provides a right or confers a benefit which did not before exist, it may, in its discretion, also provide that no contract by which that right or benefit may be waived, lost, or impaired shall be of any validity whatever. For instance, having given homestead rights to heads of families and exemptions to debtors in execution, no one at this day will question the power of the legislature to provide that any contract which in its judgment may serve to defeat or lessen the value of the right so created shall be void. The authorities upon this and kindred propositions are too numerous and familiar to require citation. Congress, having provided pensions and bounties for the benefit of persons performing military service, may make invalid any contract by which the soldier agrees to pay more than a certain fixed sum to his attorney for assistance rendered in establishing his right to the benefit thus created, and may even make it a crime for the attorney to demand or receive more than the statutory fee, even though he demands or receives no more than he has reasonably earned. Frisbie v. United States, 157 U. S. 160, 39 L. ed. 657, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 586. As we have already noted, the validity of the statute abolishing the fellow-servant rule in the interest of railway employees has been fully established in both state and Federal courts, and in our judgment the amendment of 1898 was a legitimate exercise of the inherent power of the legislature to protect the right which it had created. That the act is reasonably adapted to effect its ostensible purpose to prevent an improvident waiver or surrender by the employee of the right conferred upon him by the law can hardly be questioned. Without some limitation upon the right of contract, a law imposing liability upon the employer in favor of the employee would be of no practical benefit to the latter; for, in the absence of any restriction, the natural and certain recourse of the employer would be to make the waiver of such benefit a condition of every contract of employment. Possibly, even without a statute, such waiver would be held void on grounds of public policy, but that fact does not negative the propriety or validity of protective legislation.

It was in view of this situation that our lawmakers sought, both in the original act and in the amendment, to fence against the frustration of its purpose to confer a substantial benefit upon a large class of citizens engaged in a hazardous quasi public employment. That the appellee's relief department was devised to require or induce its employees to pool their contributions, and through the medium of an insurance or benefit fund, made up chiefly by deductions from their wages, pay their own losses, and thus in some degree relieve the corporation from the liability imposed by the statute, is not seriously disputed. Under the original statute this contract did not constitute a restriction upon the liability of the corporation, because, as held by us in the cases of Donald and Maine, the employee who became a member of the relief department retained the option to pursue his action for damages or accept the alternative relief afforded by the department. But the legislature might not unreasonably believe, and evidently did believe, that such contract, even if as a technical legal proposition it did not restrict the corporate liability, operated to lessen the value of the benefit conferred by the statute. Entertaining such view, the enactment of the amendment of 1898 was a natural and appropriate measure to prevent the indirect defeat of the benevolent purpose of the original statute. Our decisions upon the statute as at first enacted could have no effect to prevent further legislation upon the subject. So, too, it may well be said that if the legislature believed that, by reason of the relations between employer and employee, or by reason of the peculiar circumstances liable to surround the latter when called upon to exercise his option, the practical operation of the relief plan might be to relieve the company from its statutory liability without a corresponding adequate benefit to the employee, then an amendment specifically including the relief contract within the prohibition of the statute would not be an unreasonable stretch of legislative power. Nor is this legislative view of the necessity or propriety of the amendment wholly without foundation. The average railway employee is not a man of wealth. More often than otherwise his total possessions, if any, are represented by a modest home, and he depends upon his wages to meet his current living expenses. If he has a family, they, too, are dependent upon his earnings. If severely injured, the pain from his wounds, the anxiety for his dependent family, the pressure of his immediate needs, are not conducive to calm and businesslike reflection upon what may prove to be a matter of great importance to him and those who look to him for support. The immediate aid which the relief department offers may, under such circumstances, assume an exaggerated importance in his eyes, and in his weakness and distress lead him to accept a benefit inferior to that which he might otherwise be entitled to recover. Moreover, the legislature may well have believed that while membership in the relief department was entirely voluntary, in the legal sense of the word, it was still possible for the employer, by making the tenure of service more secure to those who became members, to bring to bear an influence in that direction savoring of moral coercion. That the possibility of this pressure upon the laborer is not entirely the creature of imagination finds support in appellee's argument, where all employees who refuse to enter the relief department are classified as belonging to the "thoughtless and improvident class" of persons whom railway companies try to avoid, and are the "first to go" whenever the service is to be cut down. Conceding that it is beyond the power of the state to take from the employer the right to discharge his employee, or from the employee the equal right to leave the service of his employer, with or without cause, subject, of course, to any legitimate claim for damages for violation of contract, it is none the less true that the state may still properly provide that no contract into which the employer invites his employee, under the express or implied threat that his refusal will mark him as the first to be discharged from employment, shall be of any avail as a defense to an action for the enforcement of a statutory liability created for his benefit.

(2) The relations between employer and employee are, and always have been, recognized as proper subjects of police regulation; but recent years, with the extraordinary changes wrought in industrial affairs, have given that phase of our law peculiar prominence. New social and economic conditions have demanded and received the attention of lawmakers and courts. Employer and employee do not stand in the same relative positions which they occupied before the various lines of industry became concentrated in comparatively few hands, and before workers were marshaled into such vast armies that employers must of necessity deal with them in masses rather than as individuals. These changes have not been accomplished without serious friction between wage payers and wage earners. Where the blame or responsibility rests is not for us to consider. The condition has existed and still exists, and neither legislature nor courts can with propriety ignore it. In every industry employing any considerable amount of labor the employees are organized for associated effort, seeking to maintain or increase labor's share of the wealth it assists in producing. Employers are likewise organized to check or offset the power and influence of associated labor. Strikes and lock-outs are by no means uncommon, and no year goes by when some one or more of these contests does not assume formidable proportions, disturbing the peace and good order of society, and inflicting injury of a most serious nature upon all lines of business. The tying up for a single day of a single railroad system is attended by grave inconvenience and loss to the public, while anything like a general suspension of traffic is productive of immediate and widespread calamity. So close and vital is the dependence of the public welfare upon harmony between labor and capital that the legislature may well exercise a liberal discretion in the enactment of measures to suppress and guard against every influence which tends to promote discontent or discord between them. This truth has already challenged general attention, and has found expression in the statutes and court decisions of every state of our Union. Among the legislative measures recognizing the propriety, if not the necessity, of laws for the protection and promotion of the interests of labor, we may mention those providing for the establishment of bureaus of labor, for preference to claims for labor in the settlement of insolvent estates, for laborer's liens, for employer's liability for personal injuries to employees, for the screening and weighing of coal as a basis of miner's wages, for compulsory payment of wages at frequent or regular intervals, limiting the hours of labor, allowing attorneys' fees in actions for the recovery of wages, forbidding the payment of wages in store orders or other paper not redeemable in money, and invalidating the assignment of wages before they are earned. These are but samples of the many which might be enumerated of laws already in existence in many of the states, and the volume and variety of such legislation is rapidly increasing. Some of these experiments may be crude and of doubtful expediency, and others may be marred by fatal defects; but the general movement of which they mark the progress is proof of the urgency of the demand for an adjustment of the law to meet new and unprecedented conditions. It is true that some of these measures have been invalidated in certain jurisdictions as unconstitutional, while in others they are sustained. Indeed, it is not strange that, in dealing with untried conditions, legislatures should have occasionally exceeded their constitutional power, nor is it strange if courts in their conservatism should sometimes have failed to give due consideration to the thought that radical changes in circumstances affecting the public welfare may justify the application of remedies which, under former conditions, would have been rightfully held arbitrary and unreasonable.

We cannot undertake to collate the conflicting precedence, or determine the mere numerical preponderance of the authorities. After a thorough examination of the cases, we are satisfied that the present current of authority tends to uphold all reasonable provisions for the protection of labor, and that Code, § 2071, is fairly within the scope of the powers of the state. We are not impressed with the suggestion, made by some courts which condemn such legislation, on the theory that it is an offensive imputation upon the manhood and independence of the laborer to thus assume that he needs the special guardianship and protection of the law. This easy method of argument would wipe out most of our statutes. Generally speaking all law is made to protect man against undue advantage at the hands of other men, and the chief justification for legislation upon matters of personal and property right is the fact that men do not and cannot always deal on equal footing. Under no circumstances is this inequality more frequent than in the relations between employer and employee under modern conditions. Indeed, in this inequality of advantage is found the only justification for any of the many labor laws to which we have referred. This condition, as affording sufficient basis for the exercise of police regulation, has often been recognized by the courts.

In Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, the Supreme Court of the United States, in sustaining a statute regulating the hours of labor in mines, and making it a penal offense to disregard its terms, says: "The legislature has recognized the fact, which the experience of legislators in many states has corroborated, that the proprietors of these establishments and their operatives do not stand upon an equality, and that their interests are to a certain extent conflicting. The former naturally desire to obtain as much labor as possible from their employees, while the latter are often induced by the fear of discharge to conform to regulations which their judgment, fairly exercised, would pronounce to be detrimental to their health or strength. In other words, the proprietors lay down the rules, and the laborers are practically constrained to obey them. In such cases self-interest is often an unsafe guide, and the legislature may properly interpose its authority. . . . But the fact that both parties are of full age and competent to contract does not necessarily deprive the state of the power to interfere, where the parties do not stand upon an equality, or where the public health demands that one party to the contract shall be protected against himself. 'The state still retains an interest in his welfare, however reckless he may be. The whole is no greater than the sum of all the parts, and when the individual health, safety, and welfare are sacrificed or neglected the state must suffer.'"

Sustaining the validity of an act requiring certain corporations to pay off their laborers in money and at specified short intervals, the supreme court of Rhode Island uses this language: "If it be said that, however rich and powerful corporations may be and however poor and weak their employees, the latter are not obliged to work for the former, and if they choose to work for corporations they can, but for chapter 918, make such agreements as they see fit and thus protect themselves, then it may be replied that poverty and weakness can wage but an unequal contest with corporate wealth and power, and that the legislature, in granting valuable corporate powers and privileges, might be willing to do it, or if already granted to continue them, if it has retained the power to amend such original grant, only on condition of minimizing the corporate power to drive hard bargains with their employees, who too often, in the sharp and bitter competition for work, have to submit to such terms and conditions as their employers see fit to prescribe." State v. Brown & S. Mfg. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The state of Tennessee has a statute by which employers of labor who issue store orders or scrip in payment for labor are required to redeem the same in money if demanded, any agreement or contract to the contrary notwithstanding. This provision was upheld by the supreme court of that state in an able and exhaustive opinion as within the proper limits of the police power. Among other reasons stated in support of this view, the court says: "The legislature evidently deemed the labor at some disadvantage under existing laws and customs, and by this act undertook to ameliorate his condition in some measure by enabling him, . . . at his election and at a proper time, to demand and receive his unpaid wages in money, rather than in something less valuable. Its tendency, though slight it may be, is to place the employer and employee upon equal ground in the matter of wages, and so far as calculated to accomplish that end it deserves commendation." Harbison v. Knoxville Iron Co. 103 Tenn. 421, 56 L.R.A. 316, 76 Am. St. Rep. 682, 53 S. W. 953. On appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States this judgment was affirmed. The opinion, written by Shiras, J., expressly quotes from and readopts the opinion of the Tennessee court as being "so full and satisfactory" as to make it unnecessary to again go over the ground. Knoxville Iron Co. v. Harbison, 183 U. S. 13, 46 L. ed. 55, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1.

Following the same line of thought, the supreme court of Vermont upholds a statute which in effect forbids a railway employee to contract for the assumption of risk of a hazardous appliance or unsafe place to work, saying: "If it be objected that the statute, when thus read, deprives the laborer of his right to make his own contracts, the answer is to be found in the principle that the state has the right to protect its poor and helpless, even to that extent if need be. . . . Such is the basis of the decisions that uphold the Utah labor law restricting the hours of mining work to eight [hours] per day, . . . statutes that forbid the employment of children in certain callings, the store order acts, and the long standing statutes against usury, in defense of one the last-named of which this court held, some twenty years ago, that even a release under seal given by the borrower at the time of the loan did not bar his right to recover the unlawful rate, declaring that 'the statute was intended for the protection of the weak against the strong, and public policy requires that it should not be evaded nor its force abated.' . . . Everybody knows that there are large classes who get their living from day to day in such service as that in which the plaintiff was engaged, who must work where they are working and keep their job at all hazards, if they would not bring themselves and their families to want. To say to such men, 'if you do not like the conditions, you may quit,' is often only a heartless mockery." Kilpatrick v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 74 Vt. 288, 93 Am. St. Rep. 887, 52 Atl. 531.

Mr. Freund, addressing himself to the objection that such statutory restrictions deprive the laborer himself of liberty of contract, says the "argument is fallacious in the case of wage contracts where the voluntary assumption of a burden by one may, through the stress of competition, force others to assume the same burden against their will." Freund, Pol. Power, §§ 500-503. See also Keating, J. in Archer v. James, 2 Best & S. 73; and Byles, J., in same case, page 82. In the very recent case of Lochner v. New York (decided by the Supreme Court of the United States) reported in 198 U. S. 45, 49 L. ed. 937, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 539, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1133, a statute prohibiting owners and proprietors of bakeries from requiring or permitting employees to labor more than ten hours per day, and making a violation of this provision punishable as a public offense, was by a majority decision held to be an unconstitutional interference with liberty of contract. The case is not parallel in fact or principle with the one at bar, but it is worthy of note that four of the nine members of that court unite in a vigorous dissent, holding that even such drastic legislation is clearly within the police power of the state.

In recognizing the soundness of the views expressed by the cited authorities, we do not say, nor is it necessary to believe, that the employer is actuated by a wanton or oppressive spirit. It is enough to say that he is human, and as such is therefore only humanly and naturally inclined to exact a profitable bargain if the opportunity offers, just as the laborer himself is ready to take advantage of favoring circumstances to exact the highest wage. But the opportunities are not equal. The employer, as a rule, has some store of capital to stand between him and immediate want if business grows slack or suspends, while the average laborer has little or no reserve for the proverbial "rainy day," and sooner or later must accept the terms which are offered him. It is with this condition in view that the legislature has enacted the statute under consideration, for the purpose of preserving as near as possible that equality of advantage to both parties which 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) is essential to the general good, and, as is well said in the Harbison Case, supra, "this alone commends the act as a valid police regulation." To same effect see Hancock v. Yaden, 121 Ind. 366, 6 L.R.A. 576, 16 Am. St. Rep. 396, 23 N. E. 253.

(3) The right of the state to regulate liberty of contract is peculiarly applicable to corporations. That corporations are entitled to the equal protection of the laws has already been shown, but this does not mean that corporations and natural persons stand in the same relation to the power which inheres in the state to regulate their conduct or methods of business. The distinction between them is fundamental and ineradicable. The natural person has certain inalienable rights, for which he is not indebted to organized society. He is born to them. The Constitution and laws recognize them and provide safeguards for them, but do not create them. The corporate person has no rights except those with which it is endowed by the law-making power, and the power of creation necessarily implies the power of regulation. See New York & N. E. R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 556, 38 L. ed. 269, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 437; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, 173 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 746, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Sioux City, 78 Iowa, 746, 39 N. W. 498. It is true that in some of the foregoing cases special prominence is given to an express reservation of power in the state to amend or repeal corporate charters, a rule the applicability of which to the present controversy we need not consider; but the Supreme Court of the United States, which upheld that contention in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, supra, advances another step in the later case of Knoxville Iron Co. v. Harbison, supra, and announces the rule that irrespective of the right of charter amendment the state is vested with power to enact such legislation. It says: "It is true that stress was laid in the opinion in that case [St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, 173 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 746, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419] on the fact that, in the Constitution of the state, the power to amend corporation charters was reserved to the state, and it is asserted that no such power exists in the present case. But it is also true that, inasmuch as the right to contract is not absolute in respect to every matter, but may be subjected to the restraints demanded by the safety and welfare of the state and its inhabitants, the police power of the state may, within defined limitations, extend over corporations outside of and regardless of the power to amend charters." Citing Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. ed. 909, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609.

The same question was broached in the first case carried to the Supreme Court of the United States to test the validity of a statute abolishing the fellow-servant rule in actions against railway companies. To the objection that the statute was in violation of the 14th Amendment, Field, J., speaking for the court, replies: "The plain answer to this contention is that the liability imposed by the law of 1874 arises only for injuries subsequently committed. It has no application to past injuries, and it cannot be successfully contended that the state may not prescribe the liabilities under which corporations created by the laws shall conduct their business in the future, where no limitation is placed upon its power in this respect by their charters. Legislation to this effect is found in the statute books of every state." Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 208, 32 L. ed. 108, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161; Virginia Development Co. v. Crozer Iron Co. 90 Va. 126, 44 Am. St. Rep. 893, 17 S. E. 806.

(4) Nor does the fact that the corporation is the creature of another state afford it any advantage in this respect. Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 648, 39 L. ed. 297, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 610, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207; Orient Ins. Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 43 L. ed. 552, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281; Dayton Coal & I. Co. v. Barton, 183 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

U. S. 23, 46 L. ed. 61, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 5. In the Daggs Case the court, sustaining the validity of a statute requiring insurance companies to pay the full sum insured in case of loss, any condition or stipulation of the contract to the contrary notwithstanding, says: "That which a state may do with corporations of its own creation, it may do with foreign corporations admitted into the state. . . . The power of a state to impose conditions upon foreign corporations is certainly as extensive as the power over domestic corporations." Subject alone to the condition that the regulation imposed does not operate upon interstate commerce, or otherwise violate the provisions of the Federal Constitution, the power of the state to prescribe the terms on which foreign corporations may do business within its jurisdiction is unlimited. The fact that the corporation is engaged in interstate commerce does not exempt it from control by the state in respect to all business done therein not directly connected with traffic between the states. For instance, the local statutes pertaining to the duty to fence railway tracks, imposing liability for live stock killed by moving trains or for damages by fire set out by engines, regulating speed of trains within city or yard limits, abolishing the fellow-servant rule, requiring the redemption of unused tickets, and regulating contracts of employment, are no less applicable to foreign corporations engaged in interstate commerce, than to domestic corporations doing only a local business. Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 32 L. ed. 352, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 238, 9 Sup. Ct. (5) Considered from the standpoint of precedent alone, we think the weight of the better reasoned cases supports the conclusion at which we have arrived. Such is the manifest force and effect of most of the cases already cited. The following additional precedents, selected from the many found among the decisions of recent date, indicate something of the extent to which the power to regulate and restrict the right of contract, and more especially between employer and employee has been upheld. In citing them, it is proper to suggest that the decision of the question before us does not require us to adopt all the conclusions reached in these cases, or all of the reasoning on which they are based. They are in point, however, as illustrating the trend of judicial thought, and the gradually extending application of the police power in the interest of the general welfare.

In Maryland a statute requiring operators of coal mines to pay the wages of employees in money and at stated intervals, and restricting the right of operators to contract for payment of such wages in merchandise, has been upheld. Shaffer v. Union Min. Co. 55 Md. 74, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 59. A similar statute in Indiana has been held valid. Hancock v. Yaden, 121 Ind. 366, 6 L.R.A. 576, 16 Am. St. Rep. 396, 23 N. E. 253. The same court, in a very recent case, sustains the validity of a statute which prohibits the assignment of claims for wages not yet earned. International Text-Book Co. v. Weissinger, 160 Ind. 349, 65 L.R.A. 599, 98 Am. St. Rep. 334, 65 N. E. 521. A statute of the United States making it unlawful to pay any seaman wages in advance, or to pay such wages to any other person on a seaman's account, and providing that such payment in advance shall not absolve the employer from full payment after the wages have been earned, is held not to invade any right guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. Patterson v. The Eudora, 190 U. S. 169, 47 L. ed. 1002, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 821. The court, by Brewer, J., there says: "While it may be conceded that, generally speaking, among the inalienable rights of the citizen is that of the liberty of contract, yet such liberty is not absolute and universal. It is within the undoubted power of government to restrain some individuals from all contracts, as well as all individuals from some contracts. It may deny to all the right to contract for the purchase of lottery tickets, to the minor the right to assume any obligations except for the necessities of existence, to the common carrier the power to make any contract releasing himself from negligence, and, indeed, may restrain all engaged in any employment from any contract in the course of that employment which is against public policy. The possession of this power by government in no manner conflicts with the proposition that, generally speaking, every citizen has a right freely to contract for the price of his labor, services, or property."

Statutes have been sustained which invalidate contracts to waive homestead and exemption laws. Curtis v. O'Brien, 20 Iowa, 376, 89 Am. Dec. 543; Kneettle v. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Newcomb, 22 N. Y. 249, 78 Am. Dec. 186; Maloney v. Newton, 85 Ind. 565, 44 Am. Rep. 46. A debtor cannot waive stay of execution by contract. McLane v. Elmer, 4 Ind. 239. Parties may be required to insert the words "given for a patent" in promissory notes given upon such consideration. New v. Walker, 108 Ind. 365, 58 Am. Rep. 40, 9 N. E. 386; Herdie v. Roessler, 109 N. Y. 127, 16 N. E. 198. Parties may be prohibited from contracting to pay attorneys' fees for the collection of a claim against them. Churchman v. Martin, 54 Ind. 380. In Vermont it has been held that a statute which forbids a railway employee to contract to assume the risk of a hazardous appliance or unsafe place to work is not unconstitutional. Kilpatrick v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 74 Vt. 288, 93 Am. St. Rep. 887, 52 Atl. 531. Stafford, J., speaking for the court, says: "If the doctrine of assumption of risk is to be regarded as contractual, then we hold that the statutory protection cannot be bought and sold, but that the policy of the law forbids it in the interest of public welfare. . . . The legislature understood this, and the act we are considering was an attempt to better the condition of that very class by compelling the employer to yield something of profit in the interest of humanity, and to save the lives and limbs of his workmen by adopting safer instruments of labor. It seems to us that a court should be very slow to construe the beneficial purpose out of such a law or to make it of no effect. On broad lines of public good and social progress it is plain that such legislation must be largely looked to if government is to remain firm and secure in the respect and affection of the people."

Massachusetts having already a statute requiring certain corporations to pay their employees in money in weekly instalments, its legislature submitted to the supreme court of that state the question whether such provision could be constitutionally extended to private persons and partnerships. To this inquiry the court responded, and, after citing approvingly many of the cases we have already mentioned and the many statutes regulating and restricting liberty of contract, announced the conclusion that such legislation is not a violation of any constitutional guaranty. Re House Bill No. 1230, 163 Mass. 589, 28 L.R.A. 344, 40 N. E. 713. A provision prohibiting all sales of corporate stocks to be delivered in the future is not a violation of the 14th Amendment, although its prohibition includes bona fide as well as gambling transactions. Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606, 47 L. ed. 323, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 168. In support of this holding it is said: "Even if the provision before us should seem to us not to have been justified by the circumstances locally existing in California at the time when it was passed, it is shown by its adoption to have expressed a deep-seated conviction on the part of the people concerned as to what that policy required. Such a deep-seated conviction is entitled to great respect. If the state thinks that an admitted evil cannot be prevented, except by prohibiting a calling or transaction not in itself necessarily objectionable, the courts cannot interfere unless in looking at the substance of the matter, they can see that it 'is a clear, unmistakable infringement of rights secured by the fundamental law.'"

From a general review of the authorities, Mr. Freund says (Police Power, §§ 502, 503): "The general principle of police regulation of the liberty of contract may perhaps be formulated as follows: Where a contractual relation is voluntarily entered into, rights and obligations which are conformable to the nature of the relation may be defined by the law and made conclusive upon the parties, irrespective of stipulations attempting to set them aside, especially where such stipulations involve the waiver of valuable personal rights, or where they are virtually imposed by one party without power of choice on the part of the other." The case of State v. Peel Splint Coal Co. 36 W. Va. 802, 17 L.R.A. 385, 15 S. E. 1000, affirms the validity of a statute prescribing the manner of weighing coal in determining the amount of a miner's earnings, and forbidding payment in script or store orders. It is true that this affirmance was by a divided court, but the opinion is so well argued and so well supported by reason and authority that no one desiring to master the learning of the law on this subject should fail to examine it. Moreover, the principle there upheld, having since been fully settled as authoritative by the Supreme Court of the United States in Knoxville Iron Co. v. Harbison, 183 U. S. 13, 46 L. ed. 55, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1, the opinion is entitled to rank as authority, notwithstanding the division of the court by which it was pronounced.

As a fitting conclusion to this examination of authorities, we quote from the opinion in Atkin v. Kansas, 191 U. S. 207, 48 L. ed. 148, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124, sustaining an act making it unlawful for any contractor engaged upon a work of public improvement to require or permit an employee to work more than eight hours per day: "If it be said that a statute like the one before us is mischievous in its tendencies, the answer is that the responsibility therefor rests upon legislators, not upon the courts. No evils arising from such legislation could be more far-reaching than those that might come to our system of government if the judiciary, abandoning the sphere assigned to it by the fundamental law, should enter the domain of legislation, and upon grounds merely of justice or reason or wisdom annul statutes that had received the sanction of the people's representatives." As bearing generally upon the extent to which the police power may restrict the liberty of contract, see Re Scrip Bill, 23 Colo. 504, 48 Pac. 512; *White v. Whether the appellee's relief department is in the nature of a scheme for insurance, and therefore peculiarly subject to supervision and regulation by the state, has been suggested, but not argued, by counsel. In the Donald and Maine Cases we held that said department was not an "insurance company" within the meaning of our laws governing such corporations, and expressly refrained from any further expression of opinion. That an organization may do an insurance business without being an "insurance company" within the meaning of the statute is settled, as is also the further proposition that it is the nature of the business rather than the form of the organization by which it is carried on, which justifies the state in exercising supervision over it. Martin v. Stubbings, 126 Ill. 387, 9 Am. St. Rep. 620, 18 N. E. 657; Burlington Voluntary Relief Dept. v. White, 41 Neb. 547, 43 Am. St. Rep. 701, 59 N. W. 747; Grimes v. Northwestern Legion of Honor, 97 Iowa, 315, 64 N. W. 806, 66 N. W. 183; State ex rel. Graham v. Miller, 66 Iowa, 26, 23 N. W. 241. But whether the relief department is of that character we do not now undertake to say.

We are aware that the courts are not in entire unison as to the extent to which the police power of the state may properly be exercised, and that cases are quite numerous which lend color, if not support, to views advanced by the appellee herein. The lack of harmony is in some instances more apparent than real. For instance, the cases from Pennsylvania have been decided under a state Constitution differing very widely from our own. See Pa. Const. 1874, art. 3, § 7. With a single exception, none of the cases in which courts have sustained the validity of relief-department contracts has involved the question whether such contracts may be regulated or prohibited by statute. They have simply considered the general proposition whether, in the absence of statute, the contract should be held void on grounds of public policy, and upon that question they coincide with the views of this court in Donald v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 284, 33 L.R.A. 492, 61 N. W. 971, and Maine v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 260, 70 N. W. 630, 80 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

N. W. 315. The exception to which we have referred is Shaver v. Pennsylvania Co. (C. C.) 71 Fed. 931, where a trial court held a statute of Ohio to be unconstitutional. The statute there considered differs in material respects from our own, and we may further say that, if the argument employed by the court in support of its conclusion is to be construed as announcing the doctrine in support of which it is here cited by counsel, we think it is not to be approved. Moreover, the Shaver Case is in effect overruled, or at least discredited, by Peires v. Van Dusen, 69 L.R.A. 705, 24 C. C. A. 280, 47 U. S. App. 339, 78 Fed. 693. But we freely concede that, after eliminating all merely apparent conflict in the cases, not a few others remain which no amount of ingenuity can reconcile, and only confusion could result from the attempt. This court has not before been called upon to consider the central question in the form now presented, and, while recognizing the divergence in the authorities, we feel at liberty to follow the precedents which appear to us most persuasive and authoritative, and uphold that which appeals to our judgments as the sounder doctrine.

It is urged upon our attention that the relief fund contract is not unfair in its terms, and that the practical working of the plan is beneficial to the employees. All this may be true, but it is a consideration to be addressed to the legislature, and not to the court. The contract is not assailed because of its oppressive character, but because the statute forbids its use as a defense in an action to enforce a statutory liability. Nor need we dispute the proposition that a plan of economical insurance against sickness, injury, and death is much to be commended, and we can readily conceive that members of the relief department may find it a valuable resource under many circumstances. We may also admit that, in the absence of a statute forbidding it, the company is not to be censured for making any legal contract which it is able to negotiate with its employees to protect itself from liability for damages. But none of these are controlling considerations. The legislature does not in this act forbid or place any obstacle in the way of such insurance, nor does it forbid or prevent any settlement of the matter of damages with an injured employee fairly made after the injury is received. On the contrary, the right to make such settlement is expressly provided for in the amendment to Code, § 2071. The one thing which that amendment was intended to prevent was the use of this insurance, or relief, for which the employee has himself paid, in whole or in part, as a bar to the right which the statute has given him to recover damages from the corporation. And this, as we have already said, is clearly within the legislative discretion. Nor does it work any hardship to the railway company. The hardship, if any exists, is in the creation of the liability (the validity of which legislation is now beyond question), and not in the statute which prevents its circumvention.

We do not attempt the review of any of the foregoing questions with special reference to our state Constitution. The provisions relied upon by counsel are those which announce the right of all persons to acquire, possess, and protect property, and require all laws of a general character to have uniform operation. Iowa Const. art. 1, §§ 1, 6. The rules there expressed do not differ materially in effect from those embodied in the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Certainly they place no narrower restriction upon the legislative power. The discussion already had embraces all which need be said upon this branch of the case, and we hold that the objection to the statute, as being in contravention of our state Constitution, must be overruled.

The dissent from this conclusion, prepared by Ladd, J., and filed herewith, rests in its final analysis upon two propositions: First, that although it would have been within the constitutional powers of the legislature, in originally enacting Code, § 2071, to have protected the right thereby created by a provision such as is contained in the amendatory act of the twenty-seventh general assembly, yet, the right having been in fact created without it, the subsequent addition of such protection is an unconstitutional discrimination against the railway company; and, second, that the classification by which railway companies alone are made subject to such statutory restrictions is arbitrary and unreasonable, and is therefore unconstitutional and void.

The first of these propositions, that a provision which could have been constitutionally embodied in the original act cannot be constitutionally added by amendment, is one for which we can find neither authority nor precedent, and is in our judgment indefensible in principle. Indeed, it would seem that the very statement of the doctrine is its own sufficient refutation. To adopt such a rule is to say that, by the creation of any statutory right or liability, the state exhausts its constitutional power to legislate upon the subject, save perhaps to repeal the statute. Most assuredly this cannot be correct. If one general assembly may create a homestead or exemption right, and protect it by a provision that no waiver of such right shall be of any validity unless expressed in a given manner and form, or may provide a lien to secure to certain classes of labor the payment of their wages, or may abolish the general rule as to contributory negligence in actions against railway companies for damages by fire, or may abolish the rule as to assumption of risk by railway employees injured because of the company's neglect to equip its cars with automatic couplers and brakes, or may enact any of hundreds of rights and liabilities such as are to be found upon nearly every page of our statute books, may not the next general assembly amend each and every one of these acts to remedy defects which experience has developed in them, or to increase their efficiency, or to prevent the destruction of a right or the avoidance of a liability so created? For instance, Code, § 2083, provides that an employee who may be injured by the running of a car or engine without automatic brakes and couplers as provided by law shall not be considered as waiving his right to recover damages by continuing in the employ of the corporation. This provision was first enacted by the twenty-third general assembly. Let us suppose that a subsequent general assembly had amended said section by a further provision that the plaintiff in such case should not be required to negate contributory negligence on his part, would we hesitate for an instant to hold such an amendment was clearly a constitutional exercise of legislative power? In the very nature of governmental and legislative power, the authority to create a statutory liability or right of action implies, of necessity, the right of amendment. The only conceivable exception to this rule is a case where the original statute is in the nature of a grant or contract, within the rule of the Dartmouth College Case. That famous precedent has been made a house of refuge for many theories, but its shelter has never been held broad enough to cover a case like this. The legislature has seen fit to impose a peculiar liability upon railway companies in favor of a particular class of employees whose service exposes them to peculiar dangers. That it is not an unconstitutional discrimination has time and again been declared by our courts of last resort. If this be so, by what specious method of reasoning shall we justify ourselves in holding that this constitutional power may not be exercised in amendment, as well as in original legislation? It violates no contract right. It disturbs no vested right. There is no pretense that the contract pleaded in the appellee's answer was entered into before the amendment was enacted. Says the supreme court of Wisconsin: "No principle of law is better settled than that 'whatever is given by statute may be taken away by statute,' except vested rights acquired under it, and except, also, that the statute must not be in the nature of a contract on the part of the legislature." State ex rel. Voight v. Hoeflinger, 31 Wis. 263.

If the power to abolish or to take away a statutory right is an essential attribute of the legislative authority, is not the power to modify or amend equally broad and equally clear? Under the reserve power of the state to regulate and control corporations and to amend charters, it has often been held that whatever regulation or restriction might lawfully have been included in the original charter may be imposed by subsequent legislation. Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 25 L. ed. 496; Sioux City Street R. Co. v. Sioux City, 78 Iowa, 746, 39 N. W. 498; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Williams, 103 Ky. 378, 45 S. W. 229; Stanislaus County v. San Joaquin & K. River Canal & Irrig. Co. 192 U. S. 212, 48 L. ed. 412, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 241. For still stronger reasons must we hold that, as respects a statute which contains no grant of franchise or other element of contract, and on which no claim of vested rights can be grounded, the power of amendment is no less broad and universal than is the power to create and repeal. When, therefore, the appellee herein employed the appellant, and at the same or subsequent time procured his agreement to the benefit scheme, this law was in existence in its present form, and by an elementary rule of construction the contract must be read as if the terms of the statute were embodied in it. While its right to go into the labor market and hire servants upon terms of equal advantage with other railway corporations was a property right of which the company could not be lawfully deprived, it had no legal right to exact terms which the law forbade to all such employers, and, having exacted them, it must be held to have done so with knowledge that the courts would not enforce them for its benefit. It was its privilege, perhaps, to speculate upon the possibility of securing a ruling invalidating the statute, or upon the reluctance of its employees to insist upon their rights under the statute, and thereby to a greater or less extent get the benefit of its practical nullification; but it is in no position to complain if, when the test is applied, it is held to the full measure of liability which the lawmaking power has rightfully imposed upon it.

Concerning the second proposition, that the amendment to Code, § 2071, makes an unreasonable discrimination against railway companies as employers, as well as between different classes of employees, it is to be said that this is neither more nor less than a revival of the objection which has been raised against every legislative measure which has ever been enacted for the benefit or relief of any special class of employees, and in practically every instance has been overruled by the courts of last resort. To hold with appellant on this proposition is to attempt to reverse the entire current of the decisions of our own court, of courts of sister states, and of the Supreme Court of the United States. Kane v. Erie R. Co. 68 L.R.A. 790, 67 C. C. A. 653, 133 Fed. 681; Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 31 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771, 16 N. W. 413; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Herrick, 127 U. S. 210, 32 L. ed. 109, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1176; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161; *Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Rep. 821; Hancock v. Yaden, 121 Ind. 366, 6 L.R.A. 576, 16 Am. St. Rep. 396, 23 N. E. 253; Shaffer v. Union Min. Co. 55 Md. 74, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 59; Tullis v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 175 U. S. 348, 44 L. ed. 192, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136; Peirce v. Van Dusen, 69 L.R.A. 705, 24 C. C. A. 280, 47 U. S. App. 339, 78 Fed. 693, and numerous other cases hereinbefore cited. In the Peirce Case, supra, Mr. Justice Harlan says that, as the statute applies to all railroads operating in the state, it is general in its nature within the meaning of the Constitution, and as it applies alike to all of a given class of employees it operates uniformly, and is therefore not unconstitutional. This language affords a complete answer to the second ground of the dissent herein.

The assertion that the amendment to Code, § 2071, "does not purport to deal with the company's liability at all," and that "the contract contemplated has no bearing on the liability of the railroad company to its employee," is irreconcilable with the clear and express language of the statute. The amended section provides in so many words that under certain circumstances the company shall be liable in damages to its employee, and that in such case no contract of insurance, relief, benefit, or indemnity, nor the acceptance of such insurance, relief, benefit, or indemnity shall be available to the company as a defense to an action by the employee for the recovery of such damages. How can it be said that this provision, which eliminates a defense which might otherwise be successfully asserted, has "no bearing" on the company's liability? Does not such a provision, which means all the difference between a right of recovery and no right of recovery, "purport to deal with the company's liability?" If, then, as has been settled beyond all controversy, the power exists in the state to create rights and liabilities for the benefit of employees engaged in the use and operation of railways, which are not given to other classes of employees, it is not for this court to say that the legislature may not properly and constitutionally make special provisions by which those rights may be preserved and those liabilities made effective. It is entirely too late in the day to insist that special legislation affecting the rights and liabilities of railway companies or other distinct class or kind of corporations constitutes a denial of the equal protection of the laws, simply because the same regulation or restriction is not extended over other corporations or other kinds of business. *St. Louis & S. The demurrer to the appellee's answer should have been sustained. The ruling and judgment of the District Court are reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Ladd, J., dissenting:

I cannot yield my assent to the conclusion reached by the majority. I am of the opinion that the amendment to § 2071 of the Code, enacted by the twenty-seventh general assembly, is in plain and palpable violation of those portions of the Federal and state Constitutions prohibiting class legislation, and will in as brief a way as practicable state my reasons for so thinking. The general rules applicable to the case are correctly stated in the opinion of the majority, and need not be repeated. The difficulty arises in their application. The section before amendment read: "Every corporation operating a railway shall be liable for all damages sustained by any person, including employees of such corporation, in consequence of the neglect of the agents, or by any mismanagement of the engineers or other employees thereof, and in consequence of the wilful wrongs, whether of commission or omission, of such agents, engineers, or other employees, when such wrongs are in any manner connected with the use and operation of any railway on or about which they shall be employed, and no contract which restricts such liability shall be legal or binding." This statute merely does away with the common-law rule that the master is not responsible for the negligence of a fellow servant engaged in the use and operation of a railroad, which results in damage to another employee injured, when his employment exposed him to the hazards of such use and operation. A cause of action is created in favor of a class of employees whose work exposes them to the perils peculiar to railroading. The legislation is not in the interest and for the protection of all railroad employees, but for one class of them, a mere fraction of the entire body. This was noted in Deppe v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Iowa, 52, where, in order to uphold the constitutionality of the law as it then stood, when assailed as class legislation, the court limited the employees to those operating a railway, saying: "The manifest purpose of the statute was to give its benefits to employees engaged in the hazardous business of operating railroads. When thus limited, it is constitutional; when extended further, it becomes unconstitutional." The soundness of this decision was questioned in Malone v. Burlington, C. P. & N. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 328, 47 Am. Rep. 813, 16 N. W. 203, but it was approved in the same case, reported in 65 Iowa, 422, 54 Am. Rep. 11, 21 N. W. 756, wherein it is said: "To meet the objection that the act of 1862 created a rule of liability which was applicable to railroad companies alone, and did not affect other employees under precisely the same circumstances, and that it was therefore class legislation, and in violation of the state Constitution, the court in Deppe's Case construed the act as creating a remedy only in favor of that class of employees who were engaged in the hazardous business of operating railroads, and the correctness of the holding of that case on that question is not doubted." See also Connors v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 111 Iowa, 387, 82 N. W. 953.

The same thought was expressed by the supreme court of Minnesota in Johnson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 43 Minn. 222, 8 L.R.A. 419, 45 N. W. 156, where, speaking through Mr. Justice Mitchell, in referring to a previous case, declaring that a similar statute in that state must be construed as designed exclusively for the benefits of those who would, in the course of their employment, be exposed to the peculiar hazards incident to the use and operation of railroads, it said: "If a distinction is to be made as to the liability of employers to their employees, it must be based upon a difference in the nature of the employment, and not of the employers. One rule of liability cannot be established for railway companies merely as such, and another rule for other employers under like circumstances and conditions. . . . Neither would it relieve the act from the imputation of class legislation that it applies alike to all railroads. It has been sometimes loosely stated that special legislation is not class, 'if all persons brought under its influence are-treated alike under the same conditions.' But this is only half the truth. Not only must it treat alike, under the same conditions, all who are 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) brought 'within its influence,' but in its classification it must bring within its influence all who are under the same conditions. Therefore, if a distinction is to be made between railway corporations and other employers as respects their liability to their employees, it must be based upon some difference in the nature of the employment, and can only extend to cases where such difference exists." In passing on a like statute in Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Pontius, 157 U. S. 209, 39 L. ed. 675, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585, the Supreme Court of the United States based its approval of the decision of the supreme court of Kansas in the same case, reported in 52 Kan. 264, 34 Pac. 739, on the same ground, saying: "The hazardous character of the business of operating a railroad seemed to call for special legislation with respect to railroad corporations having for its object the protection of their employees as well as the safety of the public."

As the fellow-servant law applies only to a certain well-defined class of railroad employees, and excludes all others, the majority are certainly mistaken in suggesting that the mere fact that the employer must be a railway company is controlling in the matter of classification. The reason for sustaining the original section, as seen, was the hazardous employment of those for whose protection it was enacted. It operated upon all who might be injured while engaged in an occupation of peculiar peril. A right of action is given when, but for the statute, none would have existed. All other employees of the railroad companies are excluded from its operation. The difference in their situation was thought to be such as to warrant separate legislation applicable to one class, and not to the other. In creating this new liability the legislature guarded against its impairment by adding that "no contract which restricts such liability shall be legal or binding." This law stood on the statute book without any material change for thirty-six years. In the meantime causes of action created thereby were shielded by no protective legislation other than that accorded those arising otherwise or possessed by the class of railroad employees not exposed to the peculiar perils incident to the use and operation of railroads. Was there anything in the nature of this statutory right of action, or the class of persons to whom it was made available, which so differentiated it from other rights of action or from other classes of employees, that separate and distinct legislation might be demanded for the protection of it or the class for whom it was created? Certainly the origin of the right can furnish no sound reason for its separate classification. A cause of action is no more nor less sacred when created by statute than it would be had it existed at common law; and in order that legislation with respect thereto not applicable to other causes of action may be sustained, there must be some ground for such discrimination. It is not enough that the amendment might have been permissible in the enactment of the original statute a third of a century ago. The conditions which will justify the separation of subjects into different classes for the purpose of legislation must have relation to the time when it is enacted. Otherwise the constitutional inhibition of class legislation may be defeated by a classification based solely on past events having no connection with the needs of the hour or the demands of the present generation. In State v. Garbroski, 111 Iowa, 496, 56 L.R.A. 570, 82 Am. St. Rep. 524, 82 N. W. 959, the classification was condemned because it rested "on a past and completed transaction having no relation to the particular legislation enacted. All citizens are divided," said the court, "into two classes—those who served in the Army and Navy thirty-five years ago, and all those who did not. . . . In present conditions and circumstances, there are no differences between them in their relation to society and the administration of the law, and other citizens of the state. . . . Equality in right, privilege, burdens and protection is the thought running through the Constitution and laws of the state; and an act intentionally and necessarily creating inequality therein, based on no reason suggested by necessity or difference in condition or circumstances, is opposed to the spirit of free government and expressly prohibited by the Constitution."

If there is some present difference between causes of action which arise by virtue of the statute enacted thirty-six years before any protection was attempted, and those arising in favor of other employees of a railroad company by virtue of those natural principles of justice which have been recognized for so long a time that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, or if there is anything in the genesis of either, or if there are such distinctions between the classes of employees entitled thereto respectively, these have not been pointed out, and I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, they cannot be. True, a statute may be amended, and when this has been done it will be read with the amendment, and both construed prospectively as though they had been enacted at the same time. This, however, is merely a rule of construction. Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 297. But this in no way obvi-ates the fact that the amendment may constitute distinct and independent legislation, to be construed in connection with the original only from the time of its adoption. Ely v. Holton, 15 N. Y. 595. Its validity must be determined as of the time of its enactment and in the light of circumstances and conditions then existing, or, if not existing then having relation to the present and to the particular legislation.

Let us examine this amendment, remembering that it is applicable to but the one class of employees. For convenience it may be set out: "Nor shall any contract of insurance, relief, benefit, or indemnity in case of injury or death, entered into prior to the injury, between the person so injured and such corporation, or any other person or association acting for such corporation, nor shall the acceptance of any such insurance, relief, benefit, or indemnity by the person injured, his widow, heirs, or legal representatives after the injury, from such corporation, person or association, constitute any bar or defense to any cause of action brought under the provisions of this section; but nothing contained herein shall be construed to prevent or invalidate any settlement for damages between the parties subsequent to injuries received." If this can be said to restrict in any way the liability of the company, it adds nothing to the original statute, for it declared any such contract invalid. But it purports to deal, not with the company's liability, but with its enforcement. It relates, first, to an independent and different subject, namely, to contracts of "insurance, relief, benefit, or indemnity," invalidating them as to both parties; and, second, to the remedy in declaring that acceptance of the above shall not operate as a bar or defense to an action for an injury suffered. The contract contemplated does not affect the liability of the railroad company. Its only relation to the original act is the fact that both concern the same class of employees. Nor does the portion with respect to the acceptance of benefits in any way restrict the liability of the company. Donald v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 284, 33 L.R.A. 492, 61 N. W. 971. Its only relation to the statute as it stood is that it protects the cause of action thereby created from waiver involved in the election of remedies. That such election as between any insurance, relief, benefit or indemnity that may be stipulated, and recovery of damages against the railroad company, is essential to avoid restricting its liability in violation of the original act, was pointed out in Donald's Case. The requirement of an election between remedies is not restrictive of the right to either, and the only effect of the second portion of the amendment is to declare that an election to take insurance, relief, benefits, or indemnity will not estop the injured party from availing himself of the other remedy; that is, prosecuting his cause of action against the company. In other words, this amendment has no connection with the original act, further than that it concerns the same class of employees, and declares that a certain election of remedies shall not constitute an estoppel of the cause of action therein created.

I shall not stop to discuss whether these are so germane to the subject of the section of the Code before being amended as that the title to the amendment was sufficient. It is enough for present purposes that the amendment does not limit in any way, nor add to the duties imposed or liabilities created by that section. It merely accepts the classification of that statute as the basis of legislation upon different subject-matter, namely, contracts with reference to insurance, etc., and the effect of accepting thereunder as constituting an estoppel. Surely these are not so connected with the object and purpose of the original act that the amendment can be upheld because based on the classification there recognized. The subjects covered by the amendment are just as important to railroad employees not exposed to the peculiar hazards of operating trains, and precisely as applicable to their situation and condition. Why invalidate insurance or relief contracts of the former, and enforce those of the latter? Why give effect to the acceptance of benefits by the latter as an estoppel against the prosecution of a cause of action against the employer, and not do so when the acceptance is by the former? If there is "some apparent natural reason, some reason suggested by necessity, by such a difference in the situation and circumstances of the subjects placed in different classes as suggests the necessity or propriety of different legislation with respect to them," it has not been mentioned in the opinion of the majority. The fundamental defect in the amendment is that it does not bring "within its influence all who are under the same conditions." The conditions under which the injuries are received can have no bearing on the question as to whether one shall be bound by a waiver of his right to maintain his cause of action by reason of some contract of insurance, relief, benefit, or indemnity, and another shall not. Both stand in the same relation to the company. Notwithstanding, this amendment declares with respect to the employee within the fellow-servant act, that receiving benefits of such a contract shall not be a bar to the maintenance of an action against the company, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

while receiving the benefits by a servant within the terms of that act may be a bar to any further recovery. There is no ground for thus discriminating between the employees of the same corporation, and such classification is arbitrary and unreasonable.

The facts of this case will very well illustrate the inequality of the law. The benefits of the defendant's relief department are not restricted to any class of employees. All may become members. Nor are these limited to injuries for which the company might be liable. All manner of injury, as well as sickness, is included. "In case of injury to a member, he may elect to accept the benefits in pursuance of these regulations, or to prosecute such claims as he may have at law against the company or any company associated therewith in the administration of their relief departments." But acceptance of the benefits is made a bar to the maintenance of an action against the company, as is also the maintenance of such action a bar to any claim for relief. That is, a member must elect whether he will take the benefits stipulated by the regulations of the department, or rely on redress in the courts for his injuries. The plaintiff, though he had contributed but 85 cents to the relief fund, and had expressly agreed to all the conditions, and accepted benefits to the amount of $492 and $330 paid to his physicians, and then in disregard of said conditions instituted this action. As he had been exposed to the peculiar hazards of railroading, taking this money did not bar his right to recover from the defendant, if the amendment to the statute is valid. Had he suffered like injury while engaged in some of the other employments of the company, the amendment would not apply, and under the decision in Donald v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 284, 33 L.R.A. 492, 61 N. W. 971, election to take the benefits of the relief department would have been final, and he could not maintain the action. Is this equality before the law? The difference in the employments could by no possibility furnish ground for a distinction. What difference can there be, when it comes to the matter of settlement of claims between one of the trainmen and the company, growing out of the alleged negligence of a coemployee in the train service, and the claim of a shopman, growing out of the negligence of the master or vice principal in that department? None whatever, for the manner of the injury has no relation to the subjects touched by the amendment. Nor is there any very satisfactory reason for making such a law applicable to railroad companies, and not to manufacturing and other corporations within the state. It would not seem that there is anything peculiar about railroad companies which should deprive them or their employees of the advantage of contracts of insurance, relief, benefit, or indemnity, in case of injury or death of their employees, when such advantage is accorded to other corporations and their employees in the adjustment of the claims between them.

The only difference which might support separate legislation which suggests itself is the public character of the common carrier and the possible tendency of the relief department, by obviating burdens involved, to lessen the vigilance and care of the railroads essential to the safety of the public. If this were so (and it is to be said that in so far as indicated by the record it is purely imaginary), it would furnish no ground for the distinction between employees of the same company. The safety of the public is quite as dependent on the diligence and foresight of the great body of men doing the work of railroads in positions not exposing them to the dangers of moving trains, as of those who are thus exposed. The inclusion of railroad companies only in a class to be affected by statute has sometimes been upheld, not because the subjects to be affected are railroad companies, but owing to the character of their business, the peculiar nature of the risks included, or the nature of their property. Thus special laws with reference to the assessment and taxation of property have been sustained, owing to difference in the nature of railroad property. Taylor v. Secor, 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. ed. 689; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. ed. 1031, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114. An examination of the decisions generally will demonstrate that something more tangible than a mere name, business, or purpose of a corporation, is exacted by the courts as a basis of classification. There must be some connection between the legislation and the subjects upon which it operates, and within the latter must be included all subjects in like situation and circumstances.

An instructive case is that of Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 666, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255. The legislature of Texas had enacted a statute providing that where a claim in certain instances against a railroad company, not exceeding in amount $50, shall be presented to the company, supported by an affidavit, and if the company fail to pay the same within thirty days, a recovery may be had, and an attorney fee of $10 shall be "assessed and awarded by the court or jury trying the issue." This was denounced as class legislation, and the court, speaking 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

through Mr. Justice Brewer, said: "No individuals are thus punished and no other corporations. The act singles out a certain class of debtors and punishes them, when for like delinquencies it punishes no others. They are not treated as other debtors or equally with other debtors. They cannot appeal to the courts as other litigants under like conditions and with like protection. If litigation terminates adversely to them, they are mulcted in the attorneys' fees of the successful plaintiff; if it terminates in their favor they recover no attorneys' fees. It is no sufficient answer to say that they are punished only when adjudged to be in the wrong. They do not enter the courts upon equal terms. . . . Before a distinction can be made between debtors, and one be punished for a failure to pay his debts, while another is permitted to become in like manner delinquent without any punishment, there must be some difference in the obligation to pay, some reason why the duty of payment is more imperative in the one instance than in the other. If it be said that this penalty is cast only upon corporations, that to them special privileges are granted, and therefore upon them special burdens may be imposed, it is a sufficient answer to say that the penalty is not imposed upon all corporations. The burden does not go with the privilege. Only railroads of all corporations are selected to bear this penalty. The rule of equality is ignored. It may be said that certain corporations are chartered for charitable, educational, or religious purposes, and abundant reason for not visiting them with a penalty for the nonpayments of debts is found in the fact that their chartered privileges are not given for a pecuniary profit. But the penalty is not imposed upon all business corporations, or chartered for the purpose of private gain. The banking corporations, the manufacturing corporations, and others like them are exempt. Further, the penalty is imposed not upon all corporations charged with the quasi public duty of transportation, but only upon those charged with a particular form of that duty. So, the classification is not based on any idea of special privileges by way of incorporation, nor of special privileges given thereby for purposes of private gain, nor even of such privileges granted for the discharge of one general class of public duties. But, if the classification is not based upon the idea of special privileges, can it be sustained upon the basis of the business in which the corporations to be punished are engaged? That such corporations may be classified for some purposes is unquestioned. The business in which they are engaged is of a peculiarly dangerous nature, and the legislature, in the exercise of its police powers, may justly require many things to be done by them in order to secure life and property. Fencing of railroad tracks, use of safety couplers, and a multitude of other things easily suggest themselves. And any classification for the imposition of such special duties—duties arising out of the peculiar business in which they are engaged is a just classification, and not one within the prohibition of the 14th Amendment. Thus it is frequently required that they fence their tracks, and as a penalty for a failure to fence double damages in case of loss are inflicted. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 29 L. ed. 463, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110. But this and all kindred cases proceed upon the theory of a special duty resting upon railroad corporations by reason of the business in which they are engaged,—a duty not resting upon others, a duty which can be enforced by the legislature in any proper manner; and whether it enforces it by penalties in the way of fines coming to the state, or by double damages to a party injured, is immaterial. It is all done in the exercise of the police power of the state and with a view to enforce just and reasonable police regulations.”

This decision is not impinged by what was said in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, 173 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 746, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419, where an act of the general assembly of Arkansas, requiring railroad companies, upon the discharge of employees, to pay the wages due on the day of such discharge, and providing as a penalty for nonpayment that wages shall continue at the same rate until paid, but not longer than sixty days unless action is begun, was upheld as amendment of the railroad charter. See same case reported in 62 Am. St. Rep. 154, and note. The Ellis Case was again adhered to in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. ed. 909, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609, which construed a statute of Kansas declaring the setting out of fines in the operation of a railroad shall be prima facie evidence of negligence, and upon recovery authorizing the assessment of a reasonable attorneys' fee. This was justified on the ground that its purpose was to secure the utmost care on the part of the railroad companies to prevent the escape of fires from their moving trains. The distinction drawn between it and the Ellis Case is rather hazy, and the denunciation of the statute as class legislation by Mr. Justice Harlan, in which three other justices concurred, seems unanswerable; yet the classification, in any event, included all companies or individuals operating trains. The Ellis Case was again approved in Fidelity Mut. Life Assn. v. Mettler, 185 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

U. S. 308, 46 L. ed. 922, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 662, in which a statute of Texas enacting that life and health insurance companies, upon failure to pay losses within the time specified in their policies after demand made, shall pay the beneficiaries, “in addition to the amount of the loss, 12 per cent damages on the amount of such loss, together with all reasonable attorneys' fees for the prosecution and collection of such loss.” This was put on the ground, first, of the state's power to impose conditions on its own and foreign corporations; and, second, on the differences between life and health companies and fire, marine, and inland insurance, and also mutual benefit and relief associations, and “the necessity of prompt payment in order to provide the means of living, of which the beneficiaries have been deprived by the death of the insured,” is emphasized.

In my opinion there is no way by which to uphold the amendment to § 2071 of the Code, without disregarding the Ellis Case and ignoring the necessity of material differences between classes of individuals or corporations to justify the application of different laws thereto. Attention to the question involved in the concrete, rather than the abstract, can lead to no other result. The amendment nullifies agreements of one class of employees of railroad companies, and permits those of another to be enforced. A “square deal” would exact that all employees be included, and each be accorded the same protection by the law. It singles out for protection the claims of a part of those in the service of railroad companies, and excludes from its benefits the claims of the remainder and of all employees in the service of all other corporations in like situation. The courts are open to the favored class, notwithstanding any contract of insurance, relief, benefit, or indemnity, and acceptance thereunder, but to all others they are closed. In the words of Mr. Justice Brewer, “they do not enter court on equal terms.” What I object to is the discrimination by this statute between men when there is no basis for such discrimination. All in like situation should stand equal before the law. No favoritism should be tolerated. If it is a good law for an employee who operates an engine, it is equally good for the despatcher who directs the movement of engines and trains. If its enactment is essential for the protection of the brakemen from undue pressure from their employer, it is equally essential to shield the trackmen from the same influence. There is nothing in the situation of the one which will justify extending the protection of a statute like that under consideration for his benefit, and denying such protection to the other. "The true principle requires something more than a mere designation by such characteristics as will serve to classify, for the characteristics which thus serve as a basis of classification must be of such a nature as mark the objects so designated as peculiarly requiring exclusive legislation. There must be substantial distinction, having a reference to the subject-matter of the proposed legislation, between the objects or places embraced in such legislation and the objects or places excluded. The marks of distinction on which the classification is founded must be such, in the nature of things, as will, in some reasonable degree at least, account for or justify the restriction of the legislation." State ex rel. Richards v. Hammer, 42 N. J. L. 440. The 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibits the denial to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. The 6th section of article 1 of the Constitution of this state exacts that all laws shall have a uniform operation, and that privileges and immunities shall not be granted to any citizen or class of citizens which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens. These provisions of the fundamental law, denouncing discrimination, should not be frittered away. Their importance in guarding against the segregation of society into classes, and in assuring to all citizens that equality before the law which is essential to free government, cannot be overestimated. The constitutionality of this amendment cannot be sustained save by resort to refinements in distinction and sophistry in reasoning, in which no court should indulge, and which would be destructive of the above limitations on legislative power. For these reasons I am of the opinion that the district court rightly held the statute invalid. So believing, it is unnecessary for me to consider whether it was also violative of a portion of the Constitution guarantying the freedom of contracts.

Since submitting the foregoing, the majority have added to their opinion a rejoinder, which may be responded to briefly. The assertion that anything which might have been included in the statute as originally enacted may be added by way of amendment is not borne out by the illustrations cited. Thus, in case of an exemption or homestead, it is quite as essential to the protection of the family that these be preserved, as that they be granted, and hence protective measures enacted by way of amendment are supported by the same classification as the original act. The vice in the reasoning lies in the assumption that protective measures have been enacted and sustained regardless of any present requirement of conformation to the provisions of the Constitution. In every instance cited, the subsequent statute, if challenged, has been sustained because the class for which enacted was such as to render special legislation appropriate. If the doctrine asserted were to be accepted, all necessary in order to avoid the constitutional prohibition against class legislation would be the enactment of a law by way of an amendment to some former statute of ten years or a century ago, instead of a new and independent act. Lapse of time and changes in conditions cannot be thus obliterated in determining whether a statute is open to the charge of unjust discrimination, and no authority is cited so holding. No one questions the legislative power to abolish, take away, or modify statutory rights. All insisted upon is that in doing so the legislature is not independent of or superior to the Constitution, but must accomplish this in the way exacted by that instrument. Here is a cause of action created by statute. It has stood, with respect to the remedy, for thirty-six years on precisely the same footing as other causes of action, existing or created before or since. After the lapse of that time it is amended. The liability created by the original statute must not be confused with the remedy which is sought to be affected by the amendment. The liability arises upon the happening of the injury. The amendment does not purport to change it in any way. It in no way restricts the liability previously created. It adds nothing thereto. It relates solely to the remedy. Had it been enacted as part of the original act, it would have constituted a part of the right and must have been upheld as valid; for, being part of the right created, the same classification of necessity would sustain it. See Major v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 115 Iowa, 309, 88 N. W. 815; Hawley v. Griffin, 121 Iowa, 667, 92 N. W. 113, 97 N. W. 86. But, as seen, this remedy was not added until long after the cause of action was created, and consequently did not become a part of the right. It was a distinct and independent provision for the protection of a particular cause of action, and can no more be upheld than had it related to any other liability created by statute or existing at the common law. Had the subject of its protection been some other liability of a railroad company or individual, no question could arise as to whether it should comply with the constitutional requirements of the uniformity and classification. Can it be that the mere fact alone that a liability has been created by statute will justify a separate and peculiar remedy not available to all persons in like situation? Such is the logical deduction from the opinion of the majority. The legislature may look back 1 or 100 years, and if, perchance, the cause of action had its origin in a statutory enactment, it may be singled out for a special remedy, and this, regardless of its similarity with other causes of action, or the persons to be affected, or the changes wrought by lapse of time. I am not ready to indorse any such theory. I am unwilling to resort to any species of reasoning, having no substantial basis, in order to avoid the clauses of the Constitution denouncing unjust discrimination.

Believing that the amendment to the statute is in conflict with the requirements of the Constitution, I am of opinion that the judgment of the district court so declaring should be affirmed.

Bishop, J., dissenting:

I concur in the result reached by Ladd, J., upon the views expressed by him.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

TOBE FLEEMAN

v.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(82 Kan. 574, 109 Pac. 287.)

Appeal — right to — void judgment.

A party is entitled to appeal from, and obtain a reversal of, a void judgment brought to the supreme court on a case made.

(June 11, 1910.)

Headnote by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.

Note. — Right to appeal from void judgment, decree, or order.

Many cases are to be found in which it may be possible to read into the decision an implied ruling of the court upon the question suggested in the title of the present note, but the endeavor has been to consider only such cases as more or less clearly pass upon the point.

Although the courts are not of one mind as to whether a void judgment, decree, or order is appealable, the prevailing opinion, as attested by the collated cases, is clearly to the effect that the appellate court will so far take cognizance of the void entry as to reverse it and restore the parties to the position they originally occupied: Livermore v. Campbell, 52 Cal. 75; Bates v. Gage, 40 Cal. 185; Norwood v. Kenfield, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wyandotte County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. A. Low and Paul E. Walker for appellant.

Messrs. Bird & Pope for appellee.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this proceeding the Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company asks that the judgment rendered against it and in favor of Tobe Fleeman in the circuit court of Wyandotte county be set aside and reversed. The contention is that the court had no existence, and that the judge of the court who assumed to render the judgment was without authority. By chapter 52 of the Laws of 1908 the legislature undertook to create the circuit court of Wyandotte county and to define its jurisdiction, and in pursuance of the provisions of the act a judge was appointed, who proceeded to try causes and exercise other judicial functions. The validity of the act creating the court was challenged by a proceeding brought in this court, and it was decided that the statute was repugnant to the Constitution and without force. State ex rel. Jackson v. Hutchings, 79 Kan. 191, 98 Pac. 797. This cause, which was pending in the court of common pleas, was transferred to the circuit court, and at the end of a trial a decision in the form of a judgment was rendered against the appellant, which it seeks to have annulled and reversed.

As the act was unconstitutional, the court and judge were without jurisdiction, and the judgment is therefore invalid. Re Norton, 64 Kan. 842, 91 Am. St. Rep. 255, 68 Pac. 639. Is a void judgment reviewable? Although there is some conflict in the authorities, the rule in this state is that a judgment which is a nullity may be reversed and set aside in a proceeding in error. This was held in Earls v. Earls, 27 Kan. 538, where it was said: "In such a case the defendant in error claims that the judgment is not void, but that it is valid, and that he has a right to enforce it, and therefore he cannot, for the purpose of defeating the proceedings of the plaintiff in error, say that the judgment is void and that the plaintiff's petition in error should be dismissed; while on the other hand, the plaintiff in error may simply treat the void judgment as a merely erroneous one, and ask that it be reversed." While the decision attacked is a nullity, it is in the form of a judgment, and appellee is asserting that it is a valid and binding obligation. Although void, it may be treated as in existence so far as to allow appellant to challenge its validity on appeal, and to enable this court to declare its invalidity and reverse it. Winkfield v. Brinkman, 31 Kan. 25, 2 Pac. 113; Shaffer v. Brinkman, 31 Kan. 124; Kidder v. Fay, 60 Wis. 218, 18

Appellee appears to concede that a void judgment might be reversed if the case were here on a transcript of the record, but asserts that, as it is brought on a case made, which the trial court had no authority to settle, it cannot be considered. The judgment attacked is preserved and presented in one of the methods prescribed by statute for the taking of an appeal. If the judgment may be reviewed at all, no reason is seen why its validity may not be determined as well upon a case made as upon a transcript of the record.

On the face of the record, as preserved, it is clearly shown that the judgment is void, and it is therefore reversed.

Rep. 50 (the court said whether the judgment in the court below was void or voidable, it should be reversed); Sayles v. Davis, 20 Wis. 302 (void judgment; the better practice would be to move the court below to set it aside, as it expedites the remedy and saves expense); Calkins v. Hays, 4 Wis. 200; Abrams v. Jones, 4 Wis. 806; Delles v. Second Nat. Bank, 7 Wyo. 66, 75 Am. St. Rep. 875, 50 Pac. 190; Alexander v. Crollott, 199 U. S. 580, 50 L. ed. 317, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 161; Baker v. Power, 124 U. S. 167, 31 L. ed. 382, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 416; Wilson v. Daniel, 3 Dall. 401, 1 L. ed. 655.

The conflict of opinion upon the question considered was recognized and commented upon by Mr. Justice Hoyt in Stewart v. Lohr, 1 Wash. 341, 22 Am. St. Rep. 150, 25 Pac. 457, in the following language: "In the appellate courts of some of the states it is the practice in cases like this [judgment was void], to simply dismiss the appeal, and leave the judgment of the court below to stand in form as a judgment in force. These say that as the judgments are upon their face absolutely void, they will not take jurisdiction, even to reverse them. Other appellate courts, however, take the ground that as they have the power to clear their own records of objectionable entries, even though as standing thereon they are absolutely void, they have like power to set aside like void entries in the inferior courts, when the form of removing such void entries to such appellate courts has been complied with. We think the latter practice the better one. See Lynch v. Divan, 66 Wis. 490, 29 N. W. 213.

A judgment unreversed, though void upon its face, may seriously embarrass the person against whom it is in form rendered, though it can, of course, be of no benefit to the person who has secured it. This being so, such judgment should not be allowed to stand."

In Hind v. Wilder's S. S. Co. 14 Haw. 215, it was said: "There is much difference of opinion as to whether a void decree is appealable or not, with, perhaps, the weight of authority in favor of the view that it is appealable."

Valentine, J., said in Earls v. Earls, 27 Kan. 538: "Mr. Powell, in his work on Appellate Proceedings, uses the following language: 'When considering the question whether proceedings in error might or should be brought or not, it should be remembered that there are some errors so obvious and gross that they render the judgment void, a nullity, collaterally, or in any manner the question may arise, without a writ of error to reverse it. But even in such case, error for the reversal of such judgments might be sustained, and that would be the better way, as being more direct and positive. Errors of this sort are such as exist where there was a failure of jurisdiction in the court; or the want of jurisdiction over the person of the defendant in the judgment, on the account that there has been no service of process or appearance of the defendant, or that there was no legal cause of action or complaint. . . . In either of these instances the judgment may be treated as void, even collaterally; but it will be so far regarded as to lay the foundation of proceedings in error.' Powell, Appellate Proceedings, p. 265, § 6."

A person has a clear legal right to except to an illegal judgment because rendered by a court without jurisdiction, for the purpose of having it reviewed and reversed. Walker v. Banks, 65 Ga. 20, wherein it was said: "It is true that it is a mere nullity, but so is every judgment upholding pleas to the jurisdiction where the court has none, and the injured party can except in the former as in the latter case, and have the illegal judgment reversed, whether attacked for want of jurisdiction or for any other legal reason."

The right to appeal is by no means limited to legal judgments. The great object of an appeal is to show that the judgment is not legal, and that it should be reversed. Petty v. Durall, 4 G. Greene, 120.

A party may secure an order declaring the invalidity of a void judgment by appeal. It is true that he may enjoin its enforcement; but it is also true that he may secure a judicial declaration of its invalidity by invoking the aid of an appellate court. Cass County v. Logansport & R. C. Gravel Road Co. 88 Ind. 199.

In Cain v. Goda, 84 Ind. 209, it was said: "We are not willing to hold that a void judgment can only be set aside upon a bill of review, for such a judgment may be attacked in any of the methods recognized by law, as, for instance, by a complaint for an injunction, or by an action to have it vacated. It is, indeed, not even necessary that the attack should be a direct one, for a void judgment may be collaterally impeached."

A concession that the judgment is void because the trial court was without jurisdiction could be of no avail to appellee in support of his motion to dismiss the appeal. Such a concession might overthrow his judgment, but would not justify a dismissal of the appeal. There may be an appeal from a void judgment. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Lockridge, 93 Ind. 191.

Where a decree is a nullity because of want of jurisdiction, it is the better practice to reverse the judgment and remand the cause, rather than to dismiss the writ. Russell v. Sargent, 7 Ill. App. 98.

So, in Trullinger v. Todd, 5 Or. 36, where it was claimed that, since the service of summons was insufficient to give the court in which the judgment was rendered jurisdiction of the person of the appellant, the judgment was an absolute nullity, on account of the want of such jurisdiction, and that no appeal would lie from such judgment, Prim, J., said: "While it appears to be generally conceded that a void judgment may be disregarded and treated as a nullity, whenever any right is claimed under such judgment, whether it has been appealed from and set aside by a competent court or not, it appears also to be the constant practice for courts of review to entertain appeals from such judgments, for the purpose of reversing and purging the records of such judgments."

Certainly, it would seem more consonant with the good order of society to permit such counterfeit and void presentments to be questioned and set aside in due order, upon a proceeding looking directly to that end, execution being superseded in the meantime, than to leave the party aggrieved to await the issuance of process, and then to resist its execution manu forte, or to restrain it by some counter process. Skinner v. Beshoar, 2 Colo. 383.

A void judgment, if permitted to stand, would be in form a judgment, entered in the records of a court, upon which final process might be issued, which, although void, might through judicial machinery be made oppressive to individuals. It is therefore a grievance which may properly be remedied by a tribunal which exists for the correction of errors. Merced Bank v. Rosenthal, 99 Cal. 39, 31 Pac. 849, 33 Pac. 732.

"This order," said Beatty, J., in Hastings v. Burning Moscow Co. 2 Nev. 93, "although void, may operate unjustly to defendant, and we see no reason why this court may not correct it. This court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the action, and we think should correct all illegal orders made in the case, although, perchance, where the order is clearly void, the defendant might be able to maintain an action against a ministerial officer enforcing it."

It is immaterial too whether the judgment is void for want of jurisdiction or for any other reason; the defendants against whom it was rendered have the right to avoid it by appeal to a higher court. Smith v. Jacobs, 77 Mo. App. 254.

A void order may be reversed on appeal notwithstanding nearly two years have elapsed since its entry, because it is not "made valid by lapse of time, and ever remains without effect as completely as if never entered." Kelner v. Cowden, 60 W. Va. 600, 55 S. E. 649.

But in Kansas, by reason of statute, in order for a void judgment to be reversed upon appeal the petition in error must be filed within one year after its rendition. Winkfield v. Brinkman, 31 Kan. 25, 2 Pac. 113.

In Officer v. Price, 5 Yerg. 285, Catron, Ch. J., said: "There is but one case known to a court of error where a plaintiff can reverse because of an error in his favor, and that is where the court rendering the judgment has no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant or of the subject-matter, being, in fact, a void judgment, to rid himself of it, so that he may proceed anew."

But upon the question of the appealability of a judgment for contempt, the supreme court of Tennessee in State v. Gallo-way, 5 Coldw. 333, 98 Am. Dec. 404, after expressing no doubt as to its jurisdiction to reverse and annul ordinary judgments which are void, and because they are void, said it was quite another thing to hold that it ought to exercise, or possessed, appellate jurisdiction in regard to judgments for contempt, because, and for the reason only, that they are void. Smith, J., said: "The rule, we think, proper and in harmony with the practice of the courts everywhere, is that the judgment of a court for contempt is not subject to appellate review."

If such judgment be void, the law has provided other modes of redress, sufficiently prompt and effectual and entirely compatible with the power of the courts, to punish contempts promptly and effectually." And in the course of the same opinion the learned justice said that "to hold otherwise would precipitate into this court the whole flood of judgments for contempts, upon the ground of being void; and would greatly paralyze the power of the inferior courts, indispensable to their efficiency and existence."

It has been held too that a court cannot review a void order in an action unless it affects a substantial right. DeLancey v. Piepgras, 141 N. Y. 88, 35 N. E. 1089.

Likewise, in Elmira Realty Co. v. Gibson, 103 App. Div. 140, 92 N. Y. Supp. 913, where the lack of jurisdiction did not appear upon the record of the case upon appeal, but from an accompanying certificate of the judge, the court said: "Whether or not the court would have power to reverse upon the appearance, apart from the record, of a fact rendering the judgment void for want of jurisdiction, we think the better practice is to dismiss this appeal, remitting the parties to a motion in the court below, to rid themselves, if need be, of the void judgment in that court."

And it has been held that a judgment of a district court rendered at a term held without authority of law is not appealable. Campbell v. Chandler, 37 Tex. 32; Doss v. Waggoner, 3 Tex. 515; Baker v. Chisholm, 3 Tex. 157; Hodges v. Ward, 1 Tex. 244.

In Backer v. Eble, 144 Ind. 287, 43 N. E. 233, while the court admitted that an appeal would lie from a void judgment, it was held that a judgment, so-called, entered by a judge in vacation, is not in that class, and that "the most that can be said of it is that it is a special finding on which no judgment has been rendered by the court," and therefore an appeal will not lie.

In Hughes v. Chapman, 60 Ga. 595, it was held that, since a land court had no power to try a caveat to the issuing of a warrant or to the granting of land, but the ordinary could only transmit the caveat, etc., to the superior court as an original case, in pursuance of a statute, if he rendered a judgment upon the caveat, and the caveator appealed, and the appeal was transmitted, it should be dismissed, "there being no provision of law for such a judgment, or for an appeal therefrom."

And in Alabama Midland R. Co. v. Stevens, 116 Ga. 790, 43 S. E. 46, it was held that, since judgment should have been rendered dismissing a writ of certiorari for failure to give a valid bond, a subsequent hearing of the case was nugatory, and therefore a writ of error to the overruling of the certiorari would be dismissed.

It is true that in Wicks v. Ludwig, 9 Cal. 173, the court decided squarely that a judgment entered in vacation, where the Constitution of California conferred jurisdiction only on the district courts to try cases in term time, was illegal and void, and that no appeal could be taken from such judgment. But not only the earlier California cases, but the later ones also, sustain exactly the reverse doctrine, as one may observe by the citations supra.

Thus, in Livermore v. Campbell, 52 Cal. 75, the court says: "It has been repeatedly held by this court that an appeal lies from a void judgment, and it follows that an order setting aside a judgment in form, on the ground that it is in fact invalid, is also appealable."

In Tate v. Hennessey, 7 B. C. 262, the intimation is strong that an appeal from a void order is not the proper remedy, but that a motion should be made in the court below to set it aside.

And in Brigman v. McKenzie, 6 B. C. 58, while an order was held to be appealable, the court approves the making of a motion before the judge to set the same aside, as the better practice. So, in Re Kootenay Brewing Co. 7 B. C. 131, Irving, J., was of the opinion that a void order is to be set aside upon motion being made for that purpose.

In Voight Brewery Co. v. Orth, 5 Ont. L. Rep. 443, 2 Ont. Week. Rep. 304, it was held that a void judgment could be appealed from.

But in Re Scottish Ontario & M. Land Co. 21 Ont. Rep. 676, there is a dictum to the contrary.

And in Cochrane v. Boucher, 8 Ont. App. Rep. 555, it was held that where a statute required the adjudication to be made by a certain number of judges, a judgment rendered contrary to its mandate was not valid, and would not support an appeal.

In Kentucky, by reason of statute (Civil Code, § 763), it is held that a void judgment cannot be modified or reversed on appeal until a motion to set aside or modify the judgment shall have been made in the inferior court and overruled. Hermann v. Martin, 107 Ky. 642, 55 S. W. 429; Easterling v. Chiles, 93 Ky. 315, 20 S. W. 227; Louisville Rock & Lime Co. v. Kerr, 78 Ky. 12; Bullitt v. Com. 14 Bush, 74; Hager v. New South Brewing Co. 28 Ky. L. Rep. 895, 90 S. W. 608; Swafford v. Howard, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1703, 50 S. W. 43; Felton v. Munson, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1321, 49 S. W. 204; Barbourville Real Estate Co. v. Matthews, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 767; Curd v. Williams, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 855, 18 S. W. 634; Turner v. Pash, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 639; Robinson v. Louisville, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 366; Louisville, St. L. & T. R. Co. v. Barrett, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 232; Sullivan v. Frankfort Bldg. & L. Asso. 13 Ky. L. Rep. 48; Bamberger v. Vincent, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 165; Rubel v. Bushnell, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 810; Ulin v. Ford, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 39; Stamper v. Central Kentucky Lumber & Min. Co. 9 Ky. L. Rep. 175, 4 S. W. 330; Sweeney v. Middleton, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 612; Carpenter v. Layton, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 611; Ruby v. Grace, 2 Duv. 540.

ridge v. Baldridge, — Ky. —, 117 S. W. 253.

But where the party is in court, and objects and excepts to the entry of the orders and judgments complained of, then the motion in the lower court to set the same aside on the ground that they are void is not a condition precedent to the right of appeal. Williams v. Williams, 107 Ky. 496, 54 S. W. 716.

As was stated supra, some courts in cases where the judgment, decree, or order rendered is void simply dismiss the appeal, and leave the void entry of the court below to stand in form as a judgment in force. Gartman v. Lightner, 160 Ala. 202, 49 So. 412; Singo v. McGhee, 160 Ala. 245, 49 So. 290; Wertheimer v. Ridgeway, 157 Ala. 398, 47 So. 569; Tidmore v. Perritt, — Ala. —, 42 So. 818; Walker v. Wright, — Ala. —, 38 So. 1036; Northern Alabama R. Co. v. Musgrove, — Ala. —, 38 So. 1037; Drennen v. Jasper Inv. Co. — Ala. —, 38 So. 1034; Pearce & Son Co. v. Norris, — Ala. —, 38 So. 1037; Poe v. State, — Ala. —, 38 So. 1037; Randall v. Wadsworth, 130 Ala. 633, 31 So. 555; Holdsombeck v. Fancher, 112 Ala. 473, 20 So. 519; Jackson v. State, 102 Ala. 76, 15 So. 351; Leslie v. Tucker, 57 Ala. 483; Pettus v. McKinney, 56 Ala. 41; David v. David, 56 Ala. 49; State ex rel. Dixon v. Fifth Dist. Judge, 26 La. Ann. 119; Culver v. Leovy, 21 La. Ann. 306; Second Municipality v. Tulane, 1 La. Ann. 179; Staab v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 3 N. M. 606, 9 Pac. 381; Adams v. Wheeler, 1 D. Chip. (Vt.) 417.

In Hoagland v. Creed, 81 Ill. 506, it was held that the court would not grant a writ of error to review a void judgment.

The idea seems to be that, as such entries are upon their face absolutely void, and therefore productive of no rights to anyone, the appellate court will not take jurisdiction, even to reverse them.

"An appeal from a lower to a higher court only exists where something has been passed on and definitely settled in the lower court, and which is susceptible of being properly adjudicated in the appellate court; such does not appear to us to be the effects of this decree. So far as the question of appeal is concerned, we think this decree is a nullity, and that the remedy of the plaintiff is on motion to the court of common pleas, to set the decree aside for irregularity, which we have no doubt that court has the right to do." Dougherty v. Walters, 1 Ohio St. 201.

A void decree can neither be affirmed nor reversed, and does not support an appeal. Adams v. Wright, 129 Ala. 305, 30 So. 574.

And where there is no valid judgment to support the appeal, this court will ex mero motu dismiss the appeal. Gunter v. Mason, 125 Ala. 644, 27 So. 843.

Nor does the fact that the prisoner did not object in the trial court, to being tried on a day after the lawful term of the court expired, preclude him from raising the question of the invalidity of the proceedings in the appellate court. Johnson v. State, 141 Ala. 7, 109 Am. St. Rep. 17, 37 So. 421, wherein the appeal was dismissed because the judgment was void.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ROSSVILLE STATE BANK, Appt.,
v.

J. M. HESLET.

(— Kan. —, 113 Pac. 1052.)

Note — provision for extension of time — effect on negotiability.

A promissory note, otherwise in negotiable form, contained the following provision: "The makers and indorsers of this note hereby severally waive presentment for pay-

Headnote by BENSON, J.

Note. — Effect on negotiability of promissory note of provision permitting extension of time.

The earlier cases on this subject are collected in the notes to First Nat. Bank v. Buttery, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 878, and to Anniston Loan & T. Co. v. Stickney, 31 L.R.A. 234, where the lack of harmony in the cases is pointed out at length.

In Sykes v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 78 Kan. 688, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 685, 98 Pac. 206, cited in ROSSVILLE STATE BANK v. HESLET, it was held that the law of Missouri, while having a "trend" against that of Kansas, had not been shown to be contrary to it in the case of the note then in question, containing the provision as to extension which the court quotes in its opinion, in the HESLET CASE.

In Stitzel v. Miller, 260 Ill. 72, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 95 N. E. 53, a note containing the clause, "We also agree that in case said note is not paid at maturity, that it is at the option of the holder hereof to extend, as he deems proper, the payment of the above note, and that said extension shall not in any manner release one or either of us from the payment hereof," was held negotiable, under the negotiable instrument law providing that the instrument must be payable on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time, and that one is payable at a determinable future time which is expressed to be payable: "(1) At a fixed period after date or sight; or (2) on or before a fixed or determinable future time specified therein; or (3) on or at a fixed period after the occurrence of a specified event which is certain to happen, though the time of happening be uncertain. An instrument payable upon a contingency is not negotiable, and the happening of the event does not cure the defect." The court placed its decision on the ground that the time of payment was certain, as the option to extend could be exercised only upon the failure of the payors to make payment at maturity, and that after maturity negotiability, for all practical purposes, was at an end, and considered that cases where the note reserved to the buyer the right of option of extension at any time, either before or after maturity, were not in point, and said: "The quoted words do not affect the character of the note, before or up to its maturity, either in its certainty, amount to be paid, the date of payment, or the person to whom the payment is to be made. The clause in question does not destroy the negotiability of the note. The following authorities in other jurisdictions tend to uphold this conclusion: National Bank v. Kenney, 98 Tex. 293, 83 S. W. 368; First Nat. Bank v. Buttery, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 878, and note; Farmer v. Bank of Graettinger, 130 Iowa, 469, 107 N. W. 170; Anniston Loan & T. Co. v. Stickney, 31 L.R.A. 234, and note."

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George H. Whitcomb and Clad Hamilton, for appellant:

The note is negotiable.

First nat. Bank v. Buttery, 17 N. D. 326, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 878, 116 N. W. 341, 17 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 52; Capron v. Capron, 44 Vt. 410; Jacobs v. Gibson, 77 Mo. App. 244; City Nat. Bank v. Goodloe-McClelland Commission Co. 93 Mo. App. 123; Krouskop v. Shontz, 51 Wis. 204, 37 Am. Rep. 817, 8 N. W. 241; Woodbury v. Roberts, 59 Iowa, 348, 44 Am. Rep. 685, 13 N. W. 312; Farmer v. Bank of Graettinger, 130 Iowa, 469, 107 N. W. 170.

The note in question expressly authorizes the holder of the note to extend the time of payment without consultation with fixed period after date or sight; or (2) on or before a fixed or determinable future time specified therein; or (3) on or at a fixed period after the occurrence of a specified event which is certain to happen, though the time of happening be uncertain. An instrument payable upon a contingency is not negotiable, and the happening of the event does not cure the defect." The court placed its decision on the ground that the time of payment was certain, as the option to extend could be exercised only upon the failure of the payors to make payment at maturity, and that after maturity negotiability, for all practical purposes, was at an end, and considered that cases where the note reserved to the buyer the right of option of extension at any time, either before or after maturity, were not in point, and said: "The quoted words do not affect the character of the note, before or up to its maturity, either in its certainty, amount to be paid, the date of payment, or the person to whom the payment is to be made. The clause in question does not destroy the negotiability of the note. The following authorities in other jurisdictions tend to uphold this conclusion: National Bank v. Kenney, 98 Tex. 293, 83 S. W. 368; First Nat. Bank v. Buttery, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 878, and note; Farmer v. Bank of Graettinger, 130 Iowa, 469, 107 N. W. 170; Anniston Loan & T. Co. v. Stickney, 31 L.R.A. 234, and note."

(N.S.) 878, note.

Benson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is upon a promissory note 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

payable to the order of J. M. Heslet, on January 1, 1909, containing the following clause: "The makers and indorsers of this note hereby severally waive presentment for payment, notice of payment, protest, and notice of protest, and all exemption that may be allowed by law, and valuation and appraisal laws waived, and each signer and indorser makes the other an agent to extend the time of this note."

The question for decision is whether the note is a negotiable instrument. It is conceded that, if the note is negotiable, the plaintiff should recover, and that, if it is not, the judgment for the defendant was right.

It is contended that the element of certainty in time of payment necessary in commercial paper is destroyed by the stipulation for extension. An instrument to be negotiable "must be payable on demand, or at a fixed or determinable future time." Neg. Inst. Law, § 8 (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 5254). An instrument is payable at a determinable future time "which is expressed to be payable: (1) At a fixed period after date or sight; or (2) on or before a fixed or determinable future time specified therein; or (3) on or at a fixed period after the occurrence of a specified event which is certain to happen, though the time of happening be uncertain. An instrument payable upon a contingency is not negotiable, and the happening of the event does not cure the defect." Neg. Inst. Law, § 11 (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 5257).

In City Nat. Bank v. Gunter Bros. 67 Kan. 227, 72 Pac. 842, followed in Sykes v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 69 Kan. 134, 76 Pac. 393, and Id. 78 Kan. 688, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 665, 98 Pac. 206, it was held that a note was not negotiable, because of the following clause: "The makers and indorsers hereby severally waive protest, demand, and notice of protest and nonpayment, in case this note is not paid at maturity, and agree to all extensions and partial payments before or after maturity without prejudice to holder."

The negotiable instruments law did not apply in the Gunter Case (§ 6); but the provisions of that statute to which we have referred are only declaratory of the common law. Adhering to the views expressed in that case, they must, if applicable, govern the controversy here. In that case the makers and indorsers agreed to all extensions before or after maturity; here signer and indorser made the other an agent to extend the time. Interpreting "signer" to mean maker, and the agency of each maker and indorser to act for the other, as equivalent to a consent to the action of either to an agreement for extension made by another, the only material difference discernible is that in the Gunter Case the note stated that the extension might be made before or after maturity, while in this case it authorizes the extension without stating when it may be made. The precise inquiry suggested is whether the authority to extend here given may be exercised only after maturity; if so, the time is fixed for payment; for the promise, apart from this clause, is to pay on January 1, 1909, and an authority to extend afterwards would only amount to a waiver of the right to be relieved from liability for an extension without such authority. If, however, the clause is to be construed as giving the parties named the right to extend the time before maturity, its effect would be precisely the same as though the words "on or before" had been inserted, and the rule of the Gunter Case would apply.

Counsel for the bank say: "At most the clause in question can only be construed to give authority to the parties named to 'extend' the time of payment at or after maturity by an agreement to be then made. That is what the word 'extend' means." To "extend" is to stretch, or stretch out. Webster's Dict. As here used, it means that the time of payment may be lengthened to a date beyond that stated in the instrument. Extension of time of payment rests in contract, and the contract may be made before as well as after maturity, unless some restriction is expressed or is to be implied from the terms used. Thus, the parties to a lease for one year may agree before the end of the term that it shall be extended for another year, and this may be done ordinarily in any contract or transaction involving a fixed period of time. The general authority given in this instrument is to extend the time for payment; each signer and indorser being made an agent of every other to do this. It is not stated that this shall be done only at maturity or after maturity, and it is not perceived why such a restriction should be implied, and no precedent is cited for such a rule. Indeed, it would seem that extensions in such cases would ordinarily be made before a note falls due, in order to prevent the impairment of credit, and to avoid inconveniences that might arise from disappointed expectations of receiving payment.

It is argued, however, that the opinion in the Gunter Case warrants the interpretation claimed by the appellant. The clause relied upon is: "If the time is to remain fixed until maturity, when another time is to be fixed by the parties, or if payment is made to depend upon events which necessarily must occur, and the time of payment is ultimately certain, other considerations would arise." While it was said that other considerations would arise if the time of payment remained fixed until maturity of the note, it was not suggested that the right to an extension before the time of payment stated in the note had elapsed depended on the words "before or after maturity" in the clause giving such right. Nor is such a conclusion to be inferred from the language used. In reading the cases cited in the opinion referred to, it will be found that in all, or nearly all, of them, the instruments under consideration gave the right to extend in general terms, without stating when it should be exercised, and the distinction now contended for was not suggested. In Oyler v. McMurray, 7 Ind. App. 645, 34 N. E. 1004, cited on page 233 of 67 Kan., the clause was that "the drawers and indorsers severally waive . . . all defenses on the ground of any extension of the time of payment . . . given by the holder or holders." The court said: "This evidently means before or after January 1, 1888" (the date of maturity). This seems to be the construction placed upon the general authority to extend, as given in the other cases cited.

In Woodbury v. Roberts, 59 Iowa, 348, 44 Am. Rep. 685, 13 N. W. 312, also cited in the Gunter Case, the stipulation was that "the makers and indorsers . . . agree that the payee or his assigns may extend the time of payment," etc. The court said: "The note before us may never fall due, for payment may be extended indefinitely." If, however, extensions could be made only after maturity, the objection that it might never fall due would have no foundation, for it would necessarily fall due before an extension could be made.

The vice of the stipulation in question is that the day of payment cannot be determined. The signer (maker) or any indorser may, at any time he sees fit to do so, as agent one for another, extend the time for payment by agreement with the holder. The payee, in transferring the note, may become an indorser, and therefore an agent for the maker, and his indorsee may in turn become an indorser with like power, so that the time of maturity must be indefinite, and not determinable from the instrument. As stated in Coffin v. Spencer (C. C.) 39 Fed. 262, also cited in the Gunter Case: "Every successive taker of the paper is, of course, bound to take notice of this stipulation, and, instead of looking only to the face of the instrument for the time of its maturity, as in case of commercial paper he must, is put upon inquiry whether or not any agreement for a renewal or extension of time has been made by his proposed assignor or by any previous holder."

In a note in 17 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 55, the cases upon the general subject of certainty in time of payment of negotiable paper are collated, including City Nat. Bank v. Gunter Bros. 67 Kan. 227, 72 Pac. 842. The cases are also collated in a note in 125 Am. St. Rep. 199. Many of these authorities are discussed in exhaustive briefs furnished by the parties here. There is a distinct line of cleavage between cases holding in harmony with City Nat. Bank v. Gunter Bros., and those in other jurisdictions holding that stipulations like the one contained in that case are not fatal to negotiability. No useful purpose would be served by reviewing these cases here. The opposing views upon this question are clearly stated in the majority and minority opinions in First Nat. Bank v. Buttery, 17 N. D. 326, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 878, 116 N. W. 341, 17 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 52.

The plaintiff calls attention to the statute declaring that the negotiable character of an instrument is not affected by a provision which "waives the benefit of any law intended for the advantage or protection of the obligor." Neg. Inst. Law, § 12 (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 5258). By applying this waiver to subdivision 6 of § 127 of the same statute (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 5373), providing for the release of parties secondarily liable by extensions given without their consent, it is argued that the maker is bound. These provisions are not novelties in commercial law. But the plaintiff's contention overlooks the fact that the question to be determined in this case is whether the instrument is a negotiable promissory note, and this depends on whether it has the element of certainty in time of payment necessary in commercial paper. It is not a question of the waiver of the right of an obligor upon a negotiable instrument, to be released by an extension of time given without his consent, but whether there is such an instrument. Simple contracts, although for the payment of money, cannot be transformed into commercial paper by mere waiver.

The court is satisfied that the rule it has adopted and followed in the cases first referred to is sustained by the weight of authority, and by the better reasoning. The formal essentials of a negotiable instrument are so simple and so generally known that there is little reason for the insertion of debatable provisions; to encourage experiment in this field would tend to uncertainty in a matter which ought, as far as possible, to be free from doubt. As observed by Gibson, Ch. J., in Overton v. Tyler, 3 Pa. St. 346, 45 Am. Dec. 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

645: "A negotiable bill or note is a courier without luggage. It is a requisite that it be framed in the fewest possible words, and those importing the most certain and precise contract; and, though this requisite be a minor one, it is entitled to weight in determining a question of intention."

The same court, by Sharswood, J., in Woods v. North, 84 Pa. 407, 24 Am. Rep. 201, said: "It is a necessary quality of negotiable paper that it should be simple, certain, unconditional, not subject to any contingency. It would be a mere affectation of learning to cite the elementary treatises and the decided cases which have established this principle. It is very important to the commercial community that it should be maintained in all its rigor."

The importance of avoiding stipulations in commercial paper, like the one under consideration, is also emphasized in Woodbury v. Roberts, 59 Iowa, 348, 44 Am. Rep. 686, 13 N. W. 312.

After a careful consideration of this important and interesting question, we are satisfied that plaintiff's contention rests upon a repudiation or modification of the rule declared in the Gunter Case, rather than upon the denial of its application.

The judgment is affirmed.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

J. MILTON LYELL, Assignee of W. Jeff Adams, Appt.,
v.

MARY A. WALBACH.

(113 Md. 574, 77 Atl. 1111.)

Married women — promise — moral obligation.

The moral obligation of a married woman to pay for supplies furnished for use in her family at a time when she had no legal power to contract for them is not sufficient to support her promise after her disability has been removed to make such payments.

(June 23, 1910.)

Note. — Validity of new promise by woman after removal of disability of coverture to pay debt incurred during disability.

As shown in the note to Gilbert v. Brown, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1053, the decision in LYELL v. WALBACH, that the moral obligation arising from a contract made by a married woman at a time when it was void

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court of Baltimore City in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an account stated. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Milton Lyell in propria persona.

Mr. Leigh Bonsal for appellee.

Briscoe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is before us on a second appeal. The first appeal is reported in 111 Md. 610, 75 Atl. 339, and the questions of law on the pleadings were established on that appeal. A judgment of the superior court of Baltimore city, in favor of the defendant, was there reversed, with costs, and the case was remanded for a new trial.

because of the disability of coverture will not constitute a sufficient consideration to sustain a new promise by her after the removal of her disability, is sustained, by the numerical weight of authority at least. In addition to the many cases there cited in support of that doctrine, should be added the following cases: Hetherington v. Hixon, 46 Ala. 297; Horton v. Hill, 138 Ala. 625, 36 So. 465; Howard v. Simpkins, 70 Ga. 322, obiter; Thompson v. Minnich, 227 Ill. 430, 81 N. E. 336; LYELL v. WALBACH; State Nat. Bank v. Robidoux, 57 Mo. 446; Kent v. Rand, 64 N. H. 45, 5 Atl. 760; Groene v. Frondhof, 1 Disney (Ohio) 504.

As shown in the earlier note, however, there is considerable authority, especially in New York and Pennsylvania, against that doctrine. While, as above intimated, the decision in Thompson v. Minnich, supra, is well supported by other cases, none of those which the court cites in support of its conclusion seems to be in point. One of those cases (Brick v. Campbell, 122 N. Y. 337, 10 L.R.A. 259, 25 N. E. 493), is merely to the effect that the removal by the act of 1879 of the disability of a married woman having a child to assign a policy of insurance upon the life of her husband for her benefit did not ipso facto validate a prior assignment made by her. Another case (Loftus v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 133 Pa. 97, 7 L.R.A. 313, 19 Atl. 347) seems to be even less in point, dealing merely with the question whether a statute empowering married women to sell and transfer government loans extended to foreign or nonresident married women owning such securities. As stated, both New York and Pennsylvania are committed by other cases cited in the earlier note to a contrary doctrine.

In Bibbs v. Davis, 2 Hayw. & H. 364, Fed. Cas. No. 18,235, it was held that where a woman, during marriage, made a contract in reference to her separate estate, and subsequently, after the death of her husband, promised to pay the same, she was liable thereon at law. Probably, however, the original promise in this case, though un-

The case is now before us upon its merits, and the questions are presented by a single exception to the rulings of the court upon the prayers. The court below, at the close of the testimony, refused all of the plaintiff's prayers, and granted the defendant's prayer that there was no evidence legally sufficient for the plaintiff to recover, and that their verdict must be for the defendant, and this action of the court forms the basis of the plaintiff's appeal from the judgment so entered on the verdict.

The suit was brought by the plaintiff on the third day of February, 1909, in the superior court of Baltimore city, as assignee for the benefit of creditors of W. Jeff Adams, trading as W. Jeff Adams & Company, against the defendant, Mary A. Walbach, wife of John De-Barth Walbach, enforceable at law, was binding in equity upon her separate estate, so that the decision falls within the exception referred to in the earlier note.

Cases like Candy v. Coppock, 85 Ind. 594, and Radican v. Radican, 22 R. I. 405, 48 Atl. 143, where there was a mere acknowledgment, after the removal of the disability, of an agreement made while the disability was in force, are not in point, for the reason stated in the former case that such an acknowledgment does not constitute a new promise, and does not present the question whether a new promise under such circumstances would be binding.

So, cases like Walker v. Owen, 79 Mo. 563, involving the question whether a woman who was under coverture at the time of making an agreement with respect to her property may afterwards, upon becoming discover, affirm the contract and enforce it against the other party, are not within the scope of these notes.

Additional authority for both sides of the general question whether a moral obligation arising from the receipt of actual pecuniary benefit will sustain a new promise after the removal of the disability will be found in the note to Muir v. Kane, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 520. If the criterion suggested in that note for determining whether the moral obligation arising from a previous invalid and unenforceable contract will sustain a new promise—namely, whether or not the promisor in consideration of the original promise received actual pecuniary benefit, as contrasted with the mere satisfaction of his ethical obligations—is accepted, it is apparent that a new promise after removal of the disability of coverture to pay a debt contracted during coverture would be sustained if the wife, under the original contract, obtained an actual material benefit of a character which, independently of any consideration of detriment to the other contracting party, would have constituted a sufficient consideration to have sustained the original promise had she not been under disability at that time.

G. H. P.

deceased, to recover a balance of $784.82 alleged to be due by her on an account stated between them. The declaration as amended contained two counts; but the cause of action is fully set out and stated in the second count, and it is as follows: "And for that the said W. Jeff Adams and a certain Henry V. Waltjen, trading as W. Jeff Adams & Company, during and about the years 1896, 1897, and 1898, at the request of Mrs. Mary A. Walbach, otherwise known as Mrs. John De B. Walbach, sold and delivered to the defendant quantities of meat, game, vegetables, and other goods and merchandise generally known as 'green groceries,' on account of which the defendant made sundry payments, until the amount due by her to the firm of W. Jeff Adams & Co. upon account stated amounted on the 11th day of November, 1907, and some time prior thereto, to the sum of $784.82 (not including any interest thereon); that prior to the 11th day of November, 1907, the defendant admitted to W. Jeff Adams and to John E. Hood, then clerk and salesman for the W. Jeff Adams & Company, the correctness of the amount of $784.82, due and owing by her, as shown by the account stated, and her liability thereon, and promised to pay the same; that on or about the 11th day of November, 1907, Henry V. Waltjen duly assigned unto W. Jeff Adams all of his right, title, and interest in the business of W. Jeff Adams & Company, and from and after the date W. Jeff Adams conducted the business in the same firm name, until he assigned the same, with all the assets thereof, to J. Milton Lyell, trustee, for the benefit of creditors, on or about the 28th day of May, 1908; that in the year 1908, prior to the 28th day of May, 1908, the defendant again admitted the sum to be due and owing by her, and promised to pay the same upon the death of her mother, Mrs. Priscilla G. Savin; that Priscilla G. Savin, mother of the defendant, has since departed this life, and the defendant has been requested to pay the amount of $784.82 due by her, but has not paid the same."

It will not be necessary for us to discuss the evidence in detail, for the purpose of disposing of the legal questions raised on the record, or to attempt to reconcile the conflicting statements of the witnesses who testified in the case. The record shows that in the course of the trial the plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove the facts set out in the second count of the declaration, while, on the other hand, the evidence upon the part of the defendant was in strict denial and in direct conflict with that offered by the plaintiff, and tended to sustain the defense interposed by the defendant. The undisputed testimony is that the defendant was a married woman, at the time of the alleged sale of the goods to her, and that the firm of W. Jeff Adams & Company, was fully advised of this fact. There may be conflict in the testimony as to the precise date of the dealings, but it is not disputed that all of the sales were prior to the 1st day of January, 1899, the date on which the law relating to the ability of married women to contract became effective in this state. Acts 1898, chap. 457, was approved on the 9th of April, 1898, but did not take effect until on or after the 1st day of January, 1899. According to the plaintiff's testimony, the last sales were made on or about the month of July, 1896, and the defendant some time in the month of November, 1907, admitted the account as stated, and promised to pay it when her mother died and when she came into possession of her money. The defendant, in her testimony, denied the indebtedness and the alleged promise to pay it, and testified that she had no dealings with the firm from December, 1893, to 1900; that the alleged account was a debt due by her husband, who was living at the time, and who paid the household expenses, until 1896, and she was not responsible for his debts; that she had no separate estate, and did not unite in any written obligation with her husband to pay the debt.

The sole question, then, is: Can the defendant, a married woman, assuming the plaintiff's theory of the case to be correct, be held liable in this action? Manifestly, she would not be liable if it was her husband's debt, because the alleged promise to pay the debt was not in writing as required by the statute of frauds, and such a promise would be void and unenforceable.

It is very clear that prior to Acts 1898, chap. 457, the contracts of married women, in this state, were void at law and in equity, except in those instances where her common-law powers of contracting were changed and enlarged by statute. Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, vol. 2, p. 1274, art. 45. There is nothing in this case to take it out of the common-law rule relating to the disabilities of a feme covert, or to bring it within any of the existing statutory exceptions or modifications prior to Acts 1898, chap. 457. Acts 1882, chap. 265 (earnings); Acts 1892, chap. 590 (boarding-house keeper); Poffenberger v. Poffenberger, 72 Md. 321, 19 Atl. 1043; Wolf v. Bauereis, 72 Md. 481, 8 L.R.A. 680, 19 Atl. 1045; Wolf v. Frank, 92 Md. 142, 52 L.R.A. 102, 48 Atl. 132. But by § 5, chap. 457 of the Acts of 1898, a complete change was effected in the law as to the liability and the capacity to contract, of married woman, in this state. This section (5) provides that married women shall have power to engage in any business and to contract, whether engaged in business or not, and to sue upon their contracts, . . . as fully as if they were unmarried; contracts may also be made with them and they may also be sued separately, upon their contracts, whether made before or during marriage, as fully as if they were a feme sole, etc. And by § 20 of the same act it is provided that nothing shall be construed to relieve the husband from liability for the debts, contracts, or engagements which the wife may incur or enter into upon the credit of her husband or as his agent, or for necessities for herself or for his or their children; but as to all such cases his liability shall be and continue as at common law. Now, it appears from the undisputed evidence that all of the goods and merchandise claimed in this suit were sold before the act of 1898 was effective, and when the defendant was under the disability of coverture, her legal status, at that date. So, conceding, without deciding, for the purposes of the case, that she contracted the debt at the time alleged and testified to by the plaintiff, she clearly would not be liable on the contract, and the defense of coverture becomes a good bar and answer to the suit.

But it is insisted, upon the part of the appellant, that since the act of 1898, which removed the wife's disability, the defendant admitted the debt, and promised to pay it, as set out in the count stated and as stated in the declaration. Now, assuming that the evidence was legally sufficient to sustain this contention, although it is absolutely denied by the appellee, we are brought to the question: Was there such a valid and sufficient legal consideration to support this promise, as to permit a recovery against her in this case? In other words, was there a sufficient legal consideration to support the express promise to pay which the defendant is alleged to have made after her disabilities were removed, and to be enforced against her?

In Ingersoll v. Martin, 58 Md. 67, 42 Am. Rep. 322, this court said: It may be conceded that there was a moral obligation to pay the debt in full, notwithstanding the technical release, and yet a mere moral obligation simply would not be sufficient legal foundation for the promise. The general statement, used by Lord Mansfield, in Hawkes v. Saunders, Cowp. pt. 1, p. 289, said Judge Alvey, is now understood, both in England and in this state, as being so restricted as not to apply or extend to that class of cases which arise out of the moral duties or affections alone. There must be something to support an express promise to pay. Ellicott v. Turner, 4 Md. 492; State use of Barnard v. Gott, 44 Md. 341; Yates v. Hollingsworth, 5 Harr. & J. 216; Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Ad. & El. 438, 3 Perry & D. 276, 9 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 409, 4 Jur. 1081, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 23. In the case of Linz v. Schuck, 106 Md. 230, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 789, 124 Am. St. Rep. 481, 67 Atl. 286, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 495, a recent case, Chief Judge Boyd, in a very clear and forcible opinion, after reviewing the previous cases upon this subject at some length, said the rule as announced in Ingersoll v. Martin must be accepted as the law of this state on that subject. The decisions of State use of Stevenson v. Reigart, 1 Gill, 1, 39 Am. Dec. 628; Drury v. Briscoe, 42 Md. 154, and Robinson v. Hurst (Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. v. Hurst) 78 Md. 69, 20 L.R.A. 761, 44 Am. St. Rep. 266, 26 Atl. 956, were considered, and, in so far as the statements in those cases conflicted with Ingersoll v. Martin, supra, were overruled, and the doctrine asserted in Ingersoll v. Martin, supra, was affirmed.

We are of opinion, after a careful consideration of the authorities, that the promise to pay the debt, in this case, is not supported by a sufficient legal consideration to make it binding on the wife. It is well settled by all the well-considered cases that, the contracts of a married woman, being void, cannot be revived in this way. Whatever may be the decisions elsewhere, and there are undoubtedly conflicting opinions, we cannot give our assent to the appellant's contention in this case. The subject is discussed in 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 681, and the authorities are there collected and cited. The distinction between contracts that are void and those that are voidable are discussed, and it is there said, supported by a number of citations: "Where, however, the original contract is absolutely void, as for instance a debt contracted by a married woman, there is no such legal foundation for the moral obligation as will support her promise to pay the debt after her discovery."

In Watkins v. Halstead, 2 Sandf. 311, where goods were sold to a married woman during coverture, and a promise made by her after a divorce to pay for them, it was held the promise was not supported by a proper consideration, and was void. The court said: "In a note to Wennall v. Adney, 3 Bos. & P. 252, the rule as to what precedent consideration will support an express promise is laid down with a precision and accuracy that have commended it to repeated judicial approbation. It is there said that an express promise can only revive a precedent good consideration which might have been enforced at law through the medium of an implied promise, had it not been suspended by some positive rule of law, but can give no original right of action, if the obligation on which it is founded never could have been enforced at law, though not barred by any legal maxim or statute provision. This rule was approved by Justice Spencer in Smith v. Ware, 13 Johns. 257; by Bronson, J., in Ehle v. Judson, 24 Wend. 97; and by Lord Denman in Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Adl. & El. 438, 3 Perry & D. 276, 9 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 409, 4 Jur. 1081, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 23. Tested by this rule, this promise must surely fail. The precedent consideration relied upon never could have been enforced through the medium of an implied promise, because: 1st, The wife was incapable, at the origin of the consideration, of making a valid promise; and, 2d, the goods, in contemplation of law, were sold on the credit of another (the husband). The original promise, whether express or implied, on the sale of the goods, when the defendant was under coverture, was altogether void."

In Valentine v. Bell, 66 Vt. 280, 29 Atl. 251, the court said: "But plaintiff claims that he can recover on defendant's promise made since the passage of said act, that she would pay for keeping the child while she was covert of Minor and while she was sole. But as the promise made while she was covert of Minor was void, both at law and in equity, it constitutes no consideration for the subsequent promise to perform it. . . . It amounts to no more than this,—that, being liable to pay she promised to pay. Such a promise, without more, is null and affords no ground of action. It left the debt and the parties as they were before. Hayward v. Barker, 52 Vt. 429, 36 Am. Rep. 762.

In the case of Littlefield v. Shee, 2 Barn. & Ad. 811, 1 L. J. K. B. N. S. 12, where the plaintiff furnished goods to the defendant while she was a feme covert, living apart from her husband, and after his death she promised to pay for them, it was held that, as the price of the goods originally constituted a debt from the husband, and not from the defendant, there was not a sufficiently precedent legal obligation to constitute the defendant's moral obligation a sufficient consideration. Waters v. Bean, 15 Ga. 358.

The case of Lee v. Muggeridge, 5 Taunt. 36, relied upon by the appellant to sustain a contrary doctrine, was vigorously condemned in Watkins v. Halstead, supra; and in Dixie v. Worthy, 11 U. C. Q. B. 338, it was said it had been in effect overruled.

The cases of promises to pay debts barred by limitations, debts discharged by the operation of the bankrupt law, a debt contracted by an infant, and the like, are voidable contracts, and rest upon a different rule and principle, and need not be considered by us. Webster v. Le Compté, 74 Md. 250, 22 Atl. 232.

It follows, from what we have said, that the judgment must be affirmed.

There was no error in rejecting the plaintiff's prayers, and the defendant's prayer, withdrawing the case from the jury and directing a verdict for the defendant, was properly granted. In this view of the case, it is not necessary for us to discuss the other questions presented on the record in disposing of the case.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

RE LOUIS FRAZIN et al.

UNITED CIGAR STORES COMPANY, Petitioner.

(105 C. C. A. 320, 183 Fed. 28.)

Bankruptcy—leasehold—right to re-enter.

The title to a leasehold held by a bankrupt vests in the trustee only upon some act of acceptance on his part, notwithstanding the provision of the bankruptcy act that the trustee shall upon his appointment be vested with the title of the bankrupt as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt, and therefore acceptance of rent from him prior to that time will not waive a right to re-enter under the terms of the lease, for devolution of the term by operation of law.

(Ward, Circuit Judge, dissents.)

(November 14, 1910.)

Note.—Vesting of title to leasehold in lessee's trustee in bankruptcy as dependent upon acceptance by trustee.

Under the bankruptcy act of 1867, it was held that assignees in bankruptcy did not, by accepting the trust, become assignees of the term (Re Washburn, Fed. Cas. No. 17,211, 11 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 66); that they were not bound to accept a lease unless it was valuable, their duty being to determine whether it would or would not be beneficial to creditors, and to act accordingly (White v. Griffing, 44 Conn. 437, 18 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 399). It was held that, unless restrained by the terms of the lease itself, the assignee might adopt or reject it on behalf of the estate as he should find most beneficial for creditors, and could take a reasonable time in which to do so (Re Laurie, 4 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 32; Ex parte PETITION by the lessor of certain premises for a revision of an order of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York enjoining petitioner from claiming and asserting the right of re-entry in the leased premises. Reversed.

Statement by Noyes, Circuit Judge:

In 1907 the petitioner leased to the bankrupts certain premises in the city of New York, and this lease was in force at the time of the bankruptcy. The lease contained the following provision: "If, at any time during the term hereby demised, proceedings in bankruptcy shall be instituted by or against the lessee, . . . or if a receiver or trustee shall be appointed of the lessee's property, or if this lease shall by operation of law devolve upon or pass to any person or persons other than the said lessee, then and in each of said cases it shall and may be lawful for the lessor, at the lessor's election, into and upon the said demised premises or property, or any part thereof in the name of the whole, to enter the same and to have, hold, possess, and enjoy."

Faxon, 1 Low. Dec. 404, Fed. Cas. No. 4,704); and that there must be some positive and unequivocal act of acceptance before the assignee could be held liable for rent accruing after the bankruptcy (Re Washburn, supra; Re Yeaton, 1 Low. Dec. 420, Fed. Cas. No. 18,133); where he failed to act within a reasonable time, he was held to have elected not to take the leasehold (Smith v. Gordon, Fed. Cas. No. 13,052); and it seems that the assignee's occupation of the premises after the adjudication was not regarded as evidence of an election to take (Re Ten Eyck, Fed. Cas. No. 13,829, 7 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 26); for, as stated in Re Ives, Fed. Cas. No. 7,116, 18 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 28, while an assignee in bankruptcy was bound to compensate a landlord for the use of premises occupied by him in winding up the estate, he did not become the assignee of leases belonging to the bankrupt, or become bound by any covenant therein unless he elected to accept the lease.

It was held in Re O'Dowd, Fed. Cas. No. 10,439, 8 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 451, that the lessee's assignee in bankruptcy did not become vested with the lessee's interest, where it was not such an interest as could have been conveyed by him to a third party without the consent of the lessor.

Other cases that recognized the right of election differed as to whether the relation of landlord and tenant was terminated, but, of course, this difference does not go to the question considered in this note.

Thus, in Re Breck, 8 Ben. 93, Fed. Cas. No. 1,822, 12 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 215, it was intimated that a lease which by its terms could not be assigned without the consent of the lessor was undoubtedly canceled by the bankruptcy of the lessee.

And in Re Hamburger, Fed. Cas. No. 5,975, 12 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 277, it appeared that the assignee after his appointment surrendered the premises to the landlord, and the court held, without expressly assigning such fact as its reason, that in that case the lease was terminated by the bankruptcy.

While in Ex parte Houghton, 1 Low. Dec. 554, Fed. Cas. No. 6,725, it was said that since the assignees did not assume the lease, the original parties stood simply as landlord and tenant.

Under the bankruptcy act of 1898, it is held that the trustee in bankruptcy is not 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bound to accept property of an onerous or unprofitable character, or to assume a lease of the bankrupt unless such course is for the benefit of creditors, and if he is confronted with the alternative of an immediate ejection from the premises, with the consequent depreciation of the bankrupt's personal estate, or the assumption of an undesirable lease and the payment of large sum for unsecured rent, a court of equity should relieve him from the coercion of the situation, and if time is essential for an equitable adjustment of the various rights, the court may impose such delay as is reasonably necessary. Re Chambers, 98 Fed. 865, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 537.

In Re Adams, 134 Fed. 142, 14 Am. Bankr. Rep. 23, a somewhat different view was taken, the court seeming to be of the opinion that upon the adjudication a leasehold passes to the lessee's trustee, and that its future disposition is to be governed by the best judgment of the trustee. This case, although presenting the view that the leasehold passes to the trustee in the first instance, seems to recognize the trustee's right to relinquish it. But the majority of the cases decided under the act of 1898, together with those involving the act of 1867, seem to make it fairly plain that the lease does not vest in the trustee unless he accepts it.

The adjudication does not terminate a lease or change the legal relation of landlord and tenant, unless the landlord re-enters or the trustee assumes the lease, in which event, the adjudication operates like any other assignment, and all liability of the tenant ceases. Witthaus v. Zimmermann, 91 App. Div. 202, 86 N. Y. Supp. 315, 11 Am. Bankr. Rep. 314.

And the trustee upon his appointment has the option to abandon the lease or accept it, and if he accepts it, he will be bound by its conditions to the same extent as the bankrupt was bound, at least so far as the payment of rent is concerned, and both he and the purchaser at the sale of the lessee's interest are bound to observe its covenants. Summerville v. Kelliher, 144 Cal. 155, 77 Pac. 889.

In Re Jefferson, 93 Fed. 948, 2 Am. Bankr. Rep. 206, one of the first cases decided under the bankruptcy act of 1898, the court said that § 47 of that act could in Receivers in bankruptcy were appointed in February, 1909, and they continued to occupy the leased premises, paying the stipulated rent, until August, 1909, when a trustee was appointed and took possession.

The lessor accepted one month's rent from the trustee, but the trustee did no affirmative act to accept the lease. The trustee applied to the referee in bankruptcy for an order enjoining the petitioner from setting up any claim of the right to re-enter upon said premises in the event of the sale or assignment of the leasehold interest by the trustee. The referee denied this application of the trustee; but, upon review, the district court reversed the order of the referee, and enjoined the petitioner from re-entering upon said premises by reason of the breach of any covenant or condition in said lease.

The present petition is for the revision of said order of the district court.

no way be construed as making the trustee in bankruptcy the tenant, nor as authorizing the estate to be a tenant of the landlord under the lease, however much the trustee might become such by the express or implied agreement with the landlord for the short time he might be compelled to occupy the premises in the discharge of his duties as trustee, and that the amount he should be required to pay during such period should be treated as a part of the expense of administration of the estate.

And in Re Hays, F. & W. Co. 117 Fed. 879, 9 Am. Bankr. Rep. 144, the court upholds the position taken in Re Jefferson, and holds that upon the adjudication the bankrupt ceases to be a tenant, and that his trustee is not authorized by law to become such in his stead, though, if necessary to carry on the business of selling the assets as distinguished from that which has been carried on by the bankrupt, the trustee may rent the old premises or other premises at his option, and pay the cost thereof as part of the expenses of administration. This, says the court in the Hays Case, is the more equitable rule, for in such circumstances, the landlord is entitled to prove his claim for rent which accrued up to the time of the adjudication, and to be entitled to the premises thereafter.

But in Re Ellis, 98 Fed. 967, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 564, the court takes issue with Re Jefferson with respect to whether the bankruptcy of the lessee terminates the relation of landlord and tenant, and holds that it does not terminate it, and says that where there is no clause giving the lessor the right to re-enter, the trustee has a reasonable time to elect whether to assume or to refuse the lease, and that, if he refuses to take the lease, the bankrupt remains the tenant as before.

And it was held in Shapiro v. Thompson, 160 Ala. 363, 49 So. 391, 24 Am. Bankr. Rep. 91, that the relation of landlord and tenant continues after the adjudication, that the bankrupt's liability to pay rent continues also, and that neither the trustee's temporary occupation of the premises, nor the landlord's acceptance of rent for the period of such occupation, affects the relation or the liability of the bankrupt to pay rent for the remainder of the term.

A provision in a lease against the assignment thereof without the lessor's consent is not the equivalent of an express provision declaring the lease void in case of bankruptcy, and is not applicable to an assignment by operation of law, so as to prevent the vesting of the term in the lessee's trustee. Re Bush, 126 Fed. 878, 11 Am. Bankr. Rep. 415.

A lessor who serves upon his tenant notice to quit for breach of covenant is entitled to enforce the forfeiture against the lessee's trustee in bankruptcy in proceedings subsequently instituted, and additional service of notice upon the trustee is not necessary, for he stands simply in the shoes of a bankrupt at the time he succeeds to the estate. Lindeke v. Associates Realty Co. 77 C. C. A. 56, 146 Fed. 630, 17 Am. Bankr. Rep. 215.

The right of the lessee's trustee to reject or accept a lease has been recognized, in passing, in other cases involving the provability of a claim for rent to accrue in the future. Bray v. Cobb, 100 Fed. 270, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 788, reversed on other grounds in Cobb v. Overman, 54 L.R.A. 369, 48 C. C. A. 223, 109 Fed. 65, 6 Am. Bankr. Rep. 324; *Atkins v. This right to accept or reject is also recognized in Re Roth, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 270, 104 C. C. A. 649, 181 Fed. 667, 24 Am. Bankr. Rep. 588, where the court stops to point out that, of course, if the lease contains a stipulation for re-entry in case of the bankruptcy of the lessee, the trustee cannot assume the lease against the lessor's objection. See the note to this case in 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 270, on the provability of claim under covenant indemnifying against loss of rent or accelerating future rent.

Noyes, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is clear that the lessor, by the acceptance of the rent stipulated in the lease, waived the right to re-enter on account of the bankruptcy or the appointment of the receiver or the trustee. The inquiry then is whether there was devolution of the lease by operation of law, and whether the lessor waived the right of re-entry by reason of it.

If the title to the leasehold interest devolved upon the trustee immediately upon his appointment, it is manifest that a breach of the condition took place at that time, and the lessor, by thereafter accepting rent from the trustee, waived the right to re-enter and was properly enjoined.

On the other hand, if the title to the leasehold interest did not pass to the trustee until after some act of acceptance upon his part, then there was no devolution of title prior to the receipt of the rent from the trustee, and, consequently, no waiver and no ground for the injunction. So, the real question in the case is this: When does the title to a lease held by a bankrupt vest in the trustee?

In the very recent case of Re Roth, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 270, 104 C. C. A. 649, 181 Fed. 670, decided by this court in August, 1910, it was said: "We think the early law as stated in Ex parte Houghton, 1 Low. Dec. 554, Fed. Cas. No. 6,725, is the law, under the present bankruptcy statute, applicable in the case of leases having the usual covenants and conditions. In that case the court said: "The earlier law of England, which we have adopted in this country, was that the assignees of a bankrupt have a reasonable time to elect whether they will assume a lease which they find in his possession; and, if they do not take it, the bankrupt retains the term on precisely the same footing as before, with the right to occupy, and the obligation to pay rent."

A further examination of the authorities confirms our opinion that the extract from Ex parte Houghton correctly states existing law.

The early English bankruptcy statute was construed in the leading case of Copeland v. Stephens, 1 Barn. & Ald. 593, decided in 1818, Lord Ellenborough writing the opinion. The following is the headnote of that case: "The general assignment of a bankrupt's personal estate under his commission does not vest a term of years in the assignees, unless they do some act to manifest their assent to the assignment, as it regards the term and their acceptance of the estate, rents, etc. And therefore, till some act of this sort is done by them, the term still remains in the bankrupt, and he is liable to the payment of rent accruing, due subsequent to the bankruptcy."

The later English statutes provide for the vesting of a bankrupt's property in the trustee, and expressly authorize him to disclaim burdensome leases. Under these statutes, it is held that the title to all leases vests in a trustee upon his appointment, and that he is liable upon them unless he disclaim them. But, in view of the changes in the acts, the later decisions can hardly be regarded as materially modifying the law of the earlier English cases, or as affecting the American decisions referring to them.

The law as stated in Ex parte Houghton is also in accordance with decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and other courts, under the bankruptcy act of 1867 (Act March 2, 1867, chap. 176, 14 Stat. at L. 517).

In Dushane v. Beall, 161 U. S. 513, 515, 40 L. ed. 791, 792, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 637, 638, the Supreme Court said: "It is well settled that assignees in bankruptcy are not bound to accept property which, in their judgment, is of an onerous, and unprofitable nature, and would burden instead of benefiting the estate, and can elect whether they will accept or not after due consideration and within a reasonable time, while, if their judgment is unwisely exercised, the bankruptcy court is open to compel a different course."

And in the same case the supreme court of Pennsylvania said (149 Pa. 439, 443, 24 Atl. 284, 285), its decision in this respect being unaffected by the reversal in the Supreme Court of the United States: "It has always been a principle of the bankrupt law that property which from its nature or condition may be a burden, rather than a benefit, to the estate, does not pass to the assignee without a distinct acceptance by him, and that in the absence of such acceptance it remains with the bankrupt."

In United States Trust Co. v. Wabash Western R. Co. 150 U. S. 289, 37 L. ed. 1085, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 86, 90, the Supreme Court also said: "The general rule applicable to this class of cases is undisputed that an assignee or receiver is not bound to adopt the contracts, accept the leases, or otherwise step into the shoes of his assignor, if in his opinion it would be unprofitable or undesirable to do so; and he is entitled to a reasonable time to elect whether to adopt or repudiate such contracts."

In Re Otis, 101 N. Y. 580, 5 N. E. 571, the New York court of appeals said: "It is well settled that a receiver or an assignee in bankruptcy, or an assignee for the benefit of creditors, if he elects to accept a lease belonging to the debtor or assignor, becomes, by such election, assignee of the lease and personally liable on the covenant to pay rent, of which liability he can only discharge himself by an assignment or surrender. . . . This doctrine proceeds on the ground that, on the election being made, the receiver or assignee becomes vested with the title to the leasehold interest, and a privity of estate is thereby created between the lessor and the receiver or assignee, by virtue of which the latter becomes liable on the covenants running with the land."

As already noted, these decisions were under the act of 1867, but the act of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418) cannot be regarded as essentially different.

The following is the relevant provision of the act of 1867: "All the property . . . shall, in virtue of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of his assignee [and subject to the exceptions stated in the preceding section], be at once vested in such assignee."

The act of 1898 (§ 70) provides: "The trustee of the estate of a bankrupt, upon his appointment and qualification, . . .

shall . . . be vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt."

A provision that property shall vest in a trustee as of the date of adjudication is not very different from a provision that, by virtue of the adjudication and the appointment of an assignee, all property shall at once vest in him. The only distinction would seem to be that if, under the act of 1867, the adjudication preceded the appointment of the trustee, the passing of title might not relate back to the date of adjudication; but such a distinction is of no importance in this case.

That the same principles are applicable under the act of 1898 as under the act of 1867 is held by the authorities. Thus, in Re Ellis (D. C.) 98 Fed. 967, the court said: "I can find nothing in the act of 1898 to produce a result different from that of the act of 1867. Had there been no clause giving the lessor the right to re-enter, the trustee in bankruptcy would have had a reasonable time to elect whether to assume or to refuse the lease. If he had assumed it, the bankruptcy would have operated like any other assignment, and would have released the bankrupt from all liability, except upon those of his covenants not already broken which would have remained binding upon him after any other assignment. If the trustee had refused to take the lease, the bankrupt would have remained tenant as before."

And in Watson v. Merrill, 69 L.R.A. 719, 722, 69 C. C. A. 185, 189, 136 Fed. 359, 363, the circuit court of appeals of the eighth circuit said, with respect to the act of 1898: "An adjudication in bankruptcy does not dissolve or terminate the contractual relations of the bankrupt. . . . Its effect is to transfer to the trustee all the property of the bankrupt except his executory contracts, and to vest in the trustee the option to assume or to renounce these."

Now, if the title to a lease passes volens to the trustee immediately upon his appointment, he has not the election which the Supreme Court says that he has of accepting it or not. His only option is to retain it or convey it back to the bankrupt, which is a very different thing. Moreover, if the bankrupt be divested of his interest in the leasehold estate, and it be vested in the trustee immediately upon his appointment, it is difficult to see upon what theory he can escape its obligations pending its retransfer. And if reconveyance be necessary, upon what principle can the bankrupt be compelled to accept it? In our opinion, upon principle and authority, a trustee, having the option to assume or reject a lease, takes title to such lease only in case he elect to accept it. If he elect to accept it, then, by virtue of the provision of the bankruptcy act already quoted, the vesting of the title relates back to the date of adjudication. But, if the trustee do not elect to accept the lease, it remains the property of the bankrupt.

It is said, however, that this conclusion is at variance with the express provision of the bankruptcy act that all the estate of the bankrupt shall vest in the trustee as of the date of the adjudication; that a leasehold interest is property, and must necessarily pass with all other property. In our opinion, however, the provisions of the bankruptcy act must be read in view of the principle stated in many decisions and expressly recognized in the English bankruptcy statutes, that there is a distinction between property which may be burdensome to an estate, and that which is manifestly beneficial to it. The latter, of course, passes upon the adjudication. The former passes only when accepted by the trustee; but, when accepted, the passing of title relates back to the time of the adjudication. If there be no acceptance, however, the title to a burdensome lease never passes. The property which may be said to pass immediately to the trustee in every case is not the lease itself, but the option of accepting it.

It follows as a corollary to these conclusions that, prior to the petition upon which the order in question was made, there had been no devolution of the title to the lease, and, consequently, that the petitioner was erroneously enjoined from enforcing the forfeiture provided for in the lease in case of such devolution.

The order of the District Court is reversed, with costs.

Ward, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

I think this case should be affirmed. We ought not to say, in the face of the express provisions of the bankruptcy act, that the lease did not vest in the trustee. Of course, the trustee has by the decisions of our courts the same right to disclaim that is expressly given by the English statute. Upon disclaimer in either case, the title would revert in the bankrupt without any formal conveyance. All this was held as to the act of 1867 in Sessions v. Romadka, 145 U. S. 29, 39, 36 L. ed. 609, 613, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 799. No doubt an option is property, but the option to accept or disclaim the lease never was the property of the bankrupt, and could not pass as such to his trustee.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

IDA B. ROSENSTIEL

v.

PITTSBURG RAILWAYS COMPANY,
Appt.

(— Pa. —, 79 Atl. 556.)

Master — incompetence of servant — general reputation.

1. The incompetence of a servant which will render a master liable for injury caused to a fellow servant by his negligence may be established by evidence of reputation, although the alleged incompetence did not arise until after his lawful employment.

Same — character of incompetence — relation to injury.

2. To hold a master liable for injury to a servant through the negligence of an incompetent fellow servant, it is not necessary to show that the bad general reputation of such servant extended to the precise character of negligence which caused the injury.

Same — superintendent's knowledge of incompetence — sufficiency.

3. The admission by the general superintendent of a division of a street railway system, who is the person designated to receive complaints concerning employees and management of cars, that a motorman is reckless and that he would have trouble, will bind the company with knowledge of such incompetence.

Same — complaint to one having no authority to discharge.

4. Complaints to the train despatcher of a street railway company, of the incom-

Note. — Evidence of reputation to show incompetency of servant or master's knowledge thereof.

For earlier cases on this subject, see subdivision of note to Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, 41 L.R.A. at page 97; subdivision of note to Smith v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 48 L.R.A. at page 389; and subdivision of note to McQuiggan v. Ladd, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) at page 763.

As to character of servant in action against master, generally, see subdivision of note in 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) at page 756; and as to liability of employer to injured servant, predicated from constructive knowledge as to capacity of servants, and non-liability predicated from want of constructive knowledge, see subdivisions of note in 41 L.R.A. at pages 46 and 53, respectively.

Actual incompetency.

The question as to the admissibility and probative value of evidence of reputation to show incompetency of a servant arises almost solely in cases of injuries to servants through the fault of fellow servants alleged to be incompetent, where the employer is charged with liability on account of his negligence in employing or retaining in his employ the incompetent servant.

As appears from the earlier notes above cited, it was held in many of the earlier cases that evidence of a servant's reputation is not competent to show his actual incompetency; and this seems to be the rule in New York. Thus, in O'Donnell v. American Sugar Ref. Co. 41 App. Div. 307, 58 N. Y. Supp. 640, holding that plaintiff's evidence was amply sufficient to sustain a finding that the culpable fellow servant of the plaintiff was incompetent, the court said: "His counsel was careful to observe the rule which has recently received the approval of the court of appeals in Park v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 155 N. Y. 215, 63 Am. St. Rep. 663, 49 N. E. 674, where Haight, J., says: 'We are aware that in some states the courts have permitted incompetency of servants to be shown by general reputation, but we have 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

never gone to that extent in this state. It appears to us that the safer and better rule is to require incompetency to be shown by the specific acts of the servant, and then, that the master knew or ought to have known of such incompetency. The latter may be shown by evidence tending to establish that such incompetency was generally known in the community."

So, in McCarty v. Ritch, 59 App. Div. 145, 69 N. Y. Supp. 129, following Park v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. supra, it was held that evidence of the general reputation of a culpable servant is not admissible to prove his incompetency.

—at time of employment.

But where the alleged negligence of the master was in the original selection and employment of the culpable fellow servant, it would seem that evidence of the latter's bad reputation at the time of hiring is admissible,—if not to show actual incompetency, at least to show actionable negligence on the part of the master in the hiring, in which he was bound to exercise due care and diligence. Stasch v. Cornwall Ore Bank Co. 19 Pa. Super. Ct. 113 (obiter).

Thus, in Chicago, L. S. & E. R. Co. v. Hartman, 71 Ill. App. 427, an action against a railroad by a yard switchman to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by him by reason of the negligence of the company, among other things, in employing and retaining in its employ an incompetent engineer, evidence concerning the reputation of the engineer as to competency was held to be admissible.

And evidence of the general reputation of a pit boss, whose functions and duties make him a vice principal, for competency and regard for the lives and limbs of the miners under his charge, is admissible on the question of negligence of the mine operator in employing an incompetent man for such position. Green v. Western American Co. 30 Wash. 87, 70 Pac. 310.

So, in Harrington v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 19 N. Y. S. R. 20, 4 N. Y. Supp. 640, although it was held that even if the petence of a motorman, are not sufficient to charge the company with knowledge of that fact, if he had no authority to employ or discharge such employees, and is not shown to have transmitted the complaint to one who had the power.

Appeal — incompetent evidence — permitting use — error.

5. The admission in an action by a servant of a street railroad company to hold the master liable for injury caused by the negligence of a fellow servant who was alleged to be incompetent, of incompetent evidence as to the making of complaints to an officer having no authority to discharge him, is reversible error, although the jury are instructed to consider it merely as to a subordinate fact, if they are permitted to consider it on the question of notice to the company of such incompetence, and the officer alleged to have received the notice is made a witness and obliged to meet the testimony, which might destroy his value as a witness.

(January 3, 1911.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 3, for Allegheny County, in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of her husband, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The charge of the trial judge was as follows:

"The employer is never liable to the em-defendant was negligent in employing a section foreman of intemperate habits, such negligence did not contribute to the plaintiff's injury, it appears that on the question of negligence there was testimony from several witnesses, apparently admitted without question, that the foreman had the reputation in the neighborhood where he resided "of being a drinking man."

—during employment.

Where a culpable fellow servant was competent when employed, and the alleged negligence on the part of the master is in retaining him after he has become incompetent, it is necessary, under the presumption that a competent servant will remain competent, in order to charge the master with liability, to show both the actual incompetence of the servant and the master's notice thereof; and some cases have held, as in ROSENSTIEL v. PITTSBURG R. Co., that the incompetence of a culpable fellow servant may be established by evidence of reputation, although no other case seems so clearly to have applied this rule, where the alleged incompetence did not arise until after the servant's lawful employment. The Pennsylvania cases relied on in ROSENSTIEL v. PITTSBURG R. Co. are sufficiently set out in the opinion therein.

In Pittsburgh R. Co. v. Thomas, 98 C. C. A. 437, 174 Fed. 591, an action against a street railway company based upon its negligence in employing or retaining in its employ an incompetent motorman, it was held that the testimony of several conductors and motormen who daily congregated, to the number of thirty or forty, in the car barn, to the effect that such motorman's reputation for competence as a motorman was bad, was pertinent as tending to show incompetence,—being the general reputation among those best capable of forming an opinion in regard to it.

So, evidence of a servant's general reputation in the conduct of the business in which he is employed, among those with whom he works or lives, has been held admissible upon the question whether he is incompetent. Giordano v. Brandywine Granite Co. 3 Penn. (Del.) 423, 52 Atl. 332.

And in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Henning, 90 Tex. 656, 40 S. W. 392, evidence seems to have been admitted without question, apparently for the purpose of showing the incompetency of an engineer, that his general reputation was that of a careless and reckless person.

Master's knowledge.

As to evidence of a culpable servant's reputation to show the master's knowledge, actual or constructive, of the servant's incompetence, otherwise proved, the cases are almost unanimous that such evidence is admissible. Giordano v. Brandywine Granite Co. 3 Penn. (Del.) 423, 52 Atl. 332; Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. v. Fortin, 203 Ill. 454, 67 N. E. 977; Cincinnati & Mt. V. R. Co. v. Thompson, 21 Ohio C. C. 778, 12 Ohio C. D. 326; Shoemaker v. Texas & P. R. Co. 29 Tex. Civ. App. 578, 69 S. W. 990; El Paso & S. W. R. Co. v. Smith, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 10, 108 S. W. 988.

"General reputation of a servant's unfitness to fill a position, while insufficient to bring home notice to a fellow servant working with him, yet, because it is the duty of the master to inquire and keep constant watch over such matters, is sufficient to affect him with such notice." Shoemaker v. Texas & P. R. Co. 29 Tex. Civ. App. 578, 69 S. W. 990.

Thus, evidence as to the reputation of a railroad hospital surgeon for sobriety is admissible, after the fact of his incompetence by reason of drunkenness has been shown by other evidence, to show that officials of the company knew of his incompetency, and were consequently negligent in not removing him after learning of his inefficiency. Wabash R. Co. v. Kelley, 153 Ind. 119, 52 N. E. 152, rehearing denied in 54 N. E. 752.

And after other evidence has been offered sufficient to warrant a jury in finding a servant incompetent, evidence of his gen-ployee for an injury occasioned through the negligence of a fellow employee, unless the employer was negligent in keeping an incompetent man in its employ. So that it becomes important if you come to that question, to determine whether Staley was a competent or an incompetent man. The only evidence here as to his competency would go, not to the knowledge of the duties of his employment, but to his reckless manner of performing those duties. Was he such a reckless man? is the first question. Was he such a reckless man as to render him unfit to be placed in the position in which he was placed, in charge of the motive power of his car? . . . The test is: Was he reasonably competent? Under the circumstances, did his recklessness go
